Jonathan Swift.

It is not at all uncommon for the lives of men of letters to be comparatively uninteresting, or to possess interest only or mainly in connection with their works But there are certain notable exceptions, and perhaps the greatest of these exceptions is the case of Jonathan Swift. One of the greatest names in English or in any literature, he presents likewise a 'human document' of the most interesting and in part puzzling kind, while he also ex ercised no small influence upon the public fortunes of his country as well as upon the private fates of his friends He was born in Hoey's Court, Dublin, on 30th November 1667, he spent by far the greater part of his life in Ireland, and was most in timately and mo mentously con nected with its affairs, yet lie was only an Irish man by the acci dent of the time and place of his birth, and his characteristics were not in the slightest degree Irish-in fact, few of the distin guished nien of the three Lingdoms have been more thoroughly English in blood The Swifts themselves were of Yorkshire origin, but Jonathan's grandfather was a royalist parson in Herefordshire, most active in the king's cause during the rebellion, and sorely punished by the triumphant party. He married Elizabeth Dryden, first cousin to the poet's father, who brought Cumberland and Northants blood into the strain, and Swift's own mother was Abigail Erick or Herrick, a kinswoman of the author of the Hesperides, and of a Leicestershire family who traced themselves back to the most distinguished Saxon ancestry In the generation before Swift's birth his uncles had established themselves chiefly in Ireland, and his father obtained the position of Steward of the King's Inns in Dublin, but died before his son's birth, leaving his wife and a baby girl in very poor circumstances Part of Swift's own infancy was passed with a nurse at White haven, but he returned to Ireland at three years old, and was educated by his uncle Godwin at Kilkenny Grammar-school (the best in Ireland), with Congreve for a schoolfellow, and then at Trinity College, Dublin It is said (with the con firmation of his own admissions, or rather frank assertions) that he showed not only no cleverness as a boy or young man, but not even the scatter brained idleness which sometimes preludes genius

It is at least in teresting to note that his two great kinsmen on diffe rent sides of the tree were also verv late in showing what was in them At any rate, the termination of Swift's career at college mortified himself very much. At Easter 1685 lie failed to satisfy the examiners in two out of three necessary subjects —a failure which in the ordinary course would have apparently Lept him back a whole year But a sort of back-door was provided speciali gratiá, as it was called, for unfortunates in this plight, and Swift, it seems, was al lowed to avail himself of it in February 1686. He could hardly, dissolution of the monasteries and the slow con stitution of regular openings for a career in the professions, in the public service, and in business It was certainly nov in its very last stage, but it was still an existing and an understood thing By degrees, if not at first, Swift became a sort of secretary to Temple, having opportunities (which he used) of considerably increasing an erudition which, despite his unlucky degree, was already not inconsiderable. Their connection lasted for some ten years, and Swift had the opportunity of making acquaintance with all sorts and conditions of men and women, from King William (who is said to have both offered him a cavalry commission and taught him how to cut asparagus) to a pretty child named Esther Johnson, who with her mother lived at the Temples' house on a sort of poor-relation standing even more difficult to define than Swift's own, and who became 'Stella'—the star, if not the sole star, of the sea of bitterness which was Swift's But the sojourn was not unbroken uncertain whether the first gap was due to any quarrel, but Swift was certainly away from Temple for nearly a year and a half, from the spring of 1690 to the winter of 1691 Then he returned, and Temple soon after did him the important service of procuring for him, at the cost only of very brief residence, first an ad eundem B A at Oxford, and then the full M.A. degree from that university The actual gain as a qualification was something, to Swift the washing out of the speciali gratia must have been almost priceless He again left Temple in 1694, went to Ireland, took orders, and was presented to a small living at Kilroot, near Belfast, where he-it can hardly be said fell in love, but entered into a lind of courtship with a certain Miss Jane Waring—'Varina'—sister of a college friend of his The affair came to nothing-or indeed rather vorse than nothing—being broken off years afterwards by a letter from Swift which from anybody else would be a piece of sheer brutality, and which can only be excused as a document of his unique and in some respects morbid or maimed temperament. But he did not stay at this place (which was hopelessly dull and had no future in it) very long, and actually resigned the benefice a little while after he had again returned (May 1696) to Moor Park. Here he remained till Temple's death in January 1699 It is not certain whether his patron left him anything directly, but he entrusted him with the publication of his works, whence Swift derived a good deal of annoyance and perhaps a few hundred pounds of profit. Thus the death of Temple marks the end of the first stage in Swift's career It had been a long stage and a hard one, it had brought him little outward profit or inward pleasure, but it had 'made' him He had accu mulated much reading, and for the last ten years at least he had acquired even more knowledge of He had published practically nothing, and part of his time had been given up to the writing of pseudo-'Pindaric' odes, which had, according to legend, brought down upon him the fatal and never-forgiven judgment of Dryden - 'Cousin Swift, you will never be a [Pindaric] poet.' The word 'Pindaric' does not appear in all versions of the legend, but it suits the facts, it justifies the judgment, and, above all, it makes it more likely to have come from Dryden, who was never harsh to But Swift had before Temple's death the young written two things, though they were not published till later, which in degree of merit only three men then living-Dryden himself, Addison, and Popehad equalled or were to equal, and which in special kind none of them had rivalled or was to rival These were The Battle of the Books and A Tale of a Tub

How far these were known even in MS is a matter of guesswork, but we find with Swift (as with some, though not many, other men of letters) that a queer kind of general impression of his talents had got abroad long before he had any ostensible titles to urge. But patrons were still necessary, and not long after Temple's death Swift went back to Ireland with the Deputy Lord Berkeley as chaplain, and with definite hopes of clerical preferment as such He seems to have enjoyed himself-as his unsleeping and unyielding pride always enabled him to do after a fashion-inthe viceregal household, but he was jockeyed out of one benefice after another till he had to put up with a paltry group of small livings-Laracor the chief of them-which lay not very far from Dublin, and which brought him in some £200 a year. Before long Stella, who was in a small way an heiress through Sir William Temple's bequest, came over to Ireland with her companion, Mrs (i.e. Miss) Dingley She was continually in Swift's neighbourhood and society, though the most elaborate precautions were taken not merely toavoid scandal, but to make any ground for it impossible. For some years Swift oscillated between Ireland and England, belonging in a rather outside manner to the Whig party when in London, associating with its wits, especially Addison and Steele, and being patronised in a distant, unpractical way by its Mæcenates, Somers and Halifax. Whatever may be thought of his religious standpoint (and an impartial examination will find it very difficult to discover anything therein incompatible with at least eighteenth-century orthodoxy), his esprit de corps was undeniable, and he was enraged at finding that the more the Whigs succeeded in edging out their Tory colleagues from the coalition government with which Queen Anne started, the less were they disposed to doanything for the Church. In particular, a suit for the remission of the Irish first-fruits, with which Swift was semi-officially charged, was continually played with and evaded by the Whigs, especially Godolphin Meanwhile Harley, who was certainly a master of intrigue if not of statesmanship, and St John, whose brilliancy appealed to, and was

THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

N treating of the Eighteenth Century, or—to speak more exactly—of the Eighteenth Century in English Literature, the historian is confronted at the outset by a difficulty of definition

What is meant by the Eighteenth Century in English Literature? The natural (though possibly Bœotian) reply would be-from the end of the Seventeenth to the beginning of the Nine-But this ingenuous answer will not serve—especially with certain modern critics According to these, the literary Eighteenth Century cannot be confined within the limits indicated, but must rather be held to correspond with a different period of time, beginning earlier and ending earlier, and characterised throughout by specific features which distinguish it both from the period which precedes and the period which follows it. Some authorities date this period from the English Revolution of 1688, and close it with the French Revolution of 1789 Others with equal show of reason, go farther back, and commence at the Restoration. In a philosophical essay these divisions are defensible, and possibly useful, although they are always open to the commonplace objection that no great change in thought can be said to begin as invariably and inevitably as Grouse shooting or the Law Terms. And even if they should be scientifically accurate, they present insuperable objections to matter-of-fact people, mas much as-to name but one very intelligible drawback—they involve the assignment to the Eighteenth Century of events which took place before that century begins in the calendar Furthermore, they involve the assignment to the Nineteenth Century of other events which demonstrably happened in the Eigliteenth For these reasons—and notwithstanding the fact that the present volume, for convenience, includes a portion of an earlier period-we shall take leave, in this survey, to regard the Eighteenth Century in Literature as concurrent with the Eighteenth Century in Chronology-that is to say, as extending from the end of 1700 (the year in which Dryden died) to the end of the year 1800 (the year of the death of Cowper)

The period intended having been thus defined, it will be well to indicate the nature of its special gift to letters—such gift, for the moment, being understood to consist, not so much in the quality and amount of the thing produced, as in the disclosure of fresh methods or fishions of production actual work of the Eighteenth Century a sufficient report will be found in the biographics and extracts which follow, here, it is proposed to take note only of those new forms of literary expression which distinguish the age from those ages which went before That, on or about the date of the Restoration, a change began to be apparent both in the matter and manner of English Literature is admitted even by those who find its cause uncertain and its course obscure Of this change, in the last decades of the seventeenth century, Dryden is allowed to have been the chief exponent, in the first decades of the eighteenth century, it was maintained and developed under Pope and his contemporaries Broadly speaking, although its leaders were writers of verse, it consisted in the existence of a state of things which was more favourable to the perfecting of prose The spirit of a new criticism was abroad, tempering imagination and repressing enthin siasm, endeavouring after symmetry and uniformity, averse alil e from decoration and invention To be direct and clear, to be logical, to regard nght reason and plain sense, to be governed by the teaching of the Ancients (filtered through the medium of French criticism), became by degrees the unwritten code of the times Working prosaically, its chief gifts were in prose It gave us the first duly Newspaper, and, by the pen of Defoe and his humbler allies, an extraordinary and unprecedented development of Journalism, it gave us, by the pens of Addison and Steele, a form of Essay, which, differing as widely from the essay of Bacon as from the essay of Temple, set the model to its own day and to ours Under Richardson and Fielding it gave us what was practically the modern Novel, under Hume and Robertson and Gibbon, what was practi cally the modern History Finally, it gave us in its earlier years a Poetry of Convention unexampled in its mechanical accomplishment, which, while presenting many of the features of an age of Prose, was still Poetry, and which, exhausting itself after a career of exceptional vigour and brilliancy, left the soil prepared for the gradual but irresistible growth of a truer Poetry of Nature and Romance

Among these Eighteenth Century innovations, Journalism, which has lasted the longest, begins the first There had been newspapers, no doubt, in the preceding century, even as there were brave men before Agamemnon was the Public Intelligencer of L'Estrange, and the still-existent London Gazette, which dries from November 7, 1665, when Charles II was keeping Court at Oxford by reason of the There were the News I etters of ther and Dawl's (Steele's 'honest Ichabod') which had blank spaces left 'for any Gentleman, or others, to write their private Business to their Friends in the Country,' and both of which the great Mr Edmund Smith-one of Dr Johnson's poets, if you please—celebrated in Latin Sapplifics

But it was not until the first year of Anne's reign, and indeed but three days after king William died at Kensington, that the first duly paper made its modest appearance the Daily Courant, a little double-columned sheet fourteen mehes by eight printed on one side only, and excusing its exiginty (or lack of advertisements) by a limiseworthy desire to save the Public at least half the Impertinences of ordinary Net s l'apere? He news is exclusnely derived from the Paris George and the Haarlen and Amsterier General's, but speedily grea into flourishing life, being promptly followed by a crowd of rivals and mutators, Posts, Post-Boys, Pod ds, Observators, Registers, Mercinies, Medleys, British Apillos, Atheman Orecles, and the like, not all of which were, in the strict sense, journals. One of the most remarkable of these latter was the Receive of Daniel Desoe, a sheet of eight lastern ards four) small quarte pages, written in Newgate (where its author was confined), and, like the first Daily Courant, professing to be 'Purg'd from the Errors and Partiality of News Westers and Petty Statesmen, of all sides' The full title was A Review of the Affairs of France, but it was, in reality, a history of the domestic and foreign affairs of Europe, while in a section entitled Mercure Scandale or Advice from the Scandal ous Club, which began in the second number, its author professed to collect contemporary gossip As may be gathered from the descrip tion of Defoe's Review, a main feature of all these organs was their foreign intelligence, which, being easier to obtain than home news, naturally predominated Indeed, it is pretty plainly hinted by one who claims to belong to the 'ingenious Fraternity' of News-Writers, that when there was no news from Brussels or Lisbon to copy, it was manufactured ad hoc 'The Case of these Gentlemen is, I tlink, more hard than that of the Soldiers, considering that they have taken more Towns, and fought more They have been upon Parlies and Skirmishes, when our Armies have lain still, and given the General Assault to many a Place, when the Besiegers were quiet in their They have made us Masters of Trenches several strong Towns many weeks before our Generals could do it, and compleated Victories, when our greatest Captains have been glad to come off with a drawn Battle Where Prince Eugene has slain his Thousands. Boyer [of the Post-Boy] has slain his Ten Thousands. This Gentleman can indeed be never enough commended for his Courage and Intrepidity during this whole War laid about him with an inexpressible Fury, and, like the offended Marius of ancient Rome, made such Havock among his Countrymen, as must be the Work of two or three Ages to It must be confessed, the Redoubted Mr Buckley [of the Daily Courant] has shed as much Blood as the former, but I cannot forbear saying, (and I hope it will not look like Envy) that we regard our Brother Buckley as a kind of Drawcansir, who spares neither Friend or Foe, but generally kills as many of his own Side as the Enemy's'

Whether this passage, with its distinction of phrasing and its delicate irony, revealed to any of its readers the fact that a new force had arisen in English Literature, is not recorded length as an extract, and its appearance here, may be justified by the explanation that it is quoted word for word from No 18 of the Tatler for Saturday, May 21, 1709, and, with its context, constitutes the first acknowledged contribution of Joseph Addison to the recently-established paper of his inventive friend and schoolmate Richard Steele over, it may even claim to be the first example of another gift of the Eighteenth Century to English Letters When, five or six weeks earlier, Captain Steele, casting about for some literary project to combine the Latest Foreign News (of which, as Queen Anne's Gazetteer, he had a certain monopoly) with the Latest Gossip of the Coffee-Houses, had hit upon the idea of a little tri-weekly sheet about the size of the Courant, which should be rather more critical and literary than the hand-to-mouth productions of your Boyers and Buckleys-he had builded better than he He was himself a clever man, with a warm heart and a ready pen, and his 'Letter of Intelligence,' even before its eighteenth number had been reached, fully deserved the credit of a fresh departure. But it was not until Addison became, as he did eventually, a regular contributor, that Steele's new enterprise grew to include a new form of writing. It was when the scholarly Secretary to Lord Wharton commenced to print in it the delightful La Bruvère-like studies of Tom Folio and Ned Softly and the Political Upholsterer, the Adventures of a Shilling, and the Rabelaisian Frozen Voices, that a new thing began to be born which was the Essay of Addison and Steele. finished and careful papers of Addison reacted upon those of his editor, whom they stimulated to a higher ambition, as well as to an elegance, a purity, and a correctness (the words are Steele's own) which, when he set out to 'observe upon the Manners of the Pleasurable, as well as the Busie Part of Mankind,' in addition to giving the ordinary Occurrences of common Journals of News,' had not formed part of his original Presently he himself went on to rival his friend upon his own ground, and, always a pioneer, to anticipate by some charming domestic scenes, of which he possessed the secret, the function of the Novel that was coming the Spectator, which followed the Tatler as a daily issue, the evolution of the Essay continued In his graver Saturday papers Addison began to preach those admirable lay-sermons that justify Mandeville in calling him 'a parson in a tyewig,' and in his occasional discourses on Wit, Imagination, Milton, the Old Ballads, and so forth, to apply, in critical form, the results of those earlier studies of the classics and the French critics in which he had been serving an unsuspected apprenticeship to letters too, digressed successfully in that Christian-Hero vein of his days at the Tower Guard, producing, with a gravity which was perfectly genuine and sincere, numerous disquisitions upon Death, Devotion, Benevolence, Solitude, and Ambition, and exhibiting, but more rarely, his admirable gift as an impressionist critic of Art and the Stage Finally, in endless sketches of contemporary manners and individual types, and particularly in the unrivalled Coverley series-which again foreshadows the coming fiction-the two friends contrived, with denghaful good h mour to rally, indicule, and The partnership was conns, act ther age tinued to the conclusion of a third paper, the Granden, when it ceased But by this date (October 1713) the Essay, as a branch of that 'ingenious va. of Miscellaneous Writing' upon the introlucer of which Lord Shaftesbury involes from a benediction, had found its special form a form admirably adapted for short smaller flights of criticism, for humor tus character-drawing, and for social satire It was produced, after Addison and Steele, by many inferior hands,' but, for the present ve may leave it until it was revived with a personal note and renewed ability, under the pens of Goldsmith and Johnson

In the first years of Queen Anne, a hush seems to lave fallen upon the poets, and, save for a rumbling cpic or so by Blackmore, and a worthless miscellany by Wycherley, the Muses might have been in calle with the Stuarts. Addson, indeed, put forth his over-praised Campaign Prior, too, was forced by piracy into a premature appearance, but his full dress revelation was not made until Anne had been for four years indubitably dead. Oddly chough, it is with the Spatator that is connected the first notable effort of that superlative artificur v ho, for more than three decades to come, held the first place in English verse, and influenced its voice for a longer period still lov ards the end of 1711, Addison reviewed. and certainly not, on this occasion, with 'faint pruse' what he termed 'a Master piece in its kind' It is the work of a youth of twenty, named Alexander Pope, and aimed at occupying, in English, much the same ground as the Ars P ctica of Horace, or perhaps—to speak more precisely—the Art Peetique of Boileau, with this difference, that while Horace and the I reach critic kept their precepts for their maturity, their Inglish imitator, when he proceeded a metrical legislator, was only just out of his teens. Naturally enough, Pope's work was a arto, but it was a cento of extraordinary ingenuity, and Mr Spectator from his full hottome I vig, might justifiably nod Olympian approval of the skill with which the youthful pairs coupled a cree made to exemplify the c to viney condemned. The lines-certainly, as Addison admits, 'would have been very much admired in an Ancient Poet -praise which fully justified Mr Pope in offering to Steele's periodical his next performance, the 'sacred Eclogue' entitled The Messiah (Spectator, No 378), which he had modelled upon Virgil's Pollio Much of his subsequent work, of which it is not here the place to speak, was of this imitated or adapted But the precocious Essay on Criticism must have made it abundantly clear to every reader of intelligence that its author had already entered the arena fully armed as a metrist, and needed nothing but a theme to his hand During his long literary activity, he was fortunate enough, on more than one occasion, to find such a theme He found it in the flawless jewel-work of the Rape of the Lock, he found it in the terrible Epic of the Dunces, he found it, unanswerably and triumphantly, in the Moral Essays and the Satires and Epistles Lastly, with leave of all the Bentleys, alive or dead, he found it in that paraphrase of Homer, which has stimulated more Homer-lovers than the critics would care to count It may be true that his version is 'a pretty poem, but must not be called Homer,' it may be true that it is-half pretence, Where Wits, not Heroes, prove their Skill in Fence, And great Achilles' Eloquence doth show As if no Centaur trained him, but Boileau!—

but it is, at least, a magnificent performance, which, as one of Pope's own rivals, Professor Conington, has admitted, by the 'calm, majestic flow ' of its language, carries on its readers 'as irresistibly as Homer's own could do, were they born readers of Greek,' and fills their minds 'with a conception of the heroic age, not indeed strictly true, but almost as near the truth as that which was entertained by Virgil hunself' It was in this prolonged and tedious task that Pope perfected the heroic couplet which he had caught from Dryden, and which is his cluef present to his own time, and to Like Johnson, he has suffered from the public impatience begotten of imitators who only copied his defects, and it may perhaps be granted, even by a devotee, that his style, like the style of Macaulay, grows wearisome if taken in immoderate doses. But it is easy to scleet, from the Epistle to Arbuthnot alone, dozens of passages which, in spite of the apparently mechanic art of the metre, it would be difficult to better, either for conciseness, or directness, or curious felicity of phrase. Much of Pope's work is but a rhythmical exemplification of Addison's dictum (after Boileau) in the review of the Essay on Criticism, 'that Wit and Fine Writing doth not consist so much in advancing Things that are new, as in giving Things that are known an agreeable Turn'-in other words, it is concerned less with the revelation of the unattempted or the unimagined in emotion, than with the expression, in a given form of verse, and with faultless perspicuity and finish, of the ordinary ideas in circulation at But this studiously-controlled amthe time bition by no means precluded the production of very noble and dignified utterances, as the Epistle to Arbuthnot—to take that example again-will readily testify Indeed, it is difficult to read the elosing paragraphs, or the splendid lines beginning, 'Not Fortune's Worshipper, nor Fishion's Fool' (quoted below at page 189), without wondering upon what ground it can ever have been debated whether Pope was really a poet.

From Young to Cowper, the heroic couplet on the Pope model remained the recognised metre of the century, and, as might be expected, it was largely employed for the social satire in which he had won his greenest laurels. Among his contemporaries were more than one poet who, without being exactly imitative, certainly showed signs of subjection to the trick of the time Prior, who was Pope's senior, and a better scholar, followed the fashion of adaptation by versifying Evodus and Ecclesiastes, and by clothing in a straitlaced and high heeled Queen Anne costume the fine old Not-Browne Maid But his services to poetry were happily not limited to this In his 'loose and liasty scribble' of Alma and in his Tales in the French manner, he added flexibility to the cramp Hudibrastics of Butler, his genuine Horatian note give gaiety and grace to a dozen minor pieces, he reproduced in Down Hall and the Thief and the Cordelier with marked ability the anapestic ballad measure of the King and the Abbot of Canterbury, and he stands in the front rank of English epigram initists Moreover, in the lines To a Child of Quality, he set the tune of that half gry, halfgrave familiar verse which, in this country-despite the depressing definition of M. Littre—we are content to class as ters de seade of Pope's contemporaries was Gay, a more sedulous disciple of his illustrious friend, but who, nevertheless, besides some pretty songs that sing, contrived to enrich his age with the long-popular Ballad-opera, and to equip it with a form of Fable which, while it fell short of the supreme art of La Fontaine, was still a convenient, workable vehicle Nor must it be forgotten that, in Mr Pope's Welcome from Greece (1 e from translating the Iliad), he anticipated and employed, with unexpected success, the ottava rima of Ariosto afterwards made popular by Frere and by Byron's Beppe Who, for example, would imagine that the following octave, with its note of modernity, comes from the pen of the author of Trivia and the Shepherd's Weck I—

I see two lovely sisters, hand in hand,
The fair haired Martha and Teresa brown,
Madge Bellenden, the tallest of the land,
And smiling Mary, soft and fair as down.
Yonder I see the chearful Duchess stand,
For friendship, zeal, and blithsome humours known Whence that loud shout in such a hearty strain?
Why, all the Hamiltons are in her train

Of the remaining Pope group (not school), none gave any new thing to English verse-craft, and their achievements may be left to the separate accounts which follow Pope survived them all save Swift, and Swift's last years were deathing life.

It was with the Essay of Addison and Steele that-more for the sake of continuity than of logic-we endeavoured to link the early poetry But the connection of the first apof Pope pearances of modern prose fiction with a paper in the Englishman stands less in need of In December 1713 Steele gave an rpology account from his own knowledge of a certain morose Alexander Selkirk or Selcraig of Largo, who had lived for more than four years alone in the island of Juin Fernandez. cases, both real and feigned, were not unknown Witness, as an instance of the former, Dampier's record of the Mosquito Indian whom Watling had left belind on the same island in But there is small doubt that to the story of Selkirk, as told by Steele, Captain Woodes Rogers, and others, Daniel Defoe, already referred to as the writer of the Review of the Affairs of France, was indebted for the germ of the remarkable book which he issued in April 1719, with the title of the Life and Strange Surprising Adventures of Robinson Crusee In 1719 Defoe was in his sixtieth year had been many things—journalist, pamphieteer, pol tierl agent, traveller, tradesman, brickmaker projector and prisoner in Newgrie. He had an inchausable store of miscellaneous reading, he delighted especially in travels and adventures, he had extraordinary aptitude for minute and reliste detail, he had an indefatigable For all these gifts the expen-I "bit of the pen ences of Sell it, as developed in Robinson Crusoc, if a-ded a favourable field, while its very limitations and restrictions tended to control and concentrate his 'thick-coming fancies' More over, it is supposed that certain affinities-of and too much may easily be made, but thich he certainly desired should be recognised -- because the circumstances of his imagined custainly and his own solitary and self-reliant career, gave a subjective note to his work, which, save in the Farther Adventures and the Seri us Reflections of Robinson Crusoc, it does not attain elsewhere. It is certainly not equally perceptible in Colonel Jack, Moll Flanders, Revara, and the rest of the fictitious narratives that followed his admitted masterpiece, books which are nevertheless characterised by the some exactitude of trivial particulars, the same intentional negligences and repetitions, the same homely, pedestran, and even flat phraseology For the most part, they are chronicles of such carcers 15, in real life, would have fallen to the recording pun of the Ordinary of Newgate, from whose historiographic efforts they differ mainly by their greater variety of incident, their pracused peneralit, and their faculty (in their writer's on n words) 'of forging a story' In this last att Defoe is unrivalled. By the mental stenogruphy and systematic stocktaking of a lifetime, he had accumulated so vast a reserve of facts and illustrations that, in the absence of anything to 'report,' in journalistic phrase, he could concort a report of such astounding verisimilitude that to tais day it remains debatable whether som of his performances are true, or partly true, or not true at all, in the sense that the escuts which they profess to narrate were never combied in the experences of one and the fruhi, but outer

From the fact that Hogarth makes Mell I'velers the chosen literature of his 'Idle Apprenture' it may be presumed that many of all Larah calls the 'secondary' fictions of Deloc, though professedly district in their intention, were directed at readers not more in thousaltan the apple oman whom Borrow's Lace was Landon Padge. But there were other reasons why they might be expected to appeal to the people more than to the cultivated classes It was Defoe's boast that his tales were true historics, always an additional attraction to the humbler reader, and that, being true, they had no connection with such novels and romances as then existed It was not with the Oroonoko of the warm-blooded Aphra Behn, or the Cassandra of the sempiternal Sieur de la Calprenade, that he wished them to be compared his fitter analogue in unrelieved veracity, had he sought for it, would have been more easily found in Bunyan's sombre and relentless Life and Death of Mr Badman But if, in addition to his singular gift of 'lying like truth,' he had combined with his work any appreciable plot to be unravelled or problem to be solved, if he had included any material admixture of passion, or any delineation of the domestic life of his day, he might fairly have claimed—what is some times claimed for him-to rank as the Father of the English Novel These things, however, His invented biographies of he did not do rogues and pirates and bona robas differ from those which are not invented only in being fictitions as wholes, and they no more entitle their author to priority in fiction as we now understand it than if he had been the author of the wonderful book—not a little indebted to his own Robinson Crusoe-which seventeen years later was given to the world by the maimed and melancholy genius of Jonathan Swift. Gulliver's Travels, that unique and unclassable masterpiece, must be left for treatment in the special pages on Swift that follow In tracing the history of the Novel, it is nevertheless impossible not to refer to it, if only on account of the circumstantiality in fiction in which Swift rivals Defoe, but it has little or nothing to do with the development of the

That development came suddenly and unexpectedly, nine years after Defoe had been laid to rest in the Dissenters' burial ground at Bunlull Fields. And it came from a most unhopeful source It would have been as easy to predict that a middle aged printer should become the author of Pamela as that a sexagenarian journalist should sit down and write Robinson Crusoc There are indeed certain superficial resemblances between Richardson and Defoe Both belonged to the lower middle classes, both posed as morthsts both wrote the English of common speech, both were circumstantial in manner and copious in style. But there the likeness ends If Defoe gives little evidence of constructive intention. Richardson. on the contrary (at his best), works steadily to a foregone conclusion, if Defoe cares nothing for the affections, Richardson, on his side, is intensely preoccupied with them, if Defoe escheus sentiment and tearful emotion, Richardson revels in both, and cries as he writes The one discovered an uninhabited island, the other the very-much inhabited female heart, and, as far as the modern novel is concerned, the latter is the more notable achievement. With his wonderfully sympathetic insight into feminine character, Richardson's success might have been more signal if the accidents of his early habits had not led him to conduct his tale by correspondence His biographer, Mrs Barbauld, holding an honest brief for her author, contends that this is the 'most natural' way, which is arguable, but she is also constrained to admit that it is the 'least probable,' which can scarcely be denied, above all in our day, when letter-writing no longer flourishes That, notwithstanding his insupportable vehicle -for Clarissa and Sir Charles Grandison, his remaining novels, are on the same plan as Paniela-Richardson was able to enchain his public, must be attributed partly to the fact that its appetites were more unjaded and less impatient than ours, and partly to the extraordinary manner in which the writer's prolix but cumulative minuteness insensibly and irresistibly compels and subjugates the student who fairly adventures upon the text. But it may safely be affirmed that if no better model of fiction had been found than what Fielding calls the 'epistolary Style,' the early Novel, in spite of its psychology, must have perished speedily of its own perverted method

With Fielding's Joseph Andrews, however, the new form quitted the confined (and slightly stuffy) atmosphere of Richardson's cedar-parlour for the open air and the cheery bustle of the Georgian high-road. The range of Richardson's characters is not great, and in his last two novels he scarcely travels beyond the personages But Fielding makes his draft of genteel comedy upon Human Nature at large, and crowds his stage with men and women of all sorts and conditions, inclining by choice to the middle and lower classes rather than to 'the highest Life,' which he considers to present 'very little Humour or Entertainment.' With the precise connection of Pamela and Joseph Andrews it is not necessary to deal here, as it is sufficiently discussed hereafter But, apart from mental analysis, the difference between Richardson and Fielding is practically the difference between Richardson and the modern Novel. Few now write novels in Richardson's fashion But even to-day many books bear manifest traces of the form that Fielding gave to Tom Jones and Amelia In the first place, he tells his story directly, in his own person, instead of letting his hero tell it, or allowing his characters to unrayel themselves in letters He pays minute attention to the construction and evolution of his plot, carefully excluding characters and episodes which do not advance the fable or contribute to the end to be attained Rejecting Sensibility, which he regards as more or less unmanly, he substitutes for it Humour and Irony, in the latter of which attributes he is as great a master as Swift his character-drawing he puts forth his full Without much parade of psychology, he manages to make his dramatis persona extraordinarily real and vivid, placing them before us in their habit as they lived, and with their Finally, while painting fitting accessories Humanity as he finds it, by no means comnosed of 'Models of Perfection,' but rather of very frail and fallible personalities, he is careful—no doubt with perfect sincerity—to proclaim a moral purpose The main objects of his satire, he declares, are Vanity and Hypocrisy It is his intention to exhibit Vice as detestable, and never successful It is his 'sincere endeavour,' he affirms in the Dedication of Tom Jones, 'to recommend Goodness and Innocence,' and to promote the cause of religion and virtue Perhaps, in these more decorous days, it is sometimes difficult to see that he has rigorously adhered to his principles, but, in any case, when fair allowance is made for altered times and manners, his programme differs but little, in plan and purpose, from the plan and purpose of the modern There are, indeed, but two characteristics in which he has not always been imitated by later practitioners of the art. In the first place, he writes, in general, most excellent, unlaboured English-simple and clear and strong—the English of a gentleman and a scholar Secondly, it is his peculiarity introduce each fresh division of his book by an initial chapter (probably suggested by the Chorus of Greek drama), in which, in his own person, lie gossips pleasantly about his method and his characters To his admirers these pro legomena, one of which is printed at page 345, are the most delightful part of his work. But they are practically confined to Tom Jones, as they are only partially employed in Joseph Andrews, and in Amelia not at all

Fielding more than once refers to the pains he had taken in composing these prefatory ehapters Lile Richardson, he professed also to foresee that he was maugurating a 'new Province of Writing,' and it must be admitted that he has no real rival in his own line until the days But he had more than onc of Waverley contemporary of genius Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, indeed, thought, upon its first anony mous appearance, that Smollett's Roderick Random was written by her clever kinsman-a supposition which proves her ladyship to have been a better judge of ment than of style would be hard to compare, say, the visit to Parson Trulliber (see p 342) with any page of Roderick Random and ful to see that they are But Smollett's three best from different pens novels abound with incident and character, however grotesque, and he deserves the credit of being the first, since Congreve, to depict the British seaman, a task for which his own experiences as a ship's surgeon in the Carthagena expedition had given him exceptional facilities In Humphry Clinker, too, he contrived to write a novel in letters which (without any appreci able plot) is amusing from beginning to end, but then he cleverly avoids the tedium of the plan by never having his epistles answered His method in fiction, however, is the method of Le Sage, and so far retrograde, but his racy, if reckless, genius has given him many Sterne, again, with his two great successors books, would add distinction to any epoch But the Sternesque humour stands by itself, defying the imitator and the disciple alike. He is alone, and he has no school. 'My Uncle Toby' and Yorick, Mr Shandy and Corporal Trim, have passed into the national 'study of imagination,' but the genius of the author, vacillating between tears and laughter, between sentiment and sheer polissonnerie, between method and madness (the word must out), is too unique and several a thing to influence the production of any writer not correspondingly endowed by nature To write a Tristram Shandy or a Sentimental Journey there is no way but to be Sterne, and Sternes are not turned out in bakers' batches Of other novels of the period which owe their existence to the fashion set by Fielding and Richardson, although they are too strongly marked by their writers' individuality to resemble them, are Goldsmith's Vicar of Hakefield and Johnson's But Johnson's Rasselas is scarcely a Rasselas novel at all, it is in expinded Rambler, without scheme or beginning, and derives its import munily from its magisterial manner, and its resigned and lugubrious philosophy of life. Goldsmith's exquisite little story has this peculiarity—it is at once both local and cosmopolitan Dr Prinirose and his family are English types, but at the same time they belong so completely to humanity at large that they can be transferred to any other country without sense of meongruity-that is, to any country where there is a recognised Church and the family is an established institution In the matter of plot the Vicar of Wakefield can scarcely be said to be constructed at all Neither Goldsmith nor Johnson, therefore, any more than Sterne or Smollett, contributed greatly to the evolution of the Novel-form, and in this con nection, the Lieling and Cailia of Mime D'Arblay, which did introduce variations in the matter of social portraiture - variations important enough to make their writer the admitted precursor of Jane Austen-must be held to lie more properly within the scope of the present summary

But if to found a school be the surest test of novelty, such a trumph must certainly be conceded to Horice Wilpole's Castle of In 1764 that accomplished virtuoso, after a prolonged flirtation with the painted windows and plaster battlements of Strawberry Hill, dreamed that, on the uppermost bannister of a great staircase, he saw a gigantic hand in armour, and straightway fell to seribble a story on the subject. He began (and ended) without a plan, but discovered (in his second edition) that he had combined the old supernatural agencies of Seudéry and the rest with the new personages of Tom Jones and real life, and, in other words, had invented Gothic romance 'The actions, sentiments, conversations, of the heroes and heroines of ancient days,' he declared, 'were as unratural as the machines employed to put them in motion' He would make his heroes and heroines natural m all these things, borrowing only from the elder school some of the imagination, invention, and fancy which, in the literal reproduction of life, he thought too much neglected blend proved a popular one To the Castle of Otranto, with its sighing portraits, and cowled skeletons, and monstrous helmets. followed, a few years later, the Old English Baron of Miss Clara Reeve, who made her marvels slightly more credible, an innovation which Walpole, perhaps not unnaturally, regarded as insipid. After Miss Reeve came the greater Mrs Radcliffe, and the closing century 'supp'd full with horrors' Clanging portals, echoing corridors, hollow voices, haunted chambers, moth-eaten manuscripts, and daggers that dripped blood became the order of the day To make the Gothic compound more heady, the tear of sensibility was freely mingled with the goblet, and the sophisticated draught held the drugged public captive until the secret was explained, generally-and in this Mrs Radcliffe, too, differed from Walpole-by simple and natural causes A quiet home-keeping lady, who described Switzerland and Italy without visiting those countries. Ann Radcliffe must have possessed considerable powers of imagination, and certainly moves a terror skilfully. The influence of The Italian and The Mysteries of Udolpho is to be traced in Lewis, Maturin, and others. and even in the great Wizard of the North himself As might be anticipated. Gothic romance did not escape the satirist. It was broadly burlesqued in the Heroine of E S Barrett, and, with a finer touch, in the admirable Northanger Abbey of Jane Austen. which, although not published until 1818, had been actually written very soon after the first appearance of The Italian

The Novel, as the chief gift of the Eighteenth Century to English letters, has, of necessity, occupied exceptional space, and, for its further modification under the pens of Holcroft and Godwin, Henry Mackenzie and Moore, the reader must be referred to the different accounts of those writers We may now turn to another development of the plainsailing, prosaic spirit, which, through all its permutations, remains the leading characteristic of the epoch Hitherto History in England had been little but chronicle and compilation, uncritical and unscientific. In the Eighteenth Century, however, there arose three writers who raised it at once to a definite art. The first of these, in point of time, was Hume. For research, as we understand it now, he cared but little But he gave to his History of England the charm of a sequent narrative and an effortless style which was as pleasant to read as a fairy tale After Hume comes Robertson with histories of Scotland, of Charles V. of America, a writer whose style was almost equal to that of his predecessor, and whose standard of investigation was somewhat higher But both Hume and Robertson are only pioneers of the greater Gibbon The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, with its majestic march, its splendid sonority, and its sustained accomplishment, rises far beyond the flight of either, and perhaps even now constitutes the greatest gift of Clio to our literature inquiry, insight, breadth of view, and minuteness of detail are all united in this twenty years' labour It was a new thing when it appeared, it is a new thing still and it is not easy to conceive that a labour so concentrated and so continuous, so sustained and so single-minded, can fail of length of days

From the history of a people to the history of one person, whether recounted by himself or by another, the transition is easy. That the Eighteentli Century can claim to have originated any particular form of Biography or Autobiography, in the sense that it can claim to have originated the modern Novel or the modern Essay, would be too much to contend But that, in an age of prose, piographies and memoirs should abound is not surprising, and, from Anne onwards, they were not to seek There were short biographies such as Goldsmith's Nash and Johnson's Savage,—to say nothing of the admirable Lives of the Poets. there were lengthy biographies such as Hawkesworth's Swift and Hawkins's Johnson, there were respectable and academic performances such as Middleton's Cicero, Carte's Oi monde, Lyttelton's Henry II, and Harte's ill fated Gustavus Adolphus, there were also personal records as dissimilar as Cibber's Apology and Hume's account of My Own Life But in the last decade of the century appeared two works, each of which, in its special kind, remains unrivalled One is Gibbon's Autobiography, as compiled by his friend Lord Sheffield from the different sketches left by the historian, and since (1896) separately published The version which has been so long familiar will, however, probably retain its charm, in spite of the editing to which it now appears to have been subjected, and what its writer calls 'the review of his moral and literary character,' although incomplete, must survive many memoirs that are professedly finished from headline to imprint. Nothing can be more interesting than Gibbon's account of the circumstances which moulded his career and determined the course and progress of his magnum opus The other work referred to, which preceded the Autobiography by a few years, is Boswell's Life of Johnson, which also remains typical in its class, since it is the highest praise of any new biography to bring it within measurable distance of Boswell's book Let it may be doubted whether, except under analogous conditions in regard to author and subject, its success could ever be exactly re peated The peculiar relations of biographer and biographee, the strongly-marked individuality of Johnson and the extraordinary quality of his conversation, the mimetic faculty which enabled Boswell, given the heads or minutes of an interview, to reproduce that interview with a fidelity more characteristic than shorthand. just as selective Art is more convincing than the camera-all these things, combined with a patience, an enthusiasm, and a devotion that no obstacle could daunt, produced a result which, seeing that it is impracticable to reproduce it without similar advantages, must always remain sur generis

In an age favourable to prose, and withal exceptionally leisured and unhurried, it is not surprising that what was somewhat poinpously described as Epistolary Correspondence should be found to flourish And, as a fact, the development of Letter Writing is one of the munifest features of the period Not only Maids of Honour who could spell, to vary Swift's jibe,-but Maids of Honour who could not, resorted freely to this means of communication, and before Swift was an old man he recorded a considerable advance. 'The ladies in general,' he told Mrs Delany, were 'extremely mended both in writing and reading since he was young,' and he goes on to speak of a noman of quality, formerly his correspondent, who 'scrawled and spelt like a Wapping Hardly a month now passes by wench? without some testimony in the shape of Diary or Miscellaneous Correspondence (the recent Francis Letters are an excellent case in point) to the activity with which our ancestors plied their pens under Anne and the Georges -an activity which modern appliances and modern manners have long since diverted into different channels And if the Old-World in general was given to letter writing, literary men and women were also given Swift himself, in the diary to Esther Johnson, commonly known as the Journal to Stella, has left a series of utterances which remain, and must remain, unapproached as examples of the chronique intime has a goodly budget of epistles, but they are, in general, too artificial, and too obviously arranged for the public eye, to serve as models Goldsmith's legacy, on the other hand, is too slender, since the few examples which have been preserved have all the simple charm and Steele, Gray, Johnfluency of his other work son, Sterne, Burke, Gibbon, and many minor authors, all wrote volumnously-the letters of Gray and Sterne especially being hall-marked with their particular idiosyncrasies epistolary reputation clings chiefly to one or two authors, who, like Madame de Sevigne, either did nothing but write letters, or at all events did that best. One of the first of these is Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, whose dispatches from abroad reveal not only her own shrend impressions of travel, but her absolutely honest and unvarnished views of contemporary society and literature as she knew them Another who is best remembered by his letters The curious strand of is Lord Chesterfield moral insensibility which runs through them has seriously prejudiced their other merits, for, apart from this, and the fact that their main doctrine is the converse of Esse quam videri, they are everywhere packed with a very varied criticism of life, and a close, if cynical, observation of human nature After these, and ranging over sixty years of the century, comes the correspondence of Horace Walpole. Chesterfield dictates the conduct of life, Walpole exhibits the practice of it. Never was there a witter, a more vivacious, a more amusing, a more original chronicler, never (as Thackera) says) 'such a brilliant, jigging, smirking Vanity-Fair as that through which he leads us' Lastly must be mentioned the admirable, and in some respects more admirable, letters of Cowper, the most natural, most unfeigned, most easy of English letter-writers art of shedding a sedate playfulness over the least promising themes, in magnifying occurrences of his 'set gray life' into incidents worthy of record, in communicating to his page all the variations of mood that sweep across him as he writes, he has no equal these qualities will doubtless be treated at large hereafter, and it is time to turn once more to the poets

It was in the year 1764—the year when Walpole wrote the Castle of Otranto—that

Gibbon had planned his Decline and Fall, and it was not until 1788 that the last three of its eight volumes made their appearance time Pope had been dead for more than four-His influence was still felt, and forty years and continued to be felt, but it was an influence that was gradually expending itself, while, side by side with it, other influences were gathering 'strength and volume. Slowly and almost imperceptibly at first, men were beginning to discard the gradus-epithet and the formal phrase, to substitute blank verse for the machine-made heroic couplet, to exercise themselves tentatively in older and long-neglected stanzaic forms, to write Odes and Elegies and Sonnets, and above all to exhibit an enfranchised proclivity towards romantic expression and the imitation of nature That this was done systematically or all at once is not to be advanced But that it existed is manifest from the attitude of such of those conservatives in poetry as still clung to the practice and teaching of Pope Goldsmith's first book, the Enquiry into the Present State of Polite Learning in Europe, he is found condemning blank verse as a 'disagreeable instance of pedantry,' and as a measure which 'nothing but the greatest sublimity of subject can render pleasing' In the Dedication to the Traveller, he returns to the The art of poetry, he says, is in danger from 'the mistaken efforts of the learned to improve it.' 'What criticisms have we not heard of late in favour of blank verse, and Pindaric odes, choruses, anapests, and iambics, alliterative care and happy negligence 1' Elsewhere he falls foul of the fashion set by Gray's Elegy, which he regarded as 'overloaded with epithet,' and seriously proposed to amend by 'leaving out an idle word in every line,' while of Pope he writes that he 'carried the language to its highest perfection, and those who have attempted still further to improve it, instead of ornament, have only caught finery' These last lines were written in 1764, and it is clear that, in the opinion of the author of the Traveller, which appeared in the same year, a considerable change had already come over the spirit of English poetry since Pope's

The change, in reality, had begun before that date, with the solemn-paced blank verse—then second only to that of Milton—and with the accurate nature painting of Thomson's Seasons, and his revival in the Castle of Indolcace of the Spenserian Stanza. After Thomson comes

Young, who, beginning as a Popesque satirist, proceeded, long after middle age, as the unrhyming author of those sombre and declamatory Night Thoughts which at once reflected and dominated the brooding unrest of the age. To Thomson followed the 'oaten stop' and 'pastoral song' of Collins, whose Persian Eclogues and Odes, with their clear-toned and varied music, brought new harmonies into English metre-harmonies which were farther elaborated by the patient art of Gray's undving Elegy and his wonderful Pindaric Odes These-since the lesser names may be here omitted—were, save for the spasmodic outbreak of post-Popian satire in the hectoring couplets of Churchill's Rosciad, the dominant influences in English poetry until the date of Goldsmith's Traveller, which (like his later Deserted Village) was in the old manner, reflected through a medium more modern than its author imagined Then, stirring men's minds with portentous cloud-form and shadowy suggestion, came the mysterious utterances of Macpherson's Ossian, to be succeeded by those Reliques of Percy, which opened to English poetry so much of unlessoned art and primitive simplicity, by the mediæval forgeries of Chatterton, and by the revelation, in Warton's History, of the neglected riches hidden in the barbaric and half-lit past which lay behind All these things, with their searchings and unveilings, were 'prologue to the omen coming on,' and 'harbingers preceding still the fates' of that splendid advent, with the approach ing century, of the new-risen spirit of Romance There were still writers, the Whiteheads and Hayleys and Sewards and Darwins, who clung feebly and meffectually to the passing classic fashion, but of those who fill worthily the space between the epoch-making Ossian of 1763 and the still more epoch-making Lyrical Ballads of 1798, the greatest names are Cowper and Burns and Crabbe and Blake The first two belonged to the Eighteenth Century as defined at the outset of this paper, the last two far outlived it. Owing nothing to each other, distinct in gifts and speech, and having only in common their poetical sincerity, it is sufficient to say of them here that Cowper and Crabbe, more or less, but in a manner coloured strongly by an altered environment, preserved the old tradition, while Blake and Burns are too original and individual to be discussed except with that larger treatment which they will hereafter receive in this volume. But those who wish to estimate the immense distance between 1700 and 1800, measured poetically, will do well to contrast a passage of the Essay on Criticism with such a lyric as Robert Burns's 'O, my luve's like a red, red rose,' or the 'Tiger, Tiger burning bright' of William Blake

Turning to the Drama of the time, it must be confessed that the field is not a rich one, either for crop or diversity of product When Anne came to the throne, the Comic Dramatists of the Restoration, as Macaulay styles them, were reduced to two Wycherley had ceased to write for the stage, Congreve's last play, The Way of the World, had been played, and Vanbrugh and Farguliar were the only members of the group who were still in practice as play For many years to come their succes sors were only minor artists Steele, in two or three average comedies, endeavoured honestly to purify the theatre in the sense of the precepts of Teremy Collier, while Lillo, in George Barmvell and the Fatal Curiosity, seemed to promise a something which was not afterwards performed. Fielding maintained the Congreve tradition in its indecency only, and Cibber, Garrick, Macklin, Murphy, the elder Colman, Hoadly, Foote, and a number of lesser writers, purveyed the acted but now unreadable comedies and farces of the day. The chief novelties in stage composition which the Eighteenth Century contributed to dramatic art were the alreadymentioned Ballad opera of Gay and his imitators, and the semi-serious genre, which based upon the comédie larmoyante of Voltaire and Diderot in France, became, for a brief season, the Sentimental Comedy of England latter, which has been not inaptly described as a 'mulish production, with all the defects of its opposite parents, and marked with sterility,' professed to deal with the virtues and distresses of private life rather than with the vices and faults which had hitherto been regarded as the legitimate quarry of the Comic Muse Cumberland's West Indian and Kelly's False Delicacy are the most successful examples in this short-lived kind. Then, as a protest against the Comedy of Tears, and in avowed imitation of 'the poets of the last age,' Goldsmith endeavoured to lead the public taste once more back to Nature and Humour He followed up his Good Natur'd Man by his inimitable She Stoops to Conquer, to whose perennial qualities in vis comica, dialogue, plot, and character its stage popularity even to this hour abundantly testifies His only competitor is Sheridan, whose three best plays, The Rivals, The School for Scandal, and The Critic, by their unflagging wit and brilliancy, reach a point of excellence which has never since been attained

For nearly forty years after the Guardian of 1713, at which date we interrupted our account of the Essay, no successor of any importance assumed the mantle of Addison and Steele Imitators there were in plenty, but, with the exception of the Champion of Fielding, more memorable by its author than its matter, none deserves a record until we reach the Rambler and Idler of Johnson But even the Rambler and Idler, vigorous and weighty as is their writer's style, follow the Oueen Anne model 'as a pack horse would do a hunter'-to use Lady Mary's illustration, and the same must be said of the Adventurer of Johnson's disciple, Hawkesworth In the World and the Connoisseur, where the touch was lighter, and the pens those of wits like Walpole and Cliesterfield, the Essay regained a certain buoyancy and verze But the high water mark of the midcentury examples in this species of writing is reached by Goldsmith's Citisen of the World, which, in its first form, appeared in the columns of Newbery's Public Ledger this, there is nothing which deserves serious The mention of the Public Ledger, however, serves to remind us once more of the extraordinary increase which, in spite of prohibitive stamp duties and other stacles, had taken place in the periodical press since the first establishment of the Daily Courant in 1702 In 1756 began the London Chronicle, that-folio of four pages, happy work, Which not e'en critics criticise—

and for which Johnson wrote the 'Introduction' (at about twopence a line), in 1760 the Public Ledger In 1772 followed the Morning Post, in 1788, the Times, and these were a few only of the daily papers Another fruitful feature of Journalism was the Monthly Magazine, which, from the issue by Edward Cave in January 1731 of the first number of the Gentleman's Magazine, or, Monthly Intelligencer, grew and flourished vigorously to the end of the century Mr Urban's purpose, according to the preface to his first volume, was 'to give Monthly a View of all the Pieces of Wit, Humour, or Intelligence, daily offer'd to the Publick in the News Papers' (of which he estimates that 'no less than 200 Half-sheets per Month are thrown from the Press only in London'), and 'to join therewith some other Matters of Use or Amusement that will be communicated to us? Besides this, his titlepage professes to record the 'most remarkable Transactions and Events, Foreign and Domestick, the 'Births, Marriages, Deaths, Promotions, and Bankrupts,' the Prices of Goods and Stock, the Bills of Mortality, and a Register of Books Most of the Magazines which followed, the London, the Scots, the Royal, the Literary, the Court, the Lady's, the Universal, the British, the Town and Country, the European, &c., were after the same model. varied more or less by 'Maps of the War,' 'Accurate Plans of Fortifications,' 'Prospects' of localities.

pictures taken from the life Where all proportions are at strife, of 'Beasts just landed in the Tower,' problems by Philomath, Crambos and Rebuses, heads of Celebraties 'curiously engraved in Copper,' new country Dances, and the last Vauxhall or Ranelagh songs 'with the Musick' In addition to these there were the Monthly and Critical Reviews, dealing exclusively, and not, on the whole, inadequately, with current literature Lastly, dating from 1758, comes the Annual Register, planned by Edmund Burke, by whom it was at first wholly composed, though it was eventually continued by other hands

In concluding the foregoing summary of certain of the more obvious characteristics of Eighteentli Century Literature, it is perhaps necessary to remind the reader of the limitations indicated in its opening paragraphs there proposed only to treat of those new developments in literary expression which could fairly be claimed as originating in the period. With very slight deviation, this intention has been adhered to Had a survey of the general literary product been proposed, it would have been necessary to say something, and even much, of Burke and Eloquence, of Philosophy and Berkeley, of Butler and Theology,-to say nothing of other themes and writers But these things, besides involving the needless anticipation of much which must naturally form part of the pages that follow, would only have served to perplex the very explicit and definitely restricted function of this paper

The Revolution Period and After.

Revolutions in politics are not necessarily attended by revolutions in literature, since the development of art is largely independent of the conditions created by a change in the constitution of the State The character and genius of a people, their social habits and ideals, and also the influence of the existing models and traditions of art, are much more potent factors in literary evolution than any mere alteration of their government, however radical or conspicuous Especially must it be so when the revolution, like that of 1688 in England, is one that causes no disturbance of the national modes of life The overthrow of the monarchy under Charles I, accompanied as it was by civil war, by a change of religion and of moral régime, and by the proscription of a whole party with all its fashions and ideals, could not fail to have very serious results in the domain of art, simply because it was so much more than a political revolution The theatre was suppressed, the lighter poetry was dis couraged, men's thoughts were turned to controversy and edification, and so for a decade

our literature was an affair mainly of pamphlets and of sermons Even Milton had to leave his song of Paradise until the reign of roisterers succeeded the reign of saints the Revolution of 1688 was marked by no proscription, and, in England at least, was unstained by civil war There were no fines nor sequestrations, no puntanic justices nor domineering major-generals The bishop sat safe in his palace, the Tory squire in his hall, the ritual of Laud was maintained in the parish churches, and the fellows of Oxford and Cambridge knew no change save that they were now protected from the intrusion of Papist colleagues The court was still brilliant at Whitehall-more decorous, certainly, and very much duller than in the Merry Monarch's days, but still the court of an English king, or at least an English At the theatre Mr Pepys might still enjoy the plays of Etherege and Wycherley. and the wits and templars still gathered round the chair of Dryden at Will's

Under these conditions it was natural that the history of imaginative literature under William III should show merely a lingering decline of the development which had marked former decades Until after the opening of the new century we have to do mainly with the old men, or at least the old forms of art. mains the great central figure, and indeed it is only in this period, after his dismissal from the laureateship and the decay of his worldly prosperity, that he attrins his acknowledged place as the first dictator of English letters Much of the best of his poetical work -the translation of Virgil, Alexander's Feast, and the Fables-as well as five of his plays. was produced after the Revolution These plays are generally grouped among examples of the 'Restoration drama,' and this classification of them, as well as of the other plays of the same period, is accurate enough so far as concerns their intrinsic character Yet it is noteworthy that much of the Restoration drama is really post-Revolution in its date. All the plays of Congreve and Vanbrugh were produced after 1689, and so were many of Southerne's and Shadwell's, while Farquhar came still later, and did his best work in the days of Oueen Anne it was all essentially a bequest of the Resto ration period, and, in spite of its brilliance, the drama after the Revolution was really on Doubtless it suffered from the loss of court patronage, and the substitution of an alien monarch, who cared nothing about literature, for a race of artistic amateurs like the Stuarts Its grossness also grew offensive to the taste of the nation, or rather of the town, which was slowly recovering from the Restoration debauch Jeremy Collier's famous Short View (1697) has been often regarded as the death-blow of the later Stuart drama. but in truth it was rather a sign of the prevalent tendency than itself that tendency's

The poetry of the age, however, bore far more evident marks of decline than its drama. The veteran Dryden, as has been said, was the solitary great poet, and the only hopeful new man was Matthew Prior, who followed up his clever parody of the Hind and the Panther with occasional verses like those on the death of Queen Mary and the recapture of Namur Shadwell and Nahum Tate were the laureates, and Sir Richard Blackmore, the court physician, began to dose the public with the first of his six slumbrous epics in 1695 Dispensary appeared in 1699 Pope all the while was a child in his father's home in London, and Addison was writing negligible trifles at Oxford, with a whole decade and more between him and the Cambaign Nothing Never perforeshadowed the Augustan age hans in all our history have the prospects of English poetry been darker than in the interval when Dryden was making way for Pope

The attention of Englishmen, indeed, was given to other things than pure literature in the years when the British Constitution and the Protestant Succession were first on their The discussion of the problems involved in the settlement of Church and State necessarily produced a shoal of tracts and pamphlets, which seldom rose to the level of literature, and have left us nothing of permanent interest save the treatises on Tolcration and Government (1689-92) by Locke. The questions of toleration and comprehen sion exercised the pens of the clergy, as also did the Nonjuring schism, which had as one of its consequences the keen Trinitarian controversy (1692) between Sherlock and South These two divines, along with Stillingfleet, Tillotson, Patrick, and others, are to be numbered among the omaments of Revolution Church, but in reality the great days of the Anglican pulpit were over old questions were becoming exhausted, the polemic battle with Roine was virtually fought out, and it is significant of the drift of the time that the reign of William saw the appearance of Toland (1606) and Indal. and the beginning of that 'Deistical' movement which was to be so potent, in one development or another, in the next century Significant is it, too, that the one great philo sophical work of the time, Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding (1690), is held to mark the starting-point of that century's characteristic speculation The national mind, indeed, was beginning to transcend those speculative limits which had been imposed by the great conflict between Romanism and Protestantism a century and a half before. The mevitable results of the civil and religious struggle of the last sixty years were beginning to be felt thing like a foreshadowing of the 'Broad Church' movement is seen in the career and work of Gilbert Burnet, who, however, did better service by his History of his Own Time than by his narrative of the Reformation in England or his exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles

the Revolution acted most powerfully upon our literature was the liberation of the press lapse of the licensing laws in 1695 marks the real birth of English journalism and periodical Within a few months after that literature. event a whole host of newspapers had been started in London-the English Courant, the London Newsletter, the Post, the Postboy, the Postman—all those obscure and meagre sheets which are now remembered only through the mention of them in the pages of Addison and To the new freedom of the press these writers themselves owed their great opportunity. for doubtless it would have been impossible under the harassing and uncertain limitations of a censorship to produce a Tatler or a Spectator—at least with the delightful ease and spontaneity which are the very life and charm of the English periodical essay

That, however, was still a thing of the future, and for some time the effect of a free press was felt mainly in the growth of pamphleteering and the enlargement of its scope. The pamphlet still continued to be the chief instrument of popular appeal, and one of the greatest of English pamphleteers, Daniel Defoe, began his career in the decade after the Revolu-But neither his work, nor indeed the bulk of the so-called Augustan literature. can be understood without taking account of another factor introduced by the Revolutionthe development of the system of government Parties, indeed, had existed in England since 1641, and had obtained their names of Whig and Tory in 1679, but it was only with the formation of the Whig Junto about 1604 that the system was fairly organised. The effect on literature was momentous, for thenceforth during more than a century our prose, and even our poetry, continued to be written mainly on party lines The writers of Queen Anne's time attached themselves to one party or the other, supporting it not only in their acknowledged writings, but also by anonymous pamphleteering Swift became the best champion and almost the literary 'handy man' of the Tories, Addison and Steele fought the battle for the Whigs the production of Cato in 1713 both sides mustered as at a political demonstration, and the speeches of Sypliax and Sempronius were cheered alternately like hits in an election More than this, the party system had important effects on the patronage of literature and the social position of literary men Some pamphleteers, no doubt, like Defoe, were mere understrappers and secretservice men, but the better and more respectable writers got honourable posts, and were even welcomed to friendship by the chiefs of The intimacy of Bolingbroke and the State. Oxford with Pone. Swift, and Arbuthnot served to dignify and enrich our literature hardly less than the friendship of Mæcenas and Horace adorned and exalted the literature of Rome As for the more material aspects of party patronage, it needs but to recall part of the catalogue in one of Macaulay's essays 'Congreve, when he had scarcely attained his majority, was rewarded for his first comedy with places which made him independent for life Locke was Commissioner of Appeals and of the Board of Trade Newton was Master of the Mint Stepney and Prior were employed in embassies of high dignity and importance Steele was a Commissioner of Stamps and a Member of Parliament. Arthur Mainwaring was a Commissioner of the Customs and auditor of the Tickell was secretary to the Lords imprest. Justices of Ireland Addison was Secretary of State.'

Much of this, no doubt, was a late fruit of the Revolution, yet it was none the less a genuine product of that event-of the development of party which it occasioned, and of the transfer of power from the sovereign to the ministry which it brought about. Patronage, of course, there had been for long before, and the Stuarts were perhaps more intelligent patrons of letters than any of their suc-But it was assuredly cessors on the throne a good thing for literature that its votaries had to turn from the galleries of Whitehall to the offices of the Lord High Treasurer and the Secretary of State. It may be more flattering, but it is far less salutary, to be patronised by a king than by his primeminister To the former one can be but a servant, with the latter it is possible to be almost an equal and quite a friend needs but to contrast the position of Dryden, the laureate of Charles II and the butt of Rochester and Buckingham, with that of Swift and Pope, the friends of Harley and St John

Another effect of the Revolution upon our literature is found in the cliect which it gave to the influence of France. The royal master and patron of Boileau, formerly our ally and our paymaster, was now to be our enemy, with a short interval of peace, for more than twenty venrs, and such a cessation of intercourse with what was then the great centre of literary influence in Europe could not be without its results. No gay Grammonts or Saint Evremonds were now seen at the court of Whitehall, the Frenchmen who came luther were Protestant refugees, driven forth by the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes One of them, Motteux, completed Urquinart's translation of Rabelus, another, Rapin de Thoyras, wrote in his own language a history of England, which afterwards became for Englishmen the standard work on the subject until the days of David The result of these changed conditions was doubtless to leave our literature more to its own native and insular development, to throw poets like Pope more excluswely upon Spenser and Cowley and Dryden for models, and to foster the development of the simple idiomatic prose of Defoe and French influence, however-and nearly Swift all for good—as discernible in the essays of Temple (1690-93) and in the later work of Bolingbroke, where, however, there is still more conspicuous evidence of the growing power of political oratory as a factor in As parliamentary debate, with prose style the introduction of constitutionalism, became more important, the art of it was naturally studied with greater care, while the widening of the audience which had to be appealed in pamphleteering combined with the gradual spread of rationalism to favour a more curt and familiar and less pedantic style than that which, in the hands of Hooker and Milton and Taylor, had been developed in the pulpit and the college These probably are the mun causes of the steady improvement made at this time in the writing of English prose

Fo French influence, we must add, the Revolution period owed its one great literary controversy, for the battle of Boyle and Bentley (1696–99) over the Letters of Phalaris was one of the sequels of the dispute about the ancients and moderns between Perrault and Boileau and Fontenelle (1688–94) Started at first by Temple's unlucky essay, the fray is memorable mainly for having given Swift the subject of one of his earliest satires, and for establishing the fame of the greatest of English scholars. Richard Bentley's is one of the three or four great names which belong peculiarly to the age of the Revolution, or which, in other words, have won distinction by achievements that belong to the last ten or twelve years of the seventeenth century The others are Locke, Congreve, and Newton-the last by far the greatest of all, although it belongs largely to a domain that is excluded by the strict bounds of English literature, and even of the English language The Revolution age is indeed more notable on the scientific side than on the literary, and one can discern in it the progress of that movement which had been begun five and-twenty years before by the formation of the Royal Society-not only in the work of men like Ray, the naturalist and Hooke, the physicist, but also in the fantastic speculations of Dr Thomas Burnet concerning the origin and ultimate fate of the earth

The literary condition of England at the end of the seventeenth century cannot be understood without a knowledge of the very imperfect dissemination of books, and the other difficulties There were no great in the way of reading collections of books save at the two universities even London had no circulating library or bookclub, and readers who did not want to purchase had to snatch a glance at the volumes in the booksellers' shops in St Paul's Churchyard As for private libraries, even the clergy were miserably supplied, while the condition of the gentry is described in Macaulay's statement that 'an esquire passed among his neighbours for a great scholar if Hudibras and Baker's Chronicle, Tarleton's Tests, and the Seven Champions of Christendom lay in his hall window among the fishing-rods and fowlingpieces' The republication of books was slow The last folio of Shakespeare came out in 1685, and was not followed by the first octavo till 1709, while only three editions of Paradise Lost appeared between the Revolution and the end of the century, they were all in folio, and had but a small circulation Magazines, of course, there were none, while the newspapers which sprang up after the liberation of the press were mere news sheets that did not always displace the antiquated and lingering newsletter the best, John Dunton's Athenian Gazette (1691) might provide some meagre and frivolous 'answers to correspondents,' and for the rest there were sermons, pamphlets, ballad broadsheets, and an odd playbook or ponderous romance The popularising of literature was to come in the next age, with the Tatler and the Spectator

John Locke

was born at Wrington, Somerset, 29th August 1632, son of a country attorney, and from Westminster School passed to Christ Church College, Oxford, where he became lecturer on Greek and on rhetoric He soon became disgusted with the verbal subtleties of the Aristotelian and scholastic philosophy, and experiments in medicine show his bent towards the inductive interpretation of nature. In 1665 he went as secretary with Sir Walter Vane, envoy to the Elector of Brandenburg during the Dutch war some lively and interesting letters written by him from Germany on this occasion were published by Lord King in Those who 1829 are acquainted with Locke only in the character of a grave philosopher will be surprised to find him giving to a friend at home a quite humorous description (quoted of below) some Christmas ceremontes witnessed by him in a church at Cleves

In less than a year Locke re turned to Oxford, where he received an offer of preferment in the Irish Church if he should think fit to take orders. This, after due consideration, he declined. 'A man's affairs and whole course of his life,' says he in a letter to the friend who made the proposal to him, 'are not to be changed in a moment, and one is not made fit for a calling, and that in a day. I believe you think me too proud to undertake anything wherein I should acquit myself but unworthily. I am sure I cannot content myself with being undermost, possibly the middlemost, of my profession, and you will allow, on consideration, care is to be taken not to engage in a calling wherein, if one chance to be a bungler, there is no retreat'

In 1666 he was in a kind of amateur medical practice at Oxford, though he never took a degree in medicine. Problems of society, Church and State, and, above all, toleration largely exercised him. He became acquainted with Lord Ashley, afterwards Earl of Shaftesbury, and so valuable did his lordship find the medical advice and general conversation of the philosopher, that a close and permanent friendship sprang up between them, and Locke became an inmate of the Earl's house. This brought him into the society of Sheffield, Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Halifax, and other celebrated wits of the time. While residing with Lord Ashley, Locke superintended the education first of his son, and subsequently of his grandson, the third Earl of Shaftesbury. fanious as a philosophical writer and Deist in the reign of Oueen Anne In 1672, when Lord Ashley received an earldom and the office of Chancellor, he gave Locke the appointment of sec retary of presentations, and then a post in the Board of Trade, which the philosopher en joyed only till the following year, when his patron lost favour and was deprived of the seals The delicate state of Locke's health induced him 1675 to visit France, where he resided four years, first at Montpellier. and afterwards at Paris, where he had opportunities of cultivating the ac quaintance of the most eminent French literary men of the day In 1679 Shaftesbury recalled Locke to England, and on taking refuge in Holland three years afterwards, was followed thither by his friend. suspected as his confidant. After the death of his patron in 1683 Locke found it necessary to prolong his stay in Holland, and even there was obliged, by the machinations of his political enemies at home, to live for upwards of a year in conceal In 1684, by a special order from Charles II and countersigned by Sunderland, which is still preserved in the college library, he was deprived of his studentship at Christ Church, Oxford In 1687 he instituted at Amsterdam a literary society, the members of which-among whom were Le Clerc, Limborch, and other learned men—met weekly for the purpose of enjoying each other's conversation The Revolution of 1688 finally restored Locke to his native country, to which he was conveyed by marked by caution, by adherence to experience and submission to facts, by suspicion alike of abstract speculation and mystical enthusiasm. and by calm reasonableness His philosophy was sensible and rational rather than profound or original, it does not permanently satisfy the demands of the inquiring spirit, it is a philosophy of compromise, and is not sufficiently compact, systematic, and thorough going to hold its own against the criticism of the Kantians The style of the Essay, like the philosophy it expounds, is plain and straightforward, is occasionally colloquial, but on the whole is decidedly Locke, who meant his books for monotonous general reading, hated scholastic jargon, and wrote in language intelligible to every man of commonsense. 'No one,' says his pupil, Shaftesbury (himself rather a superfine writer), 'has done more towards the recalling of philosophy from barbarity. into the use and practice of the world, and into the company of the better and politer sort, who might well be ashamed of it in its other dress! In the non-philosophical writings, as in that on education and the political papers, there is more trenchancy, vigour, and variety

Design of the Essay on the Human Understanding

Since it is the inderstanding that sets man above the test of sensible beings, and gives him all the advantage and dominion which he has over them, it is certainly a subject, even for its nobleness, worth our labour to enquire into. The understanding, like the eye, whilst it makes us see and perceive all other things, takes no notice of itself, and it requires art and pains to set it at a distance, and make it its own object. But whatever be the difficulties that he in the way of this enquiry, whatever it be that keeps us so much in the dark to ourselves, sure I am that all the light we can let in upon our own minds, all the acquaintance we can make with our own understandings, will not only be very pleasant, but bring us great advantage, in directing our thoughts in the search of other things.

This, therefore, being my purpose, to enquire into the original, certainty, and extent of human knowledge, to gether with the grounds and degrees of belief, opinion, and assent, I shall not at present meddle with the physical consideration of the mind, or trouble myself to examine wherein its essence consists, or by what motions of our spirits or alterations of our bodies we come to have any sensation by our organs, or any ideas in our understandings, and whether those ideas do in their formation, any or all of them, depend on matter or no these are speculations which, however curious and entertaining, I shall decline as lying out of my way in the design I am now npon It shall suffice to my present purpose to consider the discerning faculties of a man as they are employed about the objects which they bave to do with and I shall imagine I have not wholly misem ployed myself in the thoughts I shall have on this occasion, if in this bistorical, plain method I can give any account of the ways whereby our understandings come to attain those notions of things we have, and can set down any measures of the certainty of our knowledge, or the grounds of those persuasions which are to be found amongst men, so various, different, and wholly contradietory, and yet asserted somewhere or other with such assurance and confidence, that be that shall take a view of the opinions of mankind, observe their opposition, and at the same time consider the fondness and devotion where with they are embraced, the resolution and cagerness wherewith they are maintained, may perhaps have reason to suspect that either there is no such thing as truth at all, or that mankind hath no sufficient means to attain a certain knowledge of it— It is therefore worth while to search out the bounds between opinion and knowledge, and examine by what measures, in things whereof we have no certain knowledge, we ought to regulate our assent and moderate our persuasions— In order where note, I shall pursue this following method

First, I shall enquire into the original of those ideas, notions, or whatever else you please to call them, which a man observes and is conscious to himself he has in his mind, and the ways whereby the understanding comes to be furnished with them—Secondly, I shall endeavour to shew what knowledge the understanding hath by those ideas, and the certainty, evidence, and extent of it. Thirdly, I shall make some enquiry into the nature and grounds of faith or opinion, whereby I mean that assent which we give to any proposition as true, of whose truth yet we have no certain knowledge—and here we shall have occasion to examine the reasons and degrees of assent.

If by this enquiry into the nature of the understanding I can discover the powers thereof, how far they reach, to what things they are in any degree proportionate, and where they fail us I suppose it may be of use to prevail with the busy mind of man to be more cautious in meddling with things exceeding its comprehension, to stop when it is at the utmost extent of its tether, and to sit down in a quiet ignorance of those things which upon examination are found to be beyond the reach of our capacities We should not then perhaps be so forward, out of an affectation of an universal knowledge, to raise questions and perplex ourselves and others with disputes about things to which our understandings are not suited, and of which we cannot frame in our minds any clear or distinct perceptions, or whereof (as it has perhaps too often happened) we have not any notions at all. If we can find out how far the understanding can extend its view, how far it has faculties to attain certainty, and in what cases it can only judge and guess, we may learn to content ourselves with what is attainable by us in this state (From the Introduction to the Essay)

Of Useless Reading

Books and reading are looked upon to be the great helps of the understanding and instruments of knowledge, as it must be allowed that they are, and yet I beg leave to question whether these do not prove an hindrance to many, and keep several bookish men from attaining to solid and true knowledge. This I think I may be per mitted to say, that there is no part wherein the understanding needs a more careful and wary conduct than in the use of books, without which they will prove rather innocent amusements than profitable employments of our time, and bring but small additions to our knowledge.

There is not seldom to be found even amongst those who aim at knowledge, who with an unwearied industry employ their whole time in books, who scarce allow themselves time to eat or sleep, hut read, and read, and read on, yet make no great advances in real knowledge, are always to use, as if the names of the figures that embellished the discourses of those who understood the art of speaking were the very art and skill of speaking well. This, as all other things of practice, is to be learned not by a few or a great many rules given, but by exercise and application, according to good rules or rather patterns, till habits are got and a facility of domg it well.

Agreeable hereunto, perhaps it might not be amiss to make children, as soon as they are capable of it, often to tell a story of any thing they know, and to correct at first the most remarkable fault they are guilty of in their way of potting it together. When that fault is cured. then to show them the next, and so on, till one after another, all, at least the gross ones, are mended. When they can tell tales pretty well, then it may be time to make them write them. The fables of Æsop, the only book almost that I know fit for children, may afford them matter for this exercise of writing English, as well as for reading and translating, to enter them in the Latin tongue. When they are got past the faults of grammar. and can join in a continued coherent discourse the several parts of a story without bald and unhandsome forms of transition (as is usual) often repeated, he that desires to perfect them yet farther in this, which is the first step to speaking well, and needs no invention, may have re course to Tully, and by putting in practice those rules which that master of eloquence gives in his first book De Inventione, § 20, make them know wherein the skill and graces of an handsome narrative, according to the several subjects and designs of it, lie. Of each of which rules fit examples may be found out, and therein thes may be shown how others have practised them ancient classic authors afford plenty of such examples, which they should be made not only to translate, but have set before them as patterns for their daily imitation

When they understand how to write English with due connexion, propriety, and order, and are pretty well masters of a tolerable narrative style, they may be ad vanced to writing of letters, wherein they should not be put upon any strains of wit or compliment, but taught to express their own plain easy sense, without any incoherence, confusion, or roughness And when they are perfect in this, they may to raise their thoughts have set before them the example of Voiture's, for the entertainment of their friends at a distance, with letters of compliment, mirth, raillery, or diversion, and Tully's epistles, as the best pattern whether for business or conversation. The writing of letters has so much to do in all the occurrences of human life, that no gentleman can avoid showing himself in this kind of writing occasions will daily force him to make this use of his pen, which, besides the consequences that in his affairs his well or ill managing of it often draws after it, always lays him open to a severer examination of his breeding, sense, and abilities, than oral discourses, whose transient faults, dying for the most part with the sound that gives them life, and so not subject to a strict review, more easily escape observation and censure

Had the methods of education been directed to their right end, one would have thought this so necessary a part could not have been neglected, whilst themes and verses in Latin, of no use at all, were so constantly every where pressed, to the racking of children's inventions beyond their strength, and hindering their cheerful progress in learning the tongues, by unnatural difficulties

But custom has so ordained it, and who dares disobey? And would it not be very increasonable to require of a learned country school master (who has all the tropes and figures in Farnaby's rhetoric at his fingers ends) to teach his scholar to express himself handsomely in English, when it appears to be so little his business or thought, that the boy's mother (despised, it is like, as illiterate, for not having read a system of logic and rhetoric) outdoes him in it?

To write and speak correctly gives a grace, and gains a favourable attention to what one has to say and since it is English that an English gentleman will have con stant use of, that is the language he should chiefly cultivate, and wherein most care should be taken to polish and perfect his style. To speak or write better Latin than English may make a man be talked of, but he would find it more to his purpose to express himself well in his own tongue, that he uses every moment, than to have the vain commendation of others for a very insignificant quality. This I find universally neglected, and no care taken any where to improve young men in their own language, that they may thoroughly understand and be masters of it. If any one among us have a facility or purity more than ordinary in his mother tongue, it is owing to chance, or his genius, or any thing rather than to his education, or any care of his teacher To mind what English his pupil speaks or writes is below the dignity of one bred up amongst Greek and Laun, though he have but little of them himself are the learned languages, fit only for learned men to meddle with and teach, English is the language of the illiterate vulgar, though yet we see the policy of some of our neighbours hath not thought it beneath the public care to promote and reward the improvement of their own language Polishing and enriching their tongue is no small business amongst them it hath colleges and stipends appointed it, and there is raised amongst them a great ambition and emulation of writing correctly and we see what they are come to by it, and how far they have spread one of the worst languages, possibly, in this part of the world, if we look upon it as it was in some few reigns backwards, whatever it be now men amongst the Romans were daily exercising them selves in their own language, and we find yet upon record the names of orators who taught some of their emperors Latin, though it were their mother tongue.

It is plain the Greeks were yet more nice in theirs, all other speech was barbarous to them but their own, and no foreign language appears to have been studied or valued amongst that learned and acute people, though it be past doubt that they borrowed their learning and philosophy from abroad.

I am not here speaking against Greek and Latin, I think they ought to be studied, and the Latin, at least, understood well, by every gentleman. But whatever foreign languages a young man meddles with (and the more he knows the better), that which he should critically study and labour to get a facility, clearness, and elegancy to express himself in, should be his own, and to this purpose he should daily be exercised in it.

Of History

The stories of Alexander and Cæsar, further than they instruct us in the art of living well, and furnish us with observations of wisdom and prudence, are not one jot to be preferred to the history of Robin Hood, or the Seven Wise Masters I do not deny but history is very useful, and very instructive of human life, but if it be studied only for the reputation of being a historian, it is a very empty thing, and he that can tell all the particulars of Herodotus and Plutarch, Curtius and Livy, without making any other use of them, may be an ignorant man with a good memory, and with all his pains hath only filled his head with Christmas tales And, which is worse, the greatest part of the history being made up of wars and conquests, and their style, especially the Romans, speaking of valour as the chief if not the only virtue, we are in danger to be misled by the general cur rent and business of history, and, looking on Alexander and Cresar, and such like heroes, as the highest instances of human greatness, because they each of them caused the death of 100,000 men, and the ruin of a much greater number, overran a great part of the earth, and hilled the inhabitants to possess themselves of their countries-we are apt to make bntchery and rapine the chief marks and very essence of human greatness And if civil history be a great dealer of it, and to many readers thus uscless, curious and difficult inquirings in antiquity are much more so, and the exact dimensions of the Colossus, or figure of the Capitol, the ceremouses of the Greek and Roman marriages, or who it was that first coined money, these, I confess, set a man well off in the world, especially amongst the learned, but set him very little on in his way

I shall only add one word and then conclude, and that, is that whereas in the beginning I cut off history from our study as a useless part, as certainly it is where it is read only as a tale that is told, here, on the other side, I recommend it to one who hath well settled in his mind the principles of morality, and knows how to make a judgment on the actions of men, as one of the most useful studies he can apply himself to. There he shall see a picture of the world and the nature of mankind, and so learn to think of men as they are. There he shall see the rise of opinions, and find from what slight and sometimes shameful occasions some of them have taken their rise, which yet afterwards have had great autho nty, and passed almost for sacred in the world, and borne down all before them There also one may learn great and useful instructions of prudence, and be warned against the cheats and rogueries of the world, with many more advantages which I shall not here enumerate (From Locke's Journal)

Christmas at Cleves

DEAR SIR,—Are you at lessure for half an honr's trouble? Will you be content I should keep up the custom of writing long letters with little in them? 'Tis a barren place, and the dull frozen part of the year, and therefore you must not expect great matters. 'Tis enough that at Christmas you have empty Christmas tales fit for the chimney corner To begin therefore, December 15th (here 25th) Christmas day, about one in the morning I went a gossipping to our Lady, think me not profane, for the name is a great deal modester than the service I was at. I shall not describe all the par ticulars I observed in that church, being the principal of the Catholics in Cleves, but only those that were par ticular to the occasion Near the high altar was a little altar for this day's solemnity, the scene was a stable, wherein was an or, an ass, a cradle, the Virgin, the babe, Joseph, shepherds, and angels, dramatis persona they but given them motion, it had been a perfect puppetplay, and might have deserved pence apiece, for they were of the same size and make that our English puppets are, and I am confident these shepherds and this Joseph are kin to that Judith and Holophernes which I have seen at Bartholomew Fair A little without the stable was a flock of sheep, cut out of cards, and these, as they then stood without their shepherds, appeared to me the best emblem I had seen a long time, and methought represented these poor innocent people, who, whilst their shepherds pretend so much to follow Christ and pay their devotion to him, are left unregarded in the barren wilderness. This was the show the music to it was all vocal in the quire adjoining, but such as I never heard They had strong voices, but so ill tuned, so ill managed, that it was their misfortune, as well as ours, that they could be heard. He that could not, though he had a cold, make better music with a Chevy Chace [apparently a tune to which the ballad was then sung] over a pot of smooth ale, deserved well to pay the reckoning, and go away athirst. However, I think they were the honestest singing men I have ever seen, for they endeavoured to deserve their money, and earned it certainly with pains enough, for what they wanted in skill, they made up in loudness and variety. Every one had his own tune, and the result of all was like the noise of choosing parliamentmen, where every one endeavours to cry loudest Besides the men, there were a company of little choristers thought, when I saw them at first, they had danced to the others' music, and that it had been your Gray's Inn revels, for they were jumping up and down about a good charcoal fire that was in the middle of the quire (this their devotion and their singing was enough, I think, to keep them warm, though it were a very cold night), but it was not dancing, but singing they served for, for when it came to their turns, away they ran to their places, and there they made as good harmony as a cou cert of little pigs would, and they were much about as Their part being done, out they sallied again to the fire, where they played till their eue called them, and then back to their places they huddled So negli gent and slight are they in their service in a place where the nearness of adversaries might teach them to be more careful.

A Letter to Anthony Collins

Sir,-Till your confidence in my friendship and freedom with me can preserve you from thinking you have need to make apologies for your silence when ever you omit a post or two, when in your kind way of reckoning you judge a letter to be due, you know me not so well as I could wish, nor am I so little burthensome to you as I desire I could be pleased to hear from you every day, because the very thoughts of you every day afford me pleasure and satisfaction. But I beseech you to believe that I measure not your kindness by your opportunities of writing, nor do suspect that your friendship flatiens, whenever your pen lies a little still. The sincerity you profess and I am convinced of has charms in it against all the little phantoms of ceremony nt be not so that true friendship sets one free from a scrupulous observance of all those little circumstances, I shall be able to give but a very ill account of myself to my friends, to whom when I have given possession of my heart, I am less punctual in making of legs and kissing my hand than to other people to whom that out-side civility is all that belongs.

I received the three books you sent me. That which the author sent me deserves my acknowledgment more ways than one, and I must beg you to return it. His demonstrations are so plain, that if this were an age that followed reason, I should not doubt but his would prevail. But to be rational is so glorious a thing that two legged creatures generally content themselves with the title, but will not debase so excellent a faculty about the conduct of so trivial a thing as they make themselves

There never was a man better suited to your wishes than I am You take a pleasure in being troubled with my commissions, and I have no other way of commerce with you, but by such importunities I can only say, that, were the tables chauged, I should, being in your place, have the same satisfaction, and therefore confidently make use of your kind offer I therefore beg the favour of you to get me Mr Le Clerc's Harmon; of the Evangelists in English, bound very finely in calf, gilt, and lettered on the back, and gilt on the leaves. So also I would have Moliere's works (of the best edition you can get them) bound. These books are for ladies, and therefore I would have them fine, and the leaves gilt as well as the back. Mohere of the Paris edition I think is the best, if it can be got in London You see the liberty I take I should be glad you could find out something for me to do for you here. I am perfectly, &c. TOHN LOCKE.

Not a few of the shrewd and wise sayings in Locke's philosophy of life might be quoted as aphorisms thus, 'It is one thing to show a man that he is in error, and another to put him in possession of the truth,' and 'Tis in vain to find fault with those arts of deceiving wherein men find pleasure to be deceived' Locke on quotation deserves to be cited in a work like the present 'He that has but ever so little examined the citations of writers cannot doubt how little credit the quotations deserve where the originals are wanting, and consequently how much less quotations of quotations can be relied on'

There are I was of Lool e by Lord King (1829 and 1830) and Fox Bourne (2 vois, 1876) and small works on his philosophy by Dr Fowler (1820) and Dr Campbell Fraser (1890). The standard edition of the Essay is by Campbell Fraser (2 vols, 1891). The most notable contemporary criticism is contained in the Nourceaux Fisials of Leibnitz the most trenchant of modern critiques is to be found in T. H. Green's Introduction to his edition of Hume (1874). Dr John Brown's essay 'Locke and Sydenham in his Horas Suize rea (1835) gives an account of his friendship with the great physician.

Sir Isaac Newton.

greatest of the world's physicists, was born 25th December 1642, at Woolsthorpe in Lincolnshire, where his father cultivated a small paternal estate, and from childhood he manifested a strong in clination towards mechanical and mathematical pursuits. Having received his early education at the grammar school of Grantham, at the age of fifteen he was summoned to take charge of the farm, but, found unsuited for this uncongenial occupation, he was allowed to return to school and follow the bent of his genius In 1661 he was admitted a sizar in Trinity College, Cambridge, became a Junior Fellow in 1667, and MA. in In 1660 he succeeded Barrow as mathematical professor, in 1671 he became a Fellow of the Royal Society, and communicated to it his new theory of Light. He served repeatedly in Parliament as member for the university, was appointed Warden (1696) and Master (1699) of the Mint during Montague's reform of the currency, became President of the Royal Society in 1703, and two years afterwards received the honour of knighthood from Queen Anne While at the Mint he devoted himself entirely to his official work, refusing testily to be 'dunned and teased by foreigners about mathematical things' so long as he was 'about the King's business' To the unrivalled genius and sagacity of Newton the world is indebted for many splendid discoveries in mathematics and physics, above all of the laws which regulate the movements of the solar system The first step towards the establishment of the Newtonian system-his philosophy, as it used to be called-was his discovery of the law of gravitation, which, as he proved, affected the vast orbs that revolve around the sun not less than the smallest objects on our own globe It was Voltaire who gave the apple story currency in its present shape. His nephew's record was ʻIn the same year [1665], at his mother's in Lincoln shire, when musing in a garden it came into his thoughts that the same power of gravity which made an apple fall from the tree to the ground was not limited to a certain distance. He saw that there was a remarkable power or principle which caused all bodies to descend towards the centre of the earth, and that this unseen power operated at the top of the highest mountains and at the bottom of the deepest mines the true cause, the law of gravitation, dawned upon his mind, Newton was so much agitated as to be unable to work out the problem When he did attempt to explain on this theory the lunar and planetary motions, the then erroneous estimate of the radius of the earth produced such discrepancies that he gave up his calculation for work in optics and about telescopes, and it was not till after he had utilised Picard's more correct measure of the earth (1670) that he was able to work out his theory, finally demonstrated by 1684, and for ever put beyond cavil (see page 159) 'The whole material universe,' Sir David Brewster said, 'was sprend out before him, the sun with all his attend ing planets, the planets with all their satellites, the comets wheeling in their eccentric orbits, and the system of the fixed stars stretching to the remotest limits of space.' When Columbus first descried the shores of the new world he had adventurously sailed to explore, he attained an unparalleled pitch of moral and intellectual grandeur. So did Milton v hen old and blind and poor, he liad realised the dream of his youth completed his great epic, and sent it forth on its voyage of immortality. But the achievement of Newton was still more transcendent—perhaps the most sublime ever permitted to mortal, he had done more than any mere man towards the scientific understanding and explanation of the world

as the truly epochmaking Philosobhia Naturalis Principia Mathematica To Newton we owe like wise discoveries by which the science of optics was so entirely changed that he may very justly be termed its founder He was the first to conceive and demonstrate the divisi bility of light into rays of seven different colours, and possessing different degrees of refrangibility His thirty years' optical investigations were set forth in 1704 in Optics or a Treatise of the Refractions, Inflections, and Colours of Light Contro versies about the priority of New ton's discovery of fluxions and Leib nitz's (independent) discovery of the differential calculus embittered many years of Newton's life. He wrote not a little on chemistry, had studied the alchemists carefully, and in his earlier years actually sought for the philosopher's stone. Like his illustrious contemporaries Boyle, Barrow, and Locl e, Newton devoted much attention to theology as well as to natural science. His Observations upon the Prophecies of Holy Writ, particularly the Prophecies of Daniel and the Apocalypse of St John, was published after his death his manuscripts were found many other theological pieces, mostly on such subjects as the Prophetic Style, the Host of Heaven, the Revelation, the Temple of Solomon, the Sanctuary, the Working of the Mysters of Iniquity, and the Contest between the Host of Heaven and the Transgressors of the Covenant. Only one was issued at once—that on The Chronology of Ancient Kingdoms Amended, in which Newton suggested how astronomy might be used to check and verify Babylonian and Egyptian chronology An Historical Account of Two Notable Corruptions of Scripture (John, v 7, and I Tim III 16) first appeared in a perfect form in Dr Horsley's edition of his works in 1779 Newton, like all competent scholars then and since, regarded the 'Three Heavenly Witnesses' as an interpolation, and held that 'God manifest in the flesh' should be (as Hort and recent orthodox scholars agree) 'who was manifest'-thereby incurring a charge of Unitarian views That he was far from being an orthodox Trinitarian appears from a sort of creed or confession printed Sir David Brewster, one of the articles of which is 'To us there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by That is, we hım are to worship the Father alone as God Almighty, and Jesus alone as the Lord, the Messiah, the Great King, the Lamb of God who was slain, and hath redeemed us with his blood, and made us kings and priests' Another is 'We need not pray to Christ to intercede for us If we pray aright to the Father, he will intercede for us' Newton's decided Arian convictions are visible also in the strong ill-will he cherished-like the Deists, with whom as a devout believer in revelation he had little in common-against the Nicene Council and its methods, his utter disrespect for Athanasius (as a liar, falsifier of evidence, and malignant enemy), his pronounced suspicion of every step that led to the acceptance of the 'homoousion,' and his query, 'Whether Christ sent his apostles to preach metaphysics to the unlearned common people and to their wives and children?' His unwillingness that his views on these points (though communicated to friends like Locke) should be published under his name during his lifetime is explained by the fact that unsoundness on the Trinity disqualified for public service. Whiston was deprived of his professorship and banished the University of Cambridge for Arianism in 1710 Galileo recanted to please the Roman Church, the English Galileo would have been driven from his posts a hundred years later had he not been content to keep his real views on theology in retentis And the pious and orthodox Sir David Brewster, painfully disturbed by Newton's theological aberrations, was attacked in 1831 by the Bishop of Salisbury as having done great injury to Newton's memory by publishing his true opinions from Newton's own undisputed MSS 1 But on Scripture revelation Newton was hyper-orthodox. In his elucubration on Daniel he insisted that 'the authority of emperors, kings, and princes is human The authority of councils, synods, bishops, and presbyters is human. The authority of the prophets is divine, and comprehends the sum of religion. reckoning Moses and the Apostles among the prophets' How far he was from present-day views may be gathered from his statement 'The pre dictions of things to come relate to the state of the Church in all ages and amongst the old prophets Daniel is the most distinct in order of time, and easiest to be understood, and therefore in those things which relate to the last times he must be made the key to the rest.' The following is part of his scheme for the non-natural interpretation of the prophets

Of the Prophetic Language

For understanding the prophecies, we are in the first place to acquaint ourselves with the figurative language of the prophets. This language is taken from the analogy between the world natural, and an empire or kingdom considered as a world politic. Accordingly the whole v orld natural, consisting of heaven and earth, signifies the whole world politic, consisting of thrones and people, or so much of it as is considered in the And the things in that world signifies the analogous things in this For the heavens, and the things therein, signify thrones and dignities, and those who enjoy them, and the earth, with the things thereon, the inferior people, and the lowest parts of the earth, called Hades, or Hell, the lowest or most miserable part of Whence ascending towards heaven, and descend ing to the earth, are put for rising and falling in power and honour, rising out of the earth or waters, and falling into them, for the rising up to any dignity, or dominion, out of the inferior state of the people, or falling down from the same into that inferior state, descending into the lower parts of the earth, for descending to a very low and unhappy state, speaking with a faint voice out of the dust, for being in a weak and low condition, moving from one place to another, for translation from one office, dignity, or dominion to another, great earth quakes, and the shaking of heaven and earth, for the shaking of dominions, so as to distract or overthrow them, the creating a new heaven and earth, and the passing away of an old one, or the beginning and end of the world, for the rise and reign of the body politic

In the heavens, the sun and moon are, by the interpreters of dreams, but for the persons of kines and queens But in sacred prophecy, which regards not single persons, the sun is put for the whole species and race of kings, in the kingdom or kingdoms of the world politic, shining with regal power and glory, the moon for the body of the common people, considered as the king's wife, the stars for subordinate princes and great men, or for bishops and rulers of the people of God, when the sun is Christ, light for the glory, truth, and I nowledge, wherewith great and good men shine and illuminate others, darkness for obscurity of condition, and for error, blindness, and ignorance, darkening, smiting, or setting of the sun, moon, and stars, for the ceasing of a kingdom, or for the desolation thereof, proportional to the darkness, darkening the sun, turning the moon into blood, and fulling of the stars, for the same, new moons, for the return of a dispersed people into a body politic or ecelesiastic.

If the world politic, considered in prophecy, consists of many kingdoins, they are represented by as many parts of the world natural, as the noblest by the celestial frame, and then the moon and clouds are put for the common people, the less noble, by the earth, sea, and rivers, and by the animals or vegetables, or buildings therein, and then the greater and more powerful animals and taller trees, are put for kings, princes, and nobles. And because the whole kingdom is the body politic of the king, therefore the sun, or a tree, or a beast, or bird, or a man, whereby the king is represented, is put in a large signification for the whole kingdom, and several animals, as a lion, a bear, a leopard, a goat, according to their qualities, are put for several kingdoms and bodies politic, and sacrificing of beasts, for slaughtering and conquering of kingdoms, and friendship between beasts, for peace between kingdoms. Yet sometimes vegetables and animals are, by certain epithets or circumstances, extended to other significations, as a tree, when called the 'tree of life' or 'of knowledge,' and a beast, when called 'the old serpent,' or worshipped

During the last forty years of his life the in ventive powers of this great thinker seemed to have lost their activity, he made no further discoveries, and in his later scientific publications published to the world only the views which lie had formed in early life. An unamiable attempt was even made (by M Biot) to prove that his mental powers were impaired by an attack of insanity in the years 1692 and 1693, and that accordingly he took to theology! Brewster, who proved that theology was an early study with him, and that some admirable physical work was done after the date in question, goes so far as to say (quite extravagantly, on the evidence), 'If he had not been distinguished as a mathematician and natural philosopher he would have enjoyed a high reputation as a theologian' A Cambridge student has recorded, on 3rd February 1693, the loss of Newton's papers by fire while he was at chapel, adding that when the philosopher came home, 'and had seen what was done, every one thought he would have run mad, he was so troubled thereat, that he was not himself for a month after' That his mind was then seriously disturbed is proved, and the disturbance was occasionally fol-Newton himself, lowed by fits of melancholia. writing on the 13th of September 1693 to Pepys, Secretary to the Admiralty, says 'I am extremely troubled at the embroilment I am in, and have neither ate nor slept well this twelvemonth, nor have my former consistency of mind' He wrote an apology to his friend Locke for having charged him with 'embroiling' him with other peoplethis being one of his hallucinations, and Locke's answer, also extant, is admirable for its gentle and kindly spirit. In 1722 Newton's health began to ful In February 1727 he came to London to preside at a meeting of the Royal Society, suffered from the journey, and died at Kensington on the 20th of March He was buried in his rightful place in Westminster Abbey, the Lord Chancellor, two scientific dukes, and three learned earls being pall-bearers

A letter from Newton to Dr John Mill, written in January 1694, shows how painstaking Newton was in matters of biblical criticism, and implies the value attached to his help by the foremost New Testament scholar of his time

Sti,-I fear you think I have kept your book too long but to make some amends for detaining it so long, I have sent you not only my old collations so far as they vary from yours, but also some new ones of Dr Covils two MSS, for I have collated them anew, and sent you those readings which were either omitted in your printed ones, or there erroneously printed collating these MSS, I set the readings down in the margin of your book, and thence transcribed them into a sheet of paper, which you will find in your book at the end of the Apocalypse, together with my old collations, and a copy of a side of Beza's MS The collations I send you of Dr Covil's two MSS you may rely upon, for I put them into Mr Laughton's hand with the two MSS, and he compared them with the MSS and found them right. In the other col lations you will find that Stephens made several omi sions and some other mistal es, in collating the Complutensian edition, though it is probable that he collated this edition with more diligence and accuratenes than he did any of the MSS Where I have noted any readings of the Alexandrin MS, I desire you would collate that MS again with my readings, because I never had a sight of 1 I could not observe any accurateness in the stops or commas in berr's MS You may rely upon the transcript of something more than a side of it, which you will find in your book at the end of the Apocalypse. In your hitle MS book, which I return you, tied up together with your Nev Testament, you will find those tran ecripts you desired out of MSS, except two, which were in such running hands that I could not imitate them, nor did it seem worth the while, the MSS being very new ones .-- I am, in all sincerity, your most humble and most obedient servant,

In character Newton was gentle and courteous He loathed hunting and the shooting of animals, and held it a serious defect in a friend's character that 'he loved killing of birds.' As Burnet said of him, 'he had the whitest soul he ever knew' He took little interest in art he playfully reproached a friendly archæologist with fondness for 'stone dolls' He was singularly straightforward, modest, and willing to accept criticism, though at times a little difficult and 'nice' on questions of priority—hence many rather futile controversies in which he was engaged. No proposition of his Principia, no theorem of his Optics, has sunk so deeply into men's minds as the saying reported to have been made by him shortly before his death

I do not know what I may appear to the world, but to myself I seem to have been only like a boy playing on the seashore, and diverting myself in now and then finding a smoother pebble or a prettier shell than ordinary, whilst the great ocean of truth lav all undiscovered before me

See the Life of Newton by Sir David Brewster (1831 2nd ed. 1855), A de Morgan's Newton, his Friend, and his Niece (1885) G J Gray's hibliography of Newton's works and works about him (nearly 250 in all 1888) and Professor P G Tait's Newton's Laws of Motion (1893)

John Ray (1627-1705), the son of a blacksmith at Black Notley in Essex, was an eminent In botany his very numerous and important works rank him among the founders of the science, and he is commonly regarded as the father of natural history in England He was educated at Braintree and Cambridge, becoming a Fellow of Trinity, and taking orders in 1660, but in 1662 he was ejected by the 'Black Bartholomen' Thereupon, with his friend and former pupil, Francis Willinghby, he travelled over Wales and southern England, collecting botanical and zoological specimens, and in 1663 they set out on a three years' Continental tour, Willighby taking the zoology, and Ray the botany Williamby died in 1672, and Ray, after acting as tutor to his friend's sons, in 1679 settled down in his native village. Besides their joint Observations, Topographical, Moral, and Physiological, made in a Journey through the Low Countries, Germany, Italy, and France (1673), Ray edited Willinghby's Ornithologia and Historia Piscium, and himself published A Collection of English Proverbs (1670), A Collection of English Words not generally used (1674), Historia Plantarum Generalis (3 vols 1686-1704), Synopsis Methodica Animalium (1693), &c. 'Ray,' said Cuvier, 'was the first true systematist of the Animal Kingdom,' and White of Selborne speaks of him as 'the only describer that conveys some precise idea in every term or word, maintaining his superiority over his followers and imitators, in spite of the advantage of fresh discoveries and modern information' Ray's famous treatise on The Wisdom of God Manifested in the Works of the Creation (1691, 12th ed 1759) was translated into several Continental languages He gives as one reason for writing it 'By virtue of my function, I suspect myself to be obliged to write something in divinity, having written so much on other subjects, for, not being permitted to serve the Church with my tongue in preaching, I know not but it may be my duty to serve it with my hand in writing, and I have made choice of this subject, as thinking myself best qualified to treat of it. Natural theology had previously been developed in England by Boyle, Stillingfleet, Wilkins, Henry More, and Cudworth, and the Essex clergyman, William Derham (1657–1735), but Ray systematised and popularised the subject. Paley's Natural Theology (1802), which superseded Ray's work, is really a development of Ray's argument.

The following excerpts are from the Observations, a book of travels which, always lucid and often very entertaining, yet sometimes—as in the greater Italian towns—becomes almost like a guide-book. On the journey up the Rhine from 'Collen' to Mentz, hardly one of the castles escapes mention. In university towns, Ray prints the professors' names and the courses of lectures being delivered when he was there. He had an especially open eye for botany and zoology, and 'natural curiosities,' thus at Naples he ascended Vesuvius, stood in the Grotto del Cane till 'the sulphureous twinge in his nose' threatened to stiffe him, and thrust a sy ord into the yents of the Solfatara of Pozzuoli

The Dutch People

The common people of Holland, especially inn keepers, waggoners (foremen they call them), boat-men, and porters, are surly and uncivil. The waggoners bait themselves and their horses four or five times in a day's journey Generally the Dutch men and women are almost always eating as they travel, whether it be by boat, coach, or waggon The men are for the most part big boned and gross bodied. The first dish at ordinaries and entertain ments is usually a salade, Sla they call it, of which they eat abundance in Holland. The meat they commonly ste v, and mal e their Hotelipots of it Puddings neither here nor in any place we have travelled beyond sea do they cat any, either not knowing the goodness of the dish, or not having the skill to make them puddings and brawn are dishes proper to England Boil'd spinage inine d and butter'd (sometimes also with currans added) is a great dish all over these countries. The common people feed much upon calilian (that is cod fish) and pickled lierrings, which they know how to cure or prepare better than we do in England You shall seldom ful of hung beef in any inn you come into, which they cut into thin slices and eat with bread and butter, Irving the slices upon the butter. They have four or five sorts of cheme, three they usually bring forth and set before von (1) Those great round chee es, colour d red on the outside, commonly in England called Holland-cheeses (2) Cummin seed chees... (3) Green cheese, said to be so colour d with the juice of sheep's dung. This they scrape upon bread butter'd, and so eat (4) Sometimes Angelots. (5) Cheese 1 ke to our common country Mill is the cheapest of all belly provisions. Their strong beer (thiel beer they call it, and well they may) is sold for three stivers the quart, which is more than three pence English. All manner of victuals, both meat and drank, are very dear, not for the searcity of such commodities, but partly by reason of the great excise and impost wherewith they are charged, partly by reason of the abundance of money that is stirring here. By the way we may note, that the dearness of this sort of provisions is an argument of the riches of a town or country, these things being always cheapest in the poorest places Land is also here sold at 30 or 40 years purchase, and vet both houses and land set at very high annual rents so that, were not the poor workmen and labourers well paid for their pains, they could not possiblylive. Their beds are for the most part like cabbins, in conveniently short and narrow, and yet such as they are, you pay in some places ten stivers a night the man for them, and in most six. There is no way for a stranger to deal with inn keepers, vaggoners, porters, and boat men but by bargaining with them before hand houses in Holland are kept clean with extraordinary meeness, and the entrance before the door currously paved with stone. All things both within and without, floor, posts, walls, glass, houshold stuff, marvellously clean, bright and handsomly kept nay, some are so extraordinarily curious as to take down the very tiles of their pent houses and cleanse them Yet about the preparing and dressing of their victuals our English housewives are, I think, more cleanly and curious than they, so that no wonder Englishmen were formerly noted for excessive eating, they having greater temptation to eat, both from the goodness of their meat, and the curiosity of the dressing it, than other nations.

Rays 'foreman is the Dutch coerman, German ful manu. Angelots were well known Normandy cheeses.

At Heidelberg

About the middle of the ascent of the hill, called Koningsthall, stands the eastle where the prince keeps his court, a stately pile and of great capacity, encom passed with a strong wall and a deep trench hewn out of the rock, which upon occasion may be filled with water Over the gate leading into the palace is n Dutch inscription, signifying the building of it by Ludovicus V in the year 1519. It is not all of one piece, but since the first foundation several buildings have been added by several princes. One part is called the English building Under one of the towers stood the great tun, which almost fill d a room. It held 132 fudders, a fudder (as we were informed) being equal to four Linglish hogs heads. The old tun is talen in pieces, and there is a new one in building by the prince's order, which is to contain 150 fudders, or 600 hogsheads. Being invited by the prince's order, we dined in the palace, where we observed all things carried with little noise and great After dinner his highness was pleased to call us into his closet and shew us many curiosities, among others (1) a purse made of thimen flui e uri, which we saw put into a pan of burning charcoal, till it was thoroughly ignite, and yet when tal en out and cool, we could no perceive that it had received any harm at all from the fire. (2) Two unicoms horns, each eight or ten flot long, wreathed and hollow to the top. By the way we may note, that these are the horns of a fish of the ectaceous kind (two distinc species whereof you may find described and figured in the History and Description of the Intilles, or Coulse Islands written in French by R T of Tertre, and the had of one in Wormins's Mustum), not the horns of a quadruped, as vulgarly but e-conceast, thought Whatever the antients have

The Prince Palatine's name and titles are Carolus Ludovicus, Comes Palatinus Rhem, sacri Romani Imperii Elector, utriusque Bavaria Dux He speaks six languages perfectly well, viz., High Dutch, Low Dutch, English, French, Italian and Latin, is greatly beloved of his subjects, of whom he hath a paternal care, and whose interest he makes his own In the great church where the famous library was kept, we observed many fair monuments of princes of this family, some with Dutch, most with Latin epitaphs or inscriptions others in the Franciscans church. In St. Peter's church also a great number of monuments of learned men of the university, which is of good account and one of the best in Germany Three or four colleges there are built and endowed chiefly for the maintenance and accommodation of poor students. The government of this university is by a senate, which consists only of sixteen professors. The number of professors is limited, and their stipends fix'd by the statutes of the university given them by their founder Rupertus count palatine anno 1346, and confirmed by the pope and emperor Of these professors three are of divinity, four of law, three of medicine, and six of philosophy

Ray's Remains, published in 1760 by Derham, contained this touching letter, written with difficulty on his death-bed, to Sir Hans Sloane

DEAR SIR, the best of friends, these are to take a finall leave of you as to this world. I look upon my self as a dying man. God requite your kindnesse expressed any ways tovard me a hundred fold, blesse you with a confluence of all good things in this world, and eternall life and hapinesse heer after, grant us an happy meeting in heaven.—Sr, eternally yours, John Ray

Or Thomas Burnet (1635?-1715), born at Crost near Darlington, studied at Cambridge, became in 1685 Master of the Charterhouse in London, and acquired great celebrity by the publication of his work, Telluris Theoria Sacra (1680-89), of which he published versions in English in 1684-89, entitled The Sacred Theory of the Earth The unequal and rugged appearance of the earth's surface suggested that this our globe is the ruin of some more regular fabric. Unlike Kant's Theory of the Heavens, published seventy years later, this is no serious and reasonable theory of the evolu tion of a planet from nebulæ, it has no relation to geology or physics, and is purely fantastic and hypothetical, a cosmogonic dream journey across the Alps and Apennines, Burnet says, 'the sight of those wild, vast, and indigested heaps of stones and earth did so deeply strike my fancy, that I was not easy till I could give myself some tolerable account how that confusion came in nature.' The theory which he formed was the following The globe in its state of chaos was a dark fluid mass, in which the elements of air, water, and earth were blended Gradually the into one universal compound heavier parts fell towards the centre, and formed Around this floated a nucleus of solid matter the liquid ingredients, and over them was the still lighter atmospheric air By-and-by the liquid mass became separated into two layers, by the separation of the watery particles from those of an oily composition, which, being the lighter, tended upwards, and, when hardened by time, became a smooth and solid crust. This was the surface of the antediluvian globe. 'In this smooth earth,' says Burnet, 'were the first scenes of the world, and the first generations of mankind, it had the beauty of youth and blooming nature, fresh and fruitful, and not a wrinkle, scar, or fracture in all its body, no rocks nor mountains, no hollow caves nor gaping channels, but even and uniform all over And the smoothness of the earth made the face of the heavens so too, the air was calm and serene, none of those tumultuary motions and conflicts of vapours, which the mountains and the winds cause in 'Twas suited to a golden age, and to the first innocency of nature.' By degrees, however, the heat of the sun, penetrating the superficial crust, converted a portion of the water beneath into steam, the expansive force of which at length burst the superincumbent shell, already weakened by the dryness and cracks occasioned by the solar rays When, therefore, the 'appointed time was come that All-wise Providence had designed for the punishment of a sinful world, the whole fabric brake, and the frame of the earth was torn in pieces, as by an earthquake, and those great portions or fragments into which it was divided fell into the abyss, some in one posture, and some in another? The waters of course now appeared, tumultuously raging as the rock masses plunged into the abyss. The impact 'could not but impel the water with so much strength as would carry it up to a great height in the air, and to the top of anything that lay in its way, any eminency or high fragment whatsoever and then rolling back again, it would sweep down with it whatsoever it rushed upon-woods, buildings, living creatures-and carry them all headlong into the great gulf Sometimes a mass of water would be quite struck off and separate from the rest, and tossed through the air like a flying river, but the common motion of the waves was to climb up the hills, or inclined fragments, and then return into the valleys and deeps again, with a perpetual fluctuation going and coming, ascending and descending, till the violence of them being spent by degrees, they settled at last in the places allotted for them, where "bounds are set that they cannot pass over, that they return not again to cover the earth."

Noah's Flood.

Thus the flood came to its height, and it is not easy to represent to ourselves this strange sceue of things, when the deluge was in its fury and extremity, when the earth was broken and swallowed up in the abyss, whose raging waters rose higher than the moun tains, and filled the air with broken waves, with a universal mist, and with thick darkness, so as nature seemed to be in a second chaos, and upon this chaos rid the distressed ark that bore the small remains of No sea was ever so tumultuous as this, nor is there anything in present nature to be compared with the disorder of these waters All the poetry, and all the hyperboles that are used in the description of storms and raging seas, were literally true in this, if not beneath it The ark was really carried to the tops of the highest mountains, and into the places of the clouds, and thrown down again into the deepest gulfs, and to this very state of the deluge and of the ark, which was a type of the church in this world, David seems to have alluded in the name of the church (Psalm, vin. 7) 'Abyss calls upon alives at the noise of thy cataracts or water spouts all thy waves and billows have gone over me.' It was no doubt an extraordinary and miraculous providence that could make a vessel so ill manned live upon such a sea, that lept it from being dashed against the hills, or overwhelmed in the deeps. That abyss which had devoured and swallowed up whole forests of woods, eities, and provinces, nay, the whole earth, when it had conquered all and triumphed over all, could not destroy this single ship I remember in the story of the Argo nautics, when Jason set out to fetch the golden fleece, the poet saith, all the gods that day looked down from lieaven to view the ship, and the nymphs stood upon the mountain tops to see the noble youth of Thessaly pulling at the oars, we may with more reason suppose the good angels to have looked down upon this ship of Noah's, and that not out of currosity, as idle spectators, but with a passionate concern for its safety and deliverance. A ship whose cargo was no less than a whole world, that carried the fortune and hopes of all posterity, and if this had perished, the earth, for anything we know, had been nothing but a desert, a great ruin, a dead heap of rubbish, from the deluge to the conflagration death and hell, the grave and destruction have their bounds.

The concluding part of his work relates to the final conflagration of the world, by which, he supposes, the surface of the new chaotic mass will be restored to smoothness, and 'leave a capacity for another world to rise from it.' Here the style rises to a dignity almost worthy of the sublimity of the theme, the passage was aptly termed by Addison the author's funeral oration over this globe.

The Final Conflagration.

But 'tis not possible from any station to have a full prospect of this last scene of the earth, for 'tis a mixture of fire and darkness. This new temple is filled with smoke while it is consecrating, and none can enter into But I am apt to think, if we could look down upon this burning world from above the clouds, and have a full view of it in all its parts, we should think it a lively representation of hell itself, for fire and darkness are the two chief things by which that state or that place uses to be described, and they are both here mingled together, with all other ingredients that make that Tophet that is prepared of old (Isaiah, xxx.). Here are lakes of fire and brimstone, rivers of melted glowing matter, ten thousand volcanoes vomiting flames all at once, thick darkness, and pillars of smoke twisted about with wreaths of flame, like fiery snakes, mountains of earth thrown up into the air, and the heavens dropping down in limps of fire. These things will all be literally true concerning that day and that state of the earth. And if we suppose Beelzebub and his apostate crew in the midst of this fiery furnace—and I know not where they can be else-it will be hard to find any part of the universe, or any state of things, that answers to so many of the properties and characters of hell as this which is now before us.

But if we suppose the storm over, and that the fire hath gotten an entire victory over all other bodies, and subdued everything to itself, the configuration will end in a deluge of fire, or in a sea of fire, covering the whole globe of the earth, for when the exterior region of the earth is melted into a fluor like molten glass or running metal, it will, according to the nature of other fluids, fill all vacuities and depressions, and fall into a regular surface, at an equal distance everywhere from its centre. This sea of fire, like the first abyss, will cover the face of the whole earth, make a kind of second chaos, and leave a capacity for another world to rise from it that is not our present business. Let us only, if you please, to take leave of this subject, reflect upon this occasion on the vanity and transient glory of all this habitable world, how by the force of one element break ing loose upon the rest, all the varieties of nature, all the works of art, all the labours of men, are reduced to nothing, all that we admired and adored before, as great and magnificent, is obliterated or vanished, and another form and face of things, plain, simple, and everywhere the same, overspreads the whole earth. Where are now the great empires of the world, and their great imperial cities? Their pillars, trophies, and monuments of glory? Shew me where they stood, read the inscription, tell me the victor's name! What remains, what impressions, what difference or distinction do you see in this mass of fire? Rome itself eternal Rome, the great city, the empress of the world, whose domination and superstition ancient and modern, make a great part of the history of this earth, what is become of her now? She laid her foundations deep, and her palaces were strong and sumptuous she glorified herself, and lived deliciously, and said in her heart, I sit a queen, and shall see no But her honr is come, she is wiped away from the face of the earth, and buried in perpetual oblivica.

I'ut it is not cities only, and works of men's hands, but the everlasting hills, the mountains and rocks of the earth, are melted as wax before the sun, and their place is nowhere found. Here stood the Alps, a prodigious range of stone, the load of the earth, that covered many countries, and reached their arms from the ocean to the Black Sea, this huge mass of stone is softened and dissolved as a tender cloud into rain. Here stood the African mountains, and Atlas with his top above the clouds There was frozen Caucasus, and Taurus, and Imaus, and the mountains of Asia. And yonder towards the north stood the Riphrean bills, clothed in ice and snow All these are vanished, dropped away as the snow upon their heads, and swallowed up in a red sea of fire. (Rev vi 3)-Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty, just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints Hallelujah

Steele in the Speciator (No 146) praised the Theory, and Warton thought it proved that Burnet had an imagination nearly equal to Milton's, as well as a solid understanding Archaologia Philosophica, on the origin of things (1692, Englished in the same year), 'reconciles' by a non literal interpretation the story of Genesis with his own theory-one of the earliest 'reconciliations' of Genesis with modern views, the Fall becomes little more than an allegory, and his report of the conversation between Eve and the serpent startled society even more than the heretical character of his speculations, which led to a multitude of examinations and refutations and answers. In consequence he had to retire from the office of Clerk of the Closet to the king, and lived in the Charterhouse till his death Latin treatises On Christian Faith and Duties, and On the State of the Dead and Reviving (translated in 1728 and 1733), contain unorthodox mens on original sin and the sacraments, and maintain the ultimate salvation of the whole human race.

Gilbert Burnet (1643-1715), Bishop of Salisbury, was equally active and eminent as theologian, politician, and historian He was the son of a rovalist and Episcopalian lawyer in Edinburgh, who was after the Restoration raised to the Bench His mother was of a strong Presbyterian house, being a sister of the Covenanting leader Johnston of Warriston, who was created a peer by Cromwell, and put to death in the reign of Charles II by a mockery of legal forms Gilbert adhered to the Episcopalian side of his house, but his divided parental allegiance in Church matters taught him the importance of religious toleration He vas M.A of Marischal College, Aberdeen, before he was fifteen years of age, and in 1664 he studied Hebrew under a learned rabbi in Amsterdam Having become a probationer in 1661, the year of the re establishment of Episcopacy in Scotland, he was in 1665-69 minister of Saltoun, in East Lothian, whence he removed to Glasgow as professor of Always zealous and ambitious, Burnet wrote pamphlets in favour of reconciling Presbytenanism and Episcopacy, remedying abuses, and rindicating the authority and constitution of Church and State in Scotland He was offered a bishopric, but refused it, and opposing the Scottish administration of Lauderdale, he removed in 1674 to London, where he obtained the appointment of preacher at the Rolls Chapel, and lecturer at St As a preacher Burnet was highly Clement's popular His appearance and action were commanding, his manner was frank and open, and he was a master of extempore eloquence. It was then not unusual for congregations to express approbation of particular passages by a deep hum, and Burnet's hearers, it is said, used to hum so long and loud that he would, during the pause, sit down and wape the perspiration from his forehead. His first historical work was the Memoirs of the Dules of Hamilton (1676), and his reputation was raised by the publication, in 1679, of the first volume of his History of the Reformation of the Church of England (vol 11 1681, supplement, 1714) Some Passages in the Life and Death of the Earl of Rochester, whom Burnet had attended on his deathbed (see Vol. I page 780), appeared in 1680, and heightened the impression of Burnet's talents and piety Charles would have pressed a bishopric on the popular divine, but Burnet declined court favour He even went the length of writing a strong remonstrance to the king on the errors of his government and his personal vices Charles threw the letter into the fire, and when Burnet attended Lord Russell to the scaffold, wrote an account of his last moments, and preached against popery, he increased the Duke of York's resentment against him to the uttermost The king was also so incensed that he dismissed Burnet from his lectureship, and prohibited him from preaching at the Rolls Chapel Burnet, however, went on writing treatises and sermons in favour of toleration, and he compiled Lives of Sir Matthew Hale (1682) and Bishop Bedell (1685) He wrote a narrative of a tour in France, Switzerland, and Italy, and settling at the Hague in 1687, became one of the counsellors and adherents of the party of William of Orange. In the Revolution of 1688 he played a conspicuous part, accompanying William to England as chaplain, and was rewarded with the bishopric of Salisbury As a prelate Burnet was noted for liberality and attention to his duties, and besides discharging the duties of his see, found time for work such as his Exposition of the Thurty-nine Articles, long a standard work.

Burnet left for publication the work by which he is best known, the History of my Own Time, giving an outline of the events of the Civil War and Commonwealth, and a full narrative of the succeeding period down to 1713. As he had personally known the conspicuous characters of a century, and penetrated most of its State secrets, he was able to relate events with a fullness and authority not inferior to Clarendon's This he did in an easier, if vastly less dignified, style, and at least as much allowance must be made for the unmistakable influence of political Foresceing that the and personal prejudices freedom of his strictures would give offence in many quarters, Burnet left an injunction in his will that the work should not be published till six years after his death, so that it did not make its appearance till 1723, and even then some passages-afterwards restored-were omitted by his sons Its publication, as might have been expected, was a signal for fierce attacks on the reputation of the author, whose candour and veracity were loudly impeached All the Tory and Jacobite pens of the age were pointed against the History Swift, Dartmouth, Lansdowne, and many others proclaimed it to be grossly partial and maccurate, Pope and Arbuthnot ridiculed its egotistic style, and Hume and later historians continued the depreciatory attacks, which cannot yet be said to have ceased. Whoever writes of the period or of its leading public characters must consult Burnet, and will find plenty of points for assault on the theological and political views so complacently advanced by the author Burnet was a strong and somewhat credulous partisan, a minute and garrulous describer of events great and small. But he was doubtless an honest, well meaning, and usually good-natured man He appealed to the God of truth that he had on all occasions in his work told the truth, and, however mistaken or biassed he may be on some points, he may claim the praise of having been, according to his lights, a futhful chronicler That he is a lively and interesting one has never been disputed, his book is a gallery of picturessome overshaded, some too bright, but all life like 'It seems,' as Horace Walpole said, 'as if he had just come from the king's closet, or from the apartments of the men whom he describes, and was telling his readers, in plain, honest terms, what he had seen and heard.' The diaries of Evelyn and Pepys serve as supplements to Burnet. It should perhaps be added that Dr Routh, Tory and High Churchman, who published two editions of the History of my Own Time (1823-33), did not take the most favourable view of Burnet, succinctly declaring, 'I know the man to be a liar, and I am determined to prove him so? The first extract is from the History of the Reformation, the others all from the History of my Own Time

Death and Character of Edward VI.

But now the King's death broke off this negociation. He had last year first the measles, and then the small pox, of which he was perfectly recovered in his progress he has been sometimes violent in his exercises, which had east him into great colds, but these went off, and he seemed to be well after it in the beginning of January this year [1553], he was seized with a deep cough, and all medicines that were used did rather increase than lessen it, upon which a suspicion was taken up, and spread over all the world (so that it is mentioned by most of the historians of that age) that some lingering poison had been given him, but more than rumours, and some ill favoured circumstances, could never discover concerning this. He was so ill when the parliament methat he was not able to go to Westminster, but ordered their first meeting and the sermon to be at Whitehall. In the time of his sickness, Bishop Ridley preached before him, and took occasion to run out much on works of charity, and the obligation that lay on men of high condition to be eminent in good works. This touched the King to the quick, so that presently after the sermon he sent for the Bishop. And after he had commanded him to sit down by him and be covered, he resumed most of the heads of the sermon, and said he looked on himself as chiefly touched by it he desired him, as he had already given him the exhortation in general, so to direct him to do his duty in that particular. The Bishop, astonished at this tenderness in so young a prince, burst forth in tears, expressing how much he was overloyed to see such inclinations in him, but told him he must take time to think on it, and craved leave to consult with the Lord Mayor and court of Aldermen So the King writ by him to them to consult speedily how the poor should be relieved. They considered there were three sorts of poor such as were so by natural infirmity or folly, as impotent persons, and madmen or idiots, such as were so by accident, as sick or maimed persons, and such as by their idleness did east themselves into So the King ordered the Greyfriars' church, near Newgate, with the revenues belonging to it, to be a house for orphans, St Bartholomew's, near Smithfield, to be an hospital and gave his own house of Bridewell to be a place of correction and work for such as were wilfully idle. He also confirmed and enlarged the grant for the hospital of St Thomas in Southwarl, which he had crected and endowed in August last And when he set his hand to these foundations, which was not done before the 26th of June this year, he thanked God that had prolonged his life till he had finished that design So he was the first founder of those houses, which by many great additions since that time have risen to be amongst the noblest in Lurope

Death thus hastening on him, the Duke of Northum herland, who knew he had done but half his work, except he had the King's sisters in his hands, got the Council to write to them in the king's name, inviting them to come and keep him company in his sickness. But as they were on the way, on the 6th of July, his spirits and body were so sunk that he found death approaching, and so he composed him elf to die in a most devout manner. His whole exercise was in short privers and ejaculations. The last that he was heard to use was in these words. 'I ord God, deliver me out of this miserable and wretched life, and talle me among thy chosen, howbest not my will but these be done Land, I commit my spirit to thee. O I ord, thou I nowest how happy it were for me to be with thee, yet for thy chi casake send me life and health, that I may truly write thee O my Lord God, bless my people, and save thme inherit ance. O I ord God, sive thy chosen people of I in I ad, O Lord God, defend this realm from papietry, and main tun thy true religion, that I and my people may praise thy holy name, for Jesus Christ his sale ' Seeing some about him, he seemed troubled that they were on ar, and had heard him, but with a pleasant countenance, he said he had been praying to God. And soon after the pangs of death coming upon him, he said to Sir Henry Sidney, who was holding him in his arms. 'I am funt, Lord, have mercy on me, and receive my spirit and so he breathed out his innocent soul

Thus died king Lahard VI, that meomparable young prince. He was then in the sixteenth year of his age, and was counted the wonder of that time not only learned in the tongue and other liberal sciences, but I new well the state of lur kingdom. He kept a book in which he writ the characters that were given him of all the chief men of the nation, all the judges, lord heutenants, and justices of the peace over Ingland in it he had marked down their was of living and their zeal for religion. He had studied the matter of the mint, with the exchange and value of money, so that he understood it well, is appairs by his fournal. He also understood fortification and designed well. He knew all the harbours and ports both of his own dominions and of I rance and Scotland and how much water they had, and what was the was of coming into them. He had acquired great I nowledge in foreign affairs, so that he talked with the ambas sadors about them in such a manner that they filled all the world with the highest opinion of him that was possible, which appears in most of the histories of that age. He had great quickness of apprehension, and being mistrustful of his memory, used to take notes of almost everything he heard, he writ these first in Greek characters, that those about him might not understand them, and afterwards writ them out in his Journal King Ldward was tender and com passionate in a high measure, so that he was much against the taking away the lives of heretics, and there fore said to Cranmer, when he persunded him to sign the warrant for the burning of Joan of Kent, that he was not willing to do it, because he thought that was to send her quick to hell. He expressed great tenderness to the miseries of the poor in his sickness, as hith been already shewn He took particular care of the suits of all poor persons, and gave Dr Cox special charge to see that

Scotland his father seut him to travel. He spent some years in France, and spole that language like one born there. He came afterwards and settled in Scotland. and had Presbyterian ordination, but he quickly broke through the prejudices of his education. His preaching had a sublimity both of thought and expression in it. and above all, the grace and gravity of his pronunciation was such that few heard him without a very sensible emotion I am sure I never did. It was so different from all others, and indeed from every thing that one could hope to rise up to, that it gave a man an indignation at hunself and all others. It was a very sensible humiliation to me, and for some time after I heard him. I could not bear the thought of my own performance. and was out of coantenance when I was forced to think of preaching. His style was rather too fine but there was a majesty and beauty in it that left so deep an impression, that I cannot yet forget the sermons I heard him preach thirty years ago. And yet with all this lie seemed to look ou himself as so ordinary a preacher. that while he had a cure he was ready to employ all others and when he vas a bishop, he chose to preach to small auditories, and would never give notice before hand. He had indeed a very low voice, and so could not be heard by a great crowd. He soon came to see into the follies of the presbyterians and to hate their covenant, particularly the imposing it, and their fury agranst all who differed from them

Upon his coming to me [in Loudon], I was amazed to see him, at above 70, look so fresh and well, that age seemed as it were to stand still with him his hair was still black, and all his motions were lively he had the same quickness of thought and strength of memory, but above all the same heat and life of devotion, that I had ever seen in him. When I took notice to him upon my fir t seeing him how well he looked, he told me he was very near his end for all that, and his work and journey both were now almost done. This at that time made no great impression on me. He was the next day taken with an oppression, and as it seemed with a cold, with some stitches, which was indeed a pleurisy, but was not thought so by himself. So he sent for no physician, but used the common things for a cold. Lord Perth went to him and he was almost suffocated while he was with him, but he recovered himself, and, as Dr Fall, who was there, told me, he spoke to him with a greater force than was usual ever in him, recommending to him both firm ness in religion and moderation in government, which struck that lord somewhat, but the impression was soon

The next day Leighton sunk so that both speech and sense went away of a sudden and he continued panting about twelve hours, and then died without pangs or convulsions. I was by him all the while. Thus I lost him who had been for so many years the chief guide of my whole life. He had lived ten years in Sussex, in great privacy, dividing his time wholly between study and retirement and the doing of good, for in the parish where he lived, and in the parishes round about, he was always employed in preaching and in reading of prayers. He distributed all he had in charities, choosing rather to have it go through other people's hands than his own, for I was his almoner in London. He had gathered a well-chosen library of curious as well as useful books, which he left to the diocese of Dumblane for the use of the clergy there, that country being ill furnished with books. He lamented oft to me the stupidity that he observed among the commons of Lugland, who seemed to be much more insensible in the matters of religion than the commons of Scotland were. He retained still a particular inclination to Scotland, and if he had seen any prospect of doing good there, he would have gone and lived and died among them

There were two remarkable circumstances in his He used often to say, that if he were to choose a place to die in, it should be an inn, it looking like a pilgrim's going home, to whom this world was all as an inn, and who was weary with the noise and confusion in it. He added, that the officious tenderness and care of friends was an entanglement to a dying man, and that the unconcerned attendance of such as could be procured in such a place would give less disturbance And he obtained what he desired, for he died at the Bell Inn in Warwick Lane Another circumstance was, that while he was hishop in Scotland, he took what his tenants were pleased to pay him so that there was a great arrear due, which was raised slowly In one whom he left in trust with his affairs there and the last payment that he could expect from thence was returned up to him about six weeks before his death so that his provision and journey failed both at once.

Leighton's vish must have been quite independent of the couplet in Dryden's Palamon and Arcite (1699)

Like pilgrims to the appointed place we tend
The world s an inn and death the journey s end — which is a paraphrase of Chaucer s.

'This world nys but a thurghfare ful of wo, And we been pilgrames passange to and fro, Deeth is an end of every worldly score, but only in form contrasts with Sir Thomas Browne s, 'For the world I count it not an inn but an hospital and a place not to live but to die in. And Cicero aid, 'Ex hac vita discedo tauquam ex hospitio, non tanquam ex domo. Shenstone s' Warmest welcome in an inn belongs to a very different category.

Character of Charles II.

Thus lived and died King Charles II He was the greatest instance in history of the various revolutions of which any one man seemed capable. He was bred up the first twelve years of his life with the splendour that became the heir of so great a crown he passed through eighteen years in great inequalities, nnhappy in the war, in the loss of his father, and of the crown of England Scotland did not only receive him, though upon terms hard of digestion, but made an attempt upon England for him, though a feeble one He lost the battle of Woreester with too much indifference, and then he shewed more care of his person than became one who had so much at stake. He wandered about England for ten weeks after that, hid from place to place, but, under all the apprehensions he had then upon him, he shewed a temper so careless, and so much turned to levity, that he was then diverting himself with little household sports, in as unconcerned a manner as if he had made no loss, and had been in no danger at He got at last out of England but he had been obliged to so many who had been faithful to him, and careful of hlm, that he seemed afterwards to resolve to make an equal return to them all, and finding it not so easy to reward them all as they deserved, he forgot them all alike Most princes seem to have this pretty deepin them, and think that they ought never to remember past services, but that their acceptance of them is a full reward He, of all in our age, exerted this piece of prerogative in the amplest manner, for he never seemed to charge his memory or to trouble his thoughts with the sense of any of the services that had been done him While he was abroad, at Paris, Cologne, or Brussels, he never seemed to lay anything to heart. He pursued all his diversions and irregular pleasures in a free career, and seemed to be as serene under the loss of a crown as the greatest philosopher could have been. Nor did he willingly hearken to any of those projects with which he often complained that his chancellor persecuted him That in which he seemed most concerned was, to find money for supporting his expense. So that it was often said, that if Cromwell would have compounded the matter, and had given him a good round pension, that he might have been induced to resign his title to him During his evile he delivered himself so entirely to his pleasures, that he became incapable of application. He spent little of his time in reading or study, and yet less in thinking, and in the state his affairs were then in, he accustomed himself to say to every person, and upon all occasions, that which he thought would please them So that words or promises went very easily from him, and he had so ill an opinion of mankind, that he thought the great art of living and governing was to manage all things and all persons with a depth of eraft and dissimu And in that few men in the world could put on the appearances of sincerity better than he could, under which so much artifice was usually hid, that in con clusion he could deceive none, for all were become mistrustful of him. He had great vices, but scarce any virtnes to correct them He had in him some vices that were less hurtful, which corrected his more hurtful ones He was during the active part of life given up to sloth and lendness to such a degree that he hated husiness, and could not bear the engaging in any thing that gave him much trouble, or put him under any con straint, and though he desired to become absolute, and to overturn both our religion and our laws, yet he would neither run the risk, nor give himself the trouble, which so great a design required He had an appearance of gentleness in his outward deportment, but he seemed to have no bowels nor tenderness in his nature, and in the end of his life he became cruel He was apt to forgive all crimes, even blood itself, yet he never forgave any thing that was done against himself, after his first and general act of indemnity, which was to be reckoned as done rather upon maxims of state than inclinations of mercy He delivered himself up to a most enormous course of vice, without any sort of restraint, even from the consideration of the nearest relations and the most studied extravagances that way seemed to the very last to be much delighted in and pursued by him. He had the art of making all people grow fond of him at first, by a softness in his whole way of conversation, as he was certainly the best bred man of the age but when it appeared how little could be built on his promise, they were cured of the fondness that he was apt to raise in them. When he saw young men of quality that had something more than ordinary in them, he drew them about him, and set himself to corrupt them both in religion and morality, in which he proved so unhappily successful, that he left England much changed at his death from what he had found it at his restoration

He loved to talk over all the stories of his life to every new man that came about him His stay in Scotland, and the share he had in the war of Paris [war of the Fronde], in carrying messages from the one side to the other, were his common topics. He went over these in a very graceful manner, but so often and so copiously, that all those who had been long accus tomed to them grew very weary of them, and when he entered on those stories, they usually withdrew so that he often began them in a full audience, and befere he had done, there were not above four or five left which drew a severe jest from Wilmot, about him Earl of Rochester He said he wondered to see a man have so good a memory as to repeat the same story without losing the least circumstance, and yet not remember that he had told it to the same persons the very day before This made him fond of strangers, for they hearkened to all his often repeated stories, and went away as in a rapture at such an uncommon condescension in a king

His person and temper, his vices as well as his fortunes, resemble the character that we have given us of Tiberius so much, that it were easy to draw the parallel between Tiberius his banishment, and his coming after wards to reign, makes the comparison in that respect come pretty near His hating of business, and his love of pleasures, his raising of favourites and trusting them entirely, and his pulling them down, and hating them excessively, his art of covering deep designs, particularly of revenge, with an appearance of softness, brings them so near a likeness, that I did not wonder much to observe the resemblance of their face and person. At Rome I saw one of the last statues made for Tiberius, after he had lost his teeth, but bating the alteration which that made, it was so like King Charles that Prince Borghese and Signior Dominico, to whom it belonged, did agree with me in thinking that it looked like a statue made for him Few things ever went near his heart Duke of Gloucester's death seemed to touch him much but those who knew him best thought it was because he had lost that by which only he could have balanced the surviving brother, whom he hated, and set he em broiled all his affairs to preserve the succession to him

His ill conduct in the first Dutch war, and those terrible calamities of the plague and fire of London, with that loss and reproach which he suffered by the insult at Chatham, made all people conclude there was a curse upon his go-ernment. His throwing the public hatred at that time upon Lord Clarendon was both unjust and ingrateful And when his people had brought him out of all his difficulties upon his entering into the triple alliance, his selling that to France, and his entering on the second Dutch war with as little colour as he had for the first, his beginning it with the attempt on the Dutch Smyrna fleet, the shutting up the exchequer, and his declaration for toleration, which was a step for the introduction of popery, was such a chain of black actions, flowing from blacker designs, that it amazed those who had known all this to see with what impudent struns of flattery addresses were penned during his life, and yet more grossly after his death. His contributing so much to the raising the greatness of France, chiefly at sea, was such an error, that it could not flow from want of thought, or of true sense. Ruvigny told me he desired that all the methods the French took in the increase and conduct of their naval force might be sent him, and he said he seemed to study them with concern and zeal He shewed what errors they committed, and how they ought to be corrected, as if he had been a viceroy to France, rather than a king that ought to have watched over and prevented that progress they made, as the greatest of all the mischiefs that could happen to him or to his people. They that judged the most favourably of this thought it was done out of revenge to the Dutch, that with the assistance of so great a fleet as France could join to his own he might be able to destroy them But others put a worse con struction on it, and thought that, seeing he could not quite master or deceive his subjects by his own strength and management, he was willing to help forward the creatness of the French at sea, that by their assistance he might more certainly subdue his own people, accord ing to what was generally believed to have fallen from Lord Clifford, that if the king most be in a dependance. it was better to pay it to a great and generous king, than to five hundred of his own insolent subjects

No part of his character looked wickeder as well as meaner than that he, all the while that he was professing to be of the Church of England, expressing both zeal and affection to it, yet secretly reconciled to the Church of Rome, thus mocking God, and deceiving the world with so gross a prevarication. And his not having the honesty or courage to own it at the last, and not shewing any sign of the least remorse for his ill led life, or any tenderness either for his subjects in general, or for the queen and his servants, and his recommending only his whores and bastards to his brother's care, would have been a strange conclusion to any other life, but was well enough suited to all the other parts of his

The Czar Peter in England in 1698

I mentioned, in the relation of the former year, the Czar's coming out of his own country, on which I will now enlarge. He came this winter over to England, and stayed some months among us. I waited often on him, and was ordered both by the king and the archbishop and bishops to attend upon him, and to offer him such informations of our religion and constitution as he was willing to receive. I had good interpreters, so I had much free discourse with him. He is a man of a very hot temper, soon inflamed, and very brutal in his He raises his natural heat by drinking much brandy, which he rectifies himself with great application. he is subject to convulsive motions all over his body, and his head seems to be affected with these, he wants not capacity, and has a larger measure of knowledge than might be expected from his education, which was very indifferent, a want of judgment, with an instability of temper, appear in him too often and too evidently, he is mechanically turned, and seems designed by nature rather to be a ship carpenter than a great prince. This was his chief study and exercise while he stayed here, he wrought much with his own hands, and made all about him work at the models of ships. He told me he designed a great fleet at'Azuph, and with it to attack the Turkish empire, but he did not seem capable of conducting so great a design, though his conduct in his wars since this has discovered a greater genius in him than appeared at that time. He was desirous to under stand our doctrine, but he did not seem disposed to mend matters in Moscovy He was indeed resolved to encourage learning, and to polish his people by sending some of them to travel in other countries, and to draw strangers to come and live among them. He seemed apprehensive still of his sister's intrigues. There was a mixture both of passion and severity in his temper. He is resolute, but understands little of war, and seemed not at all inquisitive that way. After I had seen him often, and had conversed much with him, I could not but adore the depth of the providence of God, that had raised up such a furious man to so absolute an anthority over so great a part of the world.

David, considering the great things God had made for the use of man, broke out into the meditation 'What is man that thou art so mindful of him?' But here there is an occasion for reversing these words, since man seems a very contemptible thing in the sight of God. while such a person as the Czar has such multitudes put, as it were, under his feet, exposed to his restless jealousy and savage temper He went from hence to the court of Vienna, where he purposed to have stayed some time, but he was called home sooner than he had intended. upon a discovery or a suspicion of intrigues managed hy his sister. The strangers to whom he trusted most were so true to him that those designs were erushed before he came back But on this occasion he let loose his fury on all whom he suspected Some hundreds of them were hanged all round Moscow, and it was said that he cut off many heads with his own hand, and so far was he from relenting or shewing any sort of tenderness that he seemed delighted with it. How long he is to be the scourge of that nation or of his neighbours God only So extraordinary an incident will, I hope, justify such a digression

Character of William III

Thus lived and died William the Third, King of Great Britain, and Prince of Orange He had a thin and weak body, was brown haired, and of a clear and delicate constitution. He had a Roman engle nose, bright and sparkling eyes, a large frout, and a countenance composed to gravity and anthority All his senses were critical and exquisite. He was always asthmatical, and the dregs of the small pox falling on his lungs, he had a constant deep cough. His behaviour was solemn and serious, seldom elicerful, and but with a few He spoke little and very slowly, and most commonly with a disgusting dryness, which was his character at all times, except in a day of battle, for then he was all fire, though without passion, he was then everywhere, and looked to everything. He had no great advantage from his edu cation De Witt's discourses were of great use to him, and he, being apprehensive of the observation of those who were looking narrowly into everything lie said or did, had brought himself under a habitual caution that he could never shake off, though in another scene it proved as hurtful as it was then necessary to his affairs. He spoke Dutch, French, English, and German equally well, and he understood the Latin, Spanish, and Italian, so that he was well fitted to command armies composed of several nations. He had a memory that amazed all about him, for it never failed him, he was an exact observer of man and things, his strength lay rather in a true discerning and a sound judgment, than in imagination or invention his designs were always great and good But it was thought he trusted too much to that, and that he did not descend enough to the humours of his people to make himself and his notions more acceptable

This in a government that has so much them f freedom in it as ours was more necessary than lie ras inclined to believe. His reservedness grew on him, o that it disgusted most of those who served him, but e had observed the errors of too much talking, more han those of too cold a silence. He did not like contra action nor to have his actions censured, but he loved o employ and favour those who had the arts of compla ence, yet he did not love flatterers His genius lay hiefly to war, in which his courage was more admired han his conduct. Great errors were often committed by him, but his heroical courage set things right, as it nflamed those who were about him He was too lavish of money on some occasions, both in his buildings and to us favourites, but too sparing in rewarding services, or n encouraging those who brought intelligence He was pt to take ill impressions of people, and these stuck ong with him, but he never carried them to indecent evenges. He gave too much way to his own humour lmost in everything, not excepting that which related o'his own health. He knew all foreign affairs well, and understood the state of every court in Europe very particularly He instructed his own ministers himself, out he did not apply enough to affairs at home ried how be could govern us by balancing the two parties one against another, but he came at last to be persuaded that the Tories were irreconcilable to him, ind he was resolved to try and trust them no more. He believed the truth of the Christian religion very irmly, and he expressed a horror at atheism and blas ohemy, and though there was much of both in his court, yet it was always demed to him and kept out of sight. He was most exemplarily decent and devout n the public exercises of the worship of God, only on week-days he came too seldom to them. He was in attentive hearer of sermons, and was constant in his private prayers and in reading the Scriptures, and when he spoke of religious matters, which he did not often, it was with a becoming gravity. He was much possessed with the belief of absolute decrees. He said to me he adhered to these because he did not see how the belief of Providence could be maintained upon any other supposition. His indifference as to the forms of church government and his being zerlous for toleration, together with his cold behaviour towards the clergy, gave them generally very all impressions of him. In his deportment towards all about him he seemed to make little distinction between the good and the bad, and those who served well or those who served bim ill He loved the Dutch, and was much beloved among them, but the ill returns he met from the English nation, their jealousies of him, and their perversences towards him, had too much soured his mind, and had in a great measure alienated him from them, which be did not take care enough to conceal, though he saw the ill effects this bad upon his business. He grew in his last years too remiss and careless as to all affairs, till the treacheries of France awakened bim, and the dread ful conjunction of the monarchies gave so loud an alarm to all Europe for a watching over that court, and a bestirring himself against their practices, was the pre vailing passion of his whole life. Few men had the art of concealing and governing passion more than he had, yet few men had stronger passions, which were seldom felt but by inferior servants, to whom he usually made such recompenses for any sudden or indecent vents he night give his anger, that they were glad at every time that it broke upon them He was too easy to the faults of those about him when they did not lie in his own way, or cross any of his designs, and he was so ant to think that his ministers might grow insolent if they should find that they had much credit with him, that he seemed to have made it a maxim to let them often feel how little power they had even in small matters favourites had a more entire power, but he accustomed them only to inform him of things, but to be sparing in offering advice except when it was asked It was not easy to account for the reasons of the favour that he showed in the highest instances to two persons beyond all others, the Earls of Portland and Albemarle, they being in all respects men not only of different, but of opposite characters, secreey and fidelity were the only qualities in which it could be said that they did in any sort agree. I have now run through the chief branches of his character I had occasion to know him well, having observed him very carefully in a course of sixteen years. I had a large measure of his favour, and a free access to him all the while, though not at all times to the same degree. The freedom that I used with him was not always acceptable, but he saw that I served him faithfully, so after some intervals of cold ness, he always returned to a good measure of confidence in me. I was in many great instances much obliged by him, but that was not my chief bias to him, I con sidered him as a person raised up by God to resist the power of Irance and the progress of tyraany and persecution The series of the five Princes of Orange that was now ended in him was the noblest succession of heroes that we find in any history. And the thirty years from the year 1672 to his death, in which he acted so great a part, carry in them so many amazing steps of a glorious and distinguishing Providence that in the words of David he may be called 'The man of God's right hand, whom he made strong for himself." After all the abatements that may be allowed for his errors and faults, he ought still to be reckoned among the greatest princes that our history or indeed that any other can afford He died in a critical time for his own glory, since he had formed a great alliance and had projected the whole scheme of the war, so that if it succeeds, a great part of the honour of it will be ascribed to him, and if otherwise, it will be said he was the soul of the alliance that did both animate and knit it together, and that it was natural for that body to die and fall asunder when he who gave it life was with drawn Upon his death, some moved for a magnificent funeral, but it seemed not decent to run into un necessary expense when we were entering on a war that must be maintained at a vast charge, so a private funeral was resolved on But for the honour of his memory, a noble monument and an equestrian statue were ordered. Some years must shew whether these things were really intended, or if they were only spoke of to excuse the privacy of his funeral, which was scarce decent, so fur was it from being magnificent.

The Dictionary of National Biography specifies, out of his very numerous publications theological or political, twenty-eight as his principal works. Of sermons he printed over fifty

John Tillotson (1630-94), Archbishop of Canterbury, was the son of a clothier at Sowerby near Halifax, and was brought up in the Calvinistic faith of the Puritans At Clare Hall, Cambridge, his early opinions were modified by Chillingworth's Religion of the Protestants, and though at the Savoy Conference (1661) he still ranked with the Presbytemans, on the Act of Uniformity in 1662 he submitted without hesitation and accepted a He very quickly became noted as a preacher, and began to rise in the Church 1663 he became rector of Keddington in Suffolk. it was when (1664) he became preacher at Lincoln's Inn that his sermons attracted attention, though his mild and evangelical, but undoctrinal, theology provoked criticism In 1670 he became Prebendary, in 1672 Dean, of Canterbury He used his influence in favour of the Nonconformists, whom he was anxious to bring within the pale of the Establishment, but his efforts led to nothing but disappointment. Meanwhile he had married a niece of Oliver Cromwell His moderate principles commended him to William III, who made him Clerk of the Closet in 1689, and Dean of St Paul's In 1691 he was raised to the see of Canterbury. vacant by the death of the Nonjuror Sancroft. He accepted the elevation with the greatest reluctance, and the insults of the Nonjurors to the end of his life, three years after, extorted neither complaint nor retaliation As Archbishop he exerted himself to remove the abuses in the Church, such as nonresidence among the clergy, and these efforts and his latitudinarianism excited much enmity Sermons, his widow's sole endowment, were purchased by a bookseller for no less than two thou sand five hundred guineas, and for long were the most popular of English sermons Tillotson's style is frequently careless and languid, and he lacks the power and humour of Barrow and South, yet there is in him such manifest sincerity, earnestness, kindliness, simplicity, and freedom from affectation that the Sermons well deserved the popularity they enjoyed in an unenthusiastic age. Whitefield, the apostle of a more fervid faith, saw in him the conspicuous representative of the lukewarmness of eighteenth-century religion, and called him 'that traitor who sold his Lord'-a judgment he afterwards repented as unjust Contemporary judg-'He was not ment was summed up by Burnet only the best preacher of the age, but seemed to have brought preaching to perfection, his sermons were so well heard and liked, and so much read, that all the nation proposed him as a pattern, and studied to copy after him? ## Advantages of Truth and Sincerity

Truth and reality have all the advantages of appear ance, and many more. If the show of anything be good for anything, I am sure sincerity is better, for why does any man dissemble or seem to be that which he is not but because he thinks it good to have such a quality as he pretends to? for to counterfeit and dissemble is to pit on the appearance of some real excellency. Now the best way in the world for a man to seem to be anything is really to be what he would seem to be. Besides that it is many times as troublesome to make good the pretence of a good quality as to have it, and if a man have it not, it is ten to one but he is discovered to want it, and then all his pains and labour to seem to have it is lost. There is something unnatural in painting, which a skilful eve will easily discern from native beauty and complexion

It is hard to personate and act a part long, for where truth is not at the bottom, nature will always be en deavouring to return, and will peep out and betray her self one time or other. Therefore if any man think it convenient to seem good, let him be so indeed, and then his goodness will appear to everybody's satisfiction, for truth is convincing, and carries its own light and evidence along with it, and will not only commend us to every man's conscience, but, which is much more, to God, who searcheth and seeth our hearts. So that upon all accounts sincerity is true wisdom. Particularly as to the affairs of this world, integrity hath many advantages over all the fine and artificial ways of dissimulation and deceit, it is much the plainer and easier, much the safer and more secure way of dealing in the world, it has less of trouble and difficulty, of entanglement and perplexity, of danger and hazard in it, it is the shortest and nearest way to our end, carrying us thither in a straight line, and will hold out and last longest The arts of deceit and cunning do continually grow wealer, and less effectual and serviceable to them that use them, whereas integrity gains strength by use, and the more and longer any man practiseth it, the greater service it does him, by confirm ing his reputation, and encouriging those with whom he hath to do to repose the greater trust and confidence in him, which is an unspeakable advantage in the business and affairs of life.

Truth is always consistent with itself, and needs nothing to help it out, it is always near at hand, and sits upon our lips, and is ready to drop ont before we are aware whereas a lie is troublesome, and sets a man's invention upon the racl, and one trick needs a great many more to make it good. It is like building upon a false founda tion, which continually stands in need of props to shore it up, and proves at last more chargeable than to have raised a substantial building at first upon a true and solid foundation, for sincerity is firm and substantial, and there is nothing hollor or unsound in it, and because it is plain and open, fears no discovery, of which the crafty man is always in danger, and when he thinks he walks in the dark, all his pretences are so transparent, that he that runs may read them. He is the last man that finds himself to be found out, and whilst he takes it for granted that he males fools of others, he renders himself ridiculous

Add to all this, that sincerity is the most compendious wisdom, and an excellent instrument for the speedy despatch of business, it creates confidence in those we have to deal with, saves the labour of many inquines, and brings things to an issue in few words, it is like travelling in a plain, beaten road, which commonly brings a man sooner to his journey's end than by ways, in which men often lose themselves. In a word, whatsoever convenience may be thought to be in false hood and dissimulation, it is soon over, but the incon venience of it is perpetual, because it brings a man under an everlasting jealousy and suspicion, so that he is not believed when he speaks truth, nor trusted perhaps when When a man has once forfeited the he means honestly reputation of his integrity, he is set fast, and nothing will then serve his turn, neither truth aor falsehood And I have often thought that God hath, in his great wisdom, hid from men of false and dishonest minds the nonderful advantages of truth and integrity to the pros penty even of our worldly affairs. These men are so blinded by their covetousness and ambition, that they cannot look beyond a present advantage, nor forbear to seize upon it, though by ways never so indirect, they cannot see so far as to the remote consequences of a steady integrity, and the vast benefit and advantages which it will bring a man at last. Were but this sort of men wise and clear sighted eaough to discern this, they would be honest out of very knavery, not out of any love to honesty and virtue, but with a crafty design to promote and advance more effectually their own interests, and therefore the justice of the divine providence hath hid this truest point of wisdom from their eyes, that bad men might not be upon equal terms with the just and upright, and serve their own wicked designs by honest and lawful means

Indeed, if a man were only to deal in the world for a day, and should never have occasion to converse more with mankind, never more need their good opinion or good word, it were then no great matter—speaking as to the concernments of this world—if a man spent his reputation all at once, and ventured it at one throw but if he be to continue in the world, and would have the advantage of conversation whilst he is in it, let him make use of truth and sincerity in all his words and actions, for nothing but this will last and hold out to the end all other arts will fail, but truth and integrity will carry a man through and bear him out to the last.

Louis XIV and William III. a Contrast

You have heard two sorts of persons described in the text by very different characters, the one that glory in their wisdom, and might, and riches, the other, that glory in this, that they anderstand and know God to be the Lord, which exerciseth loving kindness, and judg ment, and righteousness in the earth. And we have seen these two characters exemplified, or rather drawn to the life, in this present age. We who live in this western part of Christendom have seen a mighty prince by the just permission of God raised up to be a terror and scourge to all his neighbours, a prince who had in perfection all the advantages mentioned in the former part of the text and who, in the opinion of many who had been long dazzled with his splendor and greatness, hath passed for many years for the most politic, and powerful, and richest monarch that hath appeared in these parts of the world for many ages Who hath governed his affairs by the deepest and steadiest counsels, and the most refined wisdom of this world A prince mighty and powerful in his preparations for war, formidable for his vast and well disciplined armies, and for his great naval force, and who had brought the art of war almost to that perfection, as to be able to conquer and do his business without fighting, a mystery hardly known to former ages and generations and all this skill and strength united under one absolute will, not hampered or bound up by any restraints of law or conscience. A priace that commands the estates of all his subjects, and of all his conquests, which hath furnished him with an almost inexhaustible trea sure and revenue and one who, if the world doth not greatly mistake him, hath sufficiently gloried in all these advantages, and even beyond the rate of a mortal man But not knowing God to be the Lord, which exercises loving kindness, and judgment, and righteousness in the earth, how hath the pride of all his glory been stained, by tyranny and oppression, by injustice and cruelty, by enlarging his dominions without right, and by making war upon his neighbours without reason, or even colour of provocation and this in a more barbarous manner than the most barbarous autions ever did, carrying fire and desolation wheresoever he went, and laying waste many and great cities, without necessity, and without Thus have I represented unto you a mighty pity ! monarch, who like a fiery comet hath hung over Europe for many years, and by his malignant influence hath made such terrible havock and devastations in this part of the world

Let us now turn our view to the other part of the text and behold a greater than he is here, a prince of a quite different character, who does understand and know God to be the Lord, which does exercise loving kindness, judgment, and righteousness in the earth, and who hath made it the great study and endeavour of his life to imitate these divine perfections, as for as the imperfection of human nature in this mortal state will admit I say, a greater than he is here, who never said or did any inso lent thing, but instead of despising his enemies, has upon all occasions encountered them with an undanated spirit and resolution This is the man whom God hath honoured to give a check to this mighty man of the earth, and to put a hook into the nostrils of this great leviathan, who has so long had his pastime in the seas. But we will not insult, as he once did in a most un princely manner over a man much better than himself, when he believed him to have been slain at the Boyne And indeed death came then as near to him as was possible without killing him. But the merciful provi dence of God was pleased to step in for his preservation, almost by a miracle for I do not believe that from the first use of great guns to that day, any mortal man ever had his shoulder so kindly kissed by a cannon bullet. But I will not trespass any further upon that which is the great ornament of all his other virtues, though I have said nothing of him but what all the world does see and must acknowledge he is as much above being flattered, as it is beneath an honest and a generous mind to flatter things without any simister ends and designs leaves a most agreeable pleasure to the mind, like that of a constant health which is better felt than expressed. When a man applies his mind to the knowledge of his duty, and when he doth understand it (as it is not hard for an honest mind to do, for as the oracle answered the servant who desired to know how he might please his master, If you will seek it, you will be sure to find it), sets himself with a firm resolution to pursue it, though the rain falls, and the floods arise, and the winds blow on every side of him, yet he enjoys peace and quiet within, notwithstanding all the noise and blustring abroad, and is sure to hold out after all, because he is founded upon a rock. But take one that endeavours to blind, or corrupt, or master his conscience, to make it serve some mean end or design, what uneasy reflections hath he upon himself, what perplexing thoughts, what tormenting fears, what suspicions and jealousies do disturb his imagination and rack his mind! What art and pains doth such a one take to be believed honest and sincere! and so much the more, because he doth not believe himself he fears still he hath not given satisfaction enough, and by overdoing it, is the more Secondly, because integrity doth more become a man, and doth really promote his interest in the world. It is the saying of Dio Chrysostom, an heathen orator, that simplicity and truth is a great and wise thing, but cunning and deceit is foolish and mean, for, saith he, observe the beasts the more conrage and spirit they have, the less art and subtilty they use, but the more timorous and ignoble they are, the more True wisdom and greatness of false and deceitful mind ruses a man above the need of using little tricks and devices. Sincerity and honesty carries one through many difficulties which all the arts he can invent would never help him through For nothing doth a man more real mischief in the world than to be suspected for too much crast, because every one stands npon his guard against him, and suspects plots and designs where there are none intended, insomuch that though he speaks with all the sincerity that is possible, yet nothing he saith can be believed.

The path of the just, saith the wise man, is as the shining light which shineth more and more unto the perfect day. As the day begins with obscurity and a great mixture of darkness, till by quick and silent motions the light overcomes the mists and vapours of the night, and not only spreads its beams upon the tops of the mountains, but darts them into the deepest and most shady valleys thus simplicity and integrity may at first appearing look dark and suspicious, till by degrees it breaks through the clouds of envy and detraction, and then shines with a greater glory.

A collected edition of his works, with Life by Richard Bentley, who lived with him 1683-89, appeared in 1710, Dr Cunningham in 1845 published an edition of his Doctrines and Practices of the Church of Rome

William Sherlock (c. 1641-1707), born at Southwark, was educated at Eton and Peterhouse, Cambridge, and became a London rector in 1669, a prebendary of St Paul's in 1681, Master of the Temple in 1684, and, after holding out as a Non-juror for a twelvemonth, Dean of St Paul's in 1691 Macaulay says of him that 'perhaps no simple presbyter of the Church of England has ever possessed a greater authority over his brethren than belonged to Sherlock at the time of the Revolution' His controversial tracts against the Nonconformists had won him a pension from Charles II, but this was stopped by James II, who could not pardon his sixteen treatises against the Church of Romeone of them in reply to no less a champion than Bossuet. His Case of Allegiance to Sovereign Power Stated, justifying his taking of the new oath, provoked a furious controversy His Practical Discourse Concerning Death (of 308 pages, 1689) was long one of the most popular theological treatises in the language, and was praised by Addison as a powerful persuasive to a religious life. His Vindication of the Doctrine of the Trinity (1601) led to a controversy with South, who expressly charged Sherlock with Tritheism, a heresy as damnable as the antitrinitarianism he sought to confute. Sherlock also wrote discourses on a Future Judgment (540 pp, 1692) and on the Devine Providence (also a book, 1694), in which, says Southey, he brought forward 'with irrefrigable force the natural arguments for the immortality of the soul and a future state.' He was a keen and eager controversialist, but a moderate, 'rational,' and anti-enthusiastic theologian The extracts are both from the discourse on death

Our Life Long Enough.

Such a long life [as that of the antediluvians] is not reconcilable with the present state of the world. What the state of the world was before the Flood, in what manner they lived, and how they employed their time, we cannot tell, for Moses has given no account of it, but taking the world as it is and as we find it, I dare under take to convince those men who are most apt to complain of the shortness of life, that it would not be for the general happiness of mankind to have it much longer for, 1st, The world is at present very unequally divided, some have a large share and portion of it, others have nothing but what they can earn by very hard labour, or extort from other men's charity by their restless importunities, or gain by more ungodly arts Now though the rich and prosperous, who have the world at command and live in ease and pleasure, would be very well contented to spend some hundred years in this world, yet I should think fifty or threescore years abundantly enough for slaves and beggars, enough to spend in hunger and want, in a gaol and a prison. And those who are so foolish as not to think this enough owe a great deal to the wisdom and goodness of God that he does. So that the greatest part of mankind have great reason to be contented with the shortness of life, because they have no temptation to wish it longer adly, The present state of this world requires a more quick succession. The world is pretty well peopled, and is divided amongst its present inhabitants, and but very few in comparison, as I observed before, have any con siderable share in the division. Now, let us but suppose that all our ancestors who lived a hindred or two hundred years ago were alive still and possessed their old estates and honours, what had become of this present generation of men who have now taken their places and make as creat a shoy and bastle in the world as they old? and if you look back three or four or five hundred years the case is still so much the vorse, the world would be over-peopled, and where there is one poor miserable man now, there must have been five hundred, or the world must have been common, and all men reduced to the same level; which, I believe, the rich and happy people, who are so fond of long life, would not like very This would utterly undo our young producal heirs. were their hopes of succession three or four hundred years off, who, as short as life is now, think their fathers make very little haste to their graves would spoil their trade of spending their estates before they have them, and make them live a dull sober life. whether they would or no, and such a life, I know, they don't think worth having And therefore I hope at least they will not make the shortness of their fathers' lives an argument against providence, and yet such kind of sparks as these are commonly the wits that set up for atheism, and when it is put into their heads, quarrel with everything which they foully conceive will weaken the belief of a God and a providence, and, among other things, with the shortness of life, which they have little reason to do, when they go often outlive their estates.

3dl, The world is very had as it is, so bad that good men scarce know how to spend fifty or threescore years in it, hut consider how bad it would probably be were the life of man extended to six, seven, or eight hundred years If so near a prospect of the other world as forty or fifty years cannot restrain men from the greatest villames, what would they do if they could as reasonably suppose death to be three or four hundred years off? If men make such improvements in wickedness in twenty or thirty years, what would they do in hundreds? And what a blessed place then would this world be to live in! We see in the old world, when the life of men vas drawn out to so great a length, the wickedness of mankind grew so insufferable that it repented God he had made man, and he resolved to destroy that whole generation, excepting Noah and his family most probable account that can be given how they came to grow so universally wicked, is the long and prosperous lives of such wicked men, who hy degrees corrupted others, and they others, till there was but one righteous family left, and no other remedy left but to destroy them all, leaving only that righteous family as the seed and future hopes of the new world.

And when God had determined in himself and pro mised to Nouli never to destroy the world again by such a universal destruction till the last and final judgment, it was necessary by degrees to shorten the lives of men, which was the most effectual means to make them more governable, and to remove had examples out of the world, which would hinder the spreading of the infection, and people and reform the world again by new examples of picty and virtue. For when there are such quick successions of men, there are few ages but have some great and hrave examples, which give a new and better spirit to the world.

Advantages of our being kept in Ignorance of the Time of our Death

For a conclusion of this argument, I shall briefly vin dicate the wisdom and goodness of God in concealing from us the time of our death. This we are very apt to compla n of, that our lives are so very uncertain, that we know not to-day hut that we may die to-morrow, and we would be mighty glad to meet with any one who would certainly inform us in this matter how long we are to live But if we think a little better of it, we shall be of another mind

For, 1st, Though I presume many of you would be glad to know that you shall certainly live twenty, or thirty, or forty years longer, yet would it be any comfort to know that you must die to-morrow, or some few months, or a year or two hence? which may be your case for aught you know, and this, I believe, you are not very desirous to know, for how would this chill your hlood and spirits! How would it overcast all the pleasures and comforts of life! You would spend your days like men under the sentence of death, while the execution is suspended.

Did all men who must die young certainly know it, it would destroy the industry and improvements of half mankind, which would half destroy the world, or be an insupportable mischief to human societies, for what man who knows that he must die at twenty, or five and twenty, a little sooner or later, would trouble himself with ingenious or gainful arts, or concern lumself any more with this world than just to live so long in it? And yet, how necessary is the service of such men in the world! What great things do they many times do, and what great improvements do they make! How pleasant and diverting is their conversation, while it is innocent How do they enjoy themselves, and give life and spirit to the graver age. How thin would our schools, our shops, our universities, and all places of education be, did they know how little time many of them were to live in the For would such men concern themselves to learn the arts of living, who must die as soon as they have learnt them? Would any father be at a great expense in educating his child, only that he might die with a little Latin and Greek, logick and philosophy? No, half the world must be divided into cloisters and nunueries, and nurseries for the grave

Well, you'll say, suppose that, and is not this an advantage above all the inconveniences you can think of, to secure the salvation of so many thousands who are now eternally ruined by youthful lusts and vanities, but would spend their days in piety and devotion, and make the next world their only care, if they knew how little while they were to live here?

Right I grant this might be a good way to correct the heat and extravagances of youth, and so it would be to shew them heaven and hell, hut God does not think fit to do either, because it offers too much force and violence to men's minds, it is no trial of their virtue, of their reverence for God, of their conquests and victory over this world by the power of faith, but makes religion a matter of necessity, not of choice now God will force and drive no man to heaven, the gospel dispensation is the trial and discipline of ingenuous spirits, and if the certain hopes and fears of another world, and the un certainty of our living here, will not conquer these flattering temptations and make men seriously religious, as those who must certainly die and go into another world, and they know not how soon, God will not try whether the certain knowledge of the time of their death will make them religious. That they may die young, and that thousands do so, is reason enough to engage expect death and prepare for it, if they reverend an appearance you make behind Hammond on the New Testament, a Concordance on one hand and a folio Bible with references on the other. You shall be welcome, sir, replied the gentleman, and perhaps you may find some company more to your own taste, he is but a poor counsel who studies one side of the question only, and therefore I will have your friend Woolston, T——I [Tindal], and C——s [Collins] to entertain you when you do me the favor of the visit. On this we parted in good humor, and all pleased with the appointment made, except the two gentlemen who were to provide the entertainment.

Swond Day -The company met at the time ap pointed, but it happened in this, as in like cases it often does, that some friends to some of the company. who were not of the party the first day, had got notice of the meeting, and the gentlemen who were to debate the question found they had a more numerous audience than they expected or desired. He especially who was to maintain the evidence of the resurrection began to excuse the necessity he was under of disappointing their expectation, alleging that he was not prepared, and he had persisted in excusing himself hut that the strangers who perceived what the case was offcred to withdraw. which the gentleman would by no means consent to they insisting to go, he said he would much rather submit him self to their candor, unprepared as he was, than be guilty of so much rudeness as to force them to leave the com On which one of the company smiling said, It happens luckily that our number is increased, when we were last together we appointed a judge, but we quite forgot a jury, and now I think we are good men and true, sufficient to make one. This thought was pursued in several allusions to legal proceedings, which created some mirth and had this good effect that it dispersed the solemn air which the mutual compliments on the difficulty before mentioned had introduced, and restored the ease and good humour natural to the conversation of gentlemen

The judge perceiving the disposition of the company, thought it a proper time to begin, and called out, Gentlemen of the jury, take your places, and immediately seated himself at the upper end of the table. The company sat round him, and the judge called on the counsel for Woolston to begin.

Mr A, counsel for Woolston, addressing himself to the judge, said, May it please your lordship, I conceive the gentleman on the other side ought to begin, and lay his evidence which he intends to maintain before the court, till that is done it is to no purpose for me to object. I may perhaps object to something which he will not admit to be any part of his evidence, and there fore, I appreliend, the evidence ought in the first place to be distinctly stated

Judge.-Mr B, what say yon to that?

Mr B, counsel on the other side —My Lord, if the evidence I am to maintain were to support any new claim if I were to gain any thing which I am not already possessed of, the gentleman would be in the right, but the evidence is old, and is matter of record, and I have been long in possession of all that I claim under it. If the gentleman has any thing to say to dispossess me, let him produce it, otherwise I have no reason to bring my own title into question. And this I take to be the known method of proceeding in such cases, no man is obliged to produce his title to his possession, it is sufficient if he maintains it when it is called in question

Mr A —Surely, my lord, the gentleman mistakes the case I can never admit myself to be ont of possession of my understanding and reason, and since he would put me out of this possession, and compel me to admit things incredible in virtue of the evidence he maintains he ought to set forth his claim or leave the world to be directed by common sense.

Jndge.—Sir, yon say right on supposition that the truth of the Christian religion were the point in judgment. In that case it would be necessary to produce the evidence for the Christian religion, but the matter now before the court is whether the objections produced by Mr Woolston are of weight to overthrow the evidence of Christ's resurrection. You see then the evidence of the resurrection is supposed to be what it is on hoth sides, and the thing immediately in judgment is the value of the objections, and therefore they must be set forth. The court will be bound to take notice of the evidence, which is admitted as a fret on both parts. Go on, Mr A

Simon Patrick (1626-1707), born at Gainsborough, was educated at Oueen's College, Cambridge. There he came under the influence of John Smith, the Cambridge Platonist, then a youthful Fellow, whom he revered till the end of his life. Successively rector of St Paul's, Covent Garden (1662), and Dean of Peterborough (1678), he became Bishop of Chichester (1689) and of Ely (1691) He was a devout and erudite theo logian, and a sagnetous and catholic Churchman, equally anti-puritan and anti-papal. His sermons, commentaries, and devotional works were long famous, though now they seem prolix enough, amongst them A Brief Exposition of the Ten Commandments and the Lord's Prayer, The Parable of the Pilgrims, The Heart's Ease, The Christian Sacrifice, and The Devout Christian Instructed He translated some Latin hymns, and wrote a number of religious poems autobiography is included in his works (9 vols Clar Press, 1858) In it he tells us that his grandfather was a gentleman of good quality and fair estate, as well as a competent scholar, who had fifteen children, for the younger of whom he could accordingly make but slender provision

He gave his sons a taste of learning, keeping a schoolmaster in his house to instruct them father kept such a tincture of it, that though he was bound apprentice to a mercer, yet he was a great lover of books, and read very much to his dying day He had a great desire to breed me a seholar, and put me early to a master of great fame, but of no great skill in teaching, as I myself found when I came under the tuition of that worthy man Mr Merryweather, who was an excellent Latinist, as he showed by his translation of Religio Medica I ought to acknowledge, what my former master wanted in learning he made up in piety tonehed my heart betimes by his affectionate discourses upon some part of the Chnrch Catechism, which he

Here I dil but lose my time, and therefore my father who sill in his low ecudition was desirous to make my a sololar sent me to Hull, where he had a good friend. Mr I over who, with his wife, were as kind to me as to their own children I went to school every day with a master who preserved what learning I hard, if he did not add unto Mr Foxles who was an a holesale grocer, had such on affiction to me, as his wife had also, that he offered to take me his apprentice for nothing, if I would be of he trade. The was a great tempta tion, he being a great dealer, and a very nell man Pit my father was so lind as to leave me to niv own choice an' I peris ed in riv desire to be a scholar in weich Mr Foxley mightil eucouraged me, and both he and his rufe gave nie some picees of gold, when I sent from them to the university for I had given some proofs of my being religiously in clined, which made them, being pion person, have a riore than or mary love to rie For in tance, when Mr Forley was gone a journey (the always used to pray with his family before he went to held I composed a priver, about the sixteenth year of my age, call said it in the family without book during his ab ence. The was highly acceptable to them, as I hope it was well pleasing to God, tho thu early disposed my to his service

But many things him level my poing to the university, for my father view bringh still lower, and disabled to main aim rise there as he desired. For the parliament softers fluid leving Sir Villiam Pelhams, howe, took away my father's good, which were there with my mother, as well as his Several other loses befoll him, and all the country was so infected both soldiers that it was dangerous to trivel. No withstanding which, my father adventured to carry me round from Boston to I van and so to Cambridge, whereby we pasted without an imperiumen

It was in he year 1644, when I was between when teen and eighteen years old, and had some discretion to govern myalf. His father had recommendations to Dr Whichene and Dr Cuds orth, of Lmanuel College, who, i was loped, might tale me to be their sizer. For my father was so mean then, he could not observise main ain me. They were both very lind, and being full themselves, recommended to Queen's College, which was nevly filled with fellows from thence. Thither we went, and I was admitted there June 25th of that year, under Mr Wells, who loved me very well, insomuch that he left me the ley of his chamber, and of his study, when he was out of town. Here I found myself in a solitary place at first, for though Mr I uller, in his Clurch History, was mital en in saying this college vas like a landwrack (as I think liv words arc) in which there was [not] one lest to Leep por-ession, yet there were about a dozen scholars, and almost half of the old fellows the visitors at first doing no more than putting in a majority of new to govern the college. The others, rarely appear ing, were all turned out for refusing the covenant, which was then so zealously pressed, that all seliolars were summoned to tale it at Trinity College Thither I went, and had it tendered to me But God so directed me, that I, telling them my age, was dismissed, and never heard more of it-blessed be God

I had not been long in the college before the master. Mr Herbert Palmer, took some notice of me, and sent for me to transcribe some things he intended for the press, and soon after made me the college scribe, which brought me in a great deal of money, many leases being to be renewed. It was not long before I had one of the best scholarships in the college bestowed upon me, so that I was advanced to a higher rank, being made a But before I was bachelor of arts this pensioner good man died, who was of an excellent spirit, and was unwearied in doing good. Though he was a little crooked man yet he had such an authority, that the fellows reverenced him as much as we did them, going hare when he passed through the court, which after his death was disused

I remainber very vell that, being a member of the as mills of divines, he sent off to London, and some times sayed there a quarter of a year. But before he went, he was wont to cause the bell to be tolled, to summon us all to meet in the hall. There he made a nathetical speech to us, stirring us up to pious diligened in our studies, and told us, with such seriousness as made us believe he should have as true an account from those he could trust, of the behaviour of every one of us in his absence, as if he were here present with us to observe us himself This he said we should certainly find true at his return he was as good as his word, for those youths whom he heard well of, when he came back to college, he sent for to his lodgings, and commended them, giving holds to the c that were well maintained, and money to the poorer sort. He was succeeded by a good man (Dr Horton), but not such a governor under v hom I was chosen fellow of the college, when I was one year bachelor of arts, before which time I had been so studious as to fill whole books with observations out of various ancient authors, with some of ms own which I made upon them. For I find one book begun in the year 1646, wherein I have noted many useful things, and another more large in the year 1647, having the word alternitas at the top of many pages, by the thought of which I perceive I was quickened to spend my time well. For I have set down what I did every day, and when I tool the liberty to recreate myself

It is a great comfort now in my old age to find that I was so diligent in my youth, for in those books I have noted how I spent my time. What progress I made in 1648 I cannot tell, for I cannot find any book which gives an account of that year, but I have two which relate my improvements in 1649, and the next year, March 21st, 1650, I was admitted master of arts.

Thomas Ken (1637-1711), the saintly Nonjuring bishop, was a native of Little Berl hamp stead in Hertfordshire, and was educated it Winchester and at Hart Hall and New College, Oxford. He held in succession, between 1663 and 1672, livings in Essex, the Isle of Wight, and Hants, but having been elected a Fellow of Winchester College, resided in Winchester till 1679. In 1667 he obtained from Morley, Bishop of Winchester, the living of Brixton, where he wrote his famous morning, evening, and midnight hymns, which he sang daily to his own accompaniment

O father, you can unperplex my mind,
My realm are for my marriage all inclined,
I love, but know not who she is, or where,
And to discover either, I despair,
Despairing, I in celibate would live,
Since I my heart can to no other give,
I feel too great a load in cares of state,
Cares conjugal may much increase the weight,
More hours I fain would in my closet spend,
Pure virgins best the affairs of Heaven attend

Son, said the saint, if yon both lives compare, Both different ways may in God's favour share, Prayers, meditations, and intentions pure, A heart which no temptations can allure, Self abnegation and a conscience clear Enduring no one lust to domineer, All graces which incarnate God enjoin'd, The married equally with virgins bind

Contemplatives have easy loads to bear,
Freer from trouble and distracting care,
Loose from the world, and disembroil'd from sense,
Their prayers may longer be, and more intense
To no relations virgins have a tie
To pluck them back, but unmolested die,
A virgin priest the altar best attends,
Our Lord that state commands not, but commends

Hawkins published the prose works, with a Life, in 1713, as did Round in 1838, and Benham in 1889. Several works attributed to Ken are by most authorities regarded as spurious. Ken's poetical works included hymns po-ms on gospel subjects and the attributed of God two epics Edmund and Hymnothes or the Penatent each in thirteen books. Anodynes Preparations for Death, and Damonet and Dorilla or Chaste Love, a pastoral. They were collected by Hawkins in 4 vols. (1721) and are mostly awkward and tedious. A selection of his 'Hymns and Poems for the Holy Days and Festivals of the Church was published in 1868 as Bishop Ken's Christian Year. It is known that these hymns were highly prized by Keble who apparently took thence the idea of his own Christian Year. See Lives by Bowles (1831), Anderdon (1851-54), Plumptre (2 vols: 1888) and Clarke (1860).

Jeremy Collier (1650-1726) is less remem bered as the conscientious and persecuted Nonjuring bishop than as the trenchant and unsparing castigator of the corrupt stage of his time. was born at Stow-cum-Quy, Cambridgeshire, son of a clerical schoolmaster at Ipswich, and here and at Caius College, Cambridge, he was educated, afterwards becoming rector of Ampton near Bury St Edmunds, and lecturer at Gray's His reply to Burnet's Inquiry into the State of Affairs (1688) cost him some months in New-He next waged warfare on the crown with incisive pamphlets, and was arrested in 1692 on suspicion of being involved in a Jacobite plot 1696 he gave absolution to the would-be assassins Friend and Parkyns on the scaffold, for which offence he was outlawed In 1698 he published his Short View of the Immorality of the English Stage, which fell like a thunderbolt among the 'It is inspiriting,' says Macaulay, 'to see how gallantly the solitary outlaw advances to attack enemies, formidable separately, and, it might have been thought, irresistible when combined, distributes his swashing blows right and left among Wycherley, Congreve, and Vanbrugh, treads the wretched D'Urfey down in the dirt beneath his feet, and strikes with all his strength full at the towering crest of Dryden' argument carried the country with it, and helped to bring back the English drama to good morals and good sense. That excessive stage-profligacy which was partly a reaction against the rigidity of Puritanism, and had far outrun the parallel laxity of contemporary social morals, was immediately to some extent checked But it was not without a struggle that the wits consented to be worsted Congreve and Vanbrugh, with many of the smaller fry, answered angrily but weakly, and were crushed anew by the redoubtable Nonjuror, who was 'conjplete master of the rhetoric of honest indignation' 'Contest,' says Dr Johnson, 'was his delight, he was not to be frighted from his purpose or his prey' There were not merely replies but defences, second defences, and vindications of the Short View by the irrepressible Censor Morum Congreve and Vanbrugh condescended to omit 'several expressions' from the Double Dealer and the Provoked Wife The great Dryden stood apart at first, but at length in the preface to his Fables (1700) acknowledged he had been justly reproved 'I shall say the less of Mr Collier,' he says, 'because in many things he has taxed me justly, and I have pleaded guilty to all thoughts and expressions of mine which can be truly argued of obscenity, profaneness, or immorality, and retract them If he be my enemy, let him triumph, if he be my friend, as I have given him no per sonal occasion to be otherwise, he will be glad of It becomes me not to draw my my repentance pen in the defence of a bad cause, when I have so often drawn it for a good one.'

But Dryden complained, and fairly, that his antagonist had often perverted his meaning, that he was 'too much given to horse-play in his raillery, and came to battle like a dictator from the plough,' and that 'if zeal for God's house had not eaten him up, it had at least devoured some part of his good manners and civility' No doubt Collier erred by pedantry and want of dis-He treats with as fierce indignation whatever appears to him 'profamity' as he does the grossest offences against decency And amongst sins of profaneness he reckons not merely all light allusions to religious words, phrases, and subjects, but any disrespectful comments on Churchmen or ecclesiastical affairs. He does not merely protest against speaking of the clergy at large as hypocrites and impostors, even to assume that some of the clergy were unworthy of their cloth was with him a sin, and the usual ejaculations of impatience were treated as hemous examples of blasphemy have been trying to him, a partisan of the Stewart cause, to have to attack an institution so intimately bound up as was the theatre with the principles of the Restoration, and painful to the High Churchman to be spokesman of an argument usually associated with censorious Presbyterians novelty and scandal of the practice. And first, I shall

In treating of this head, I hope the reader does not expect that I should set down chapter and page, and give bim the citations at length. To do this would be a very unacceptable and foreign employment. Indeed the passages, many of them, are in no condition to be handled be that is desirous to see these flowers let him do it in their own soil 'tis my business rather to kill the root than transplant it. But that the poets may not complain of injustice, I shall point to the infection at a distance, and refer in general to play and person.

Now among the curiosities of this kind we may reckon Mrs Pinchwife, Horner, and Lady Fidget in the Country Wife, Widow Blackacre and Olivia in the Plain Dealer These, tho' not all the exceptionable characters, are the most remarkable. I'm sorry the author should stoop his wit this low, and use his understanding so unkindly Some people appear coarse and slovenly out of poverty they can't well go to the charge of sense. They are offensive like beggars for want of neces sames. But this is none of the Plain Dealer's case, he can afford his muse a better dress when he pleases then the rule is, where the motive is the less the fault is the greater To proceed. Jacinta, Elvira, Dalinda, and Lady Plyant, in the Mock Astrologer, Spanish Friar, Love Triumphant and Double Dealer, forget themselves extreamly and almost all the characters in the Old Batchelour are foul and nauseous. Love for Love and the Rdapse strike sometimes upon this sand, and so likewise does Don Sebastian.

I grant the abuse of a thing is no argument against the use of it. However, young people particularly should not entertain themselves with a lewd picture, especially when 'tis drawn by a masterly liand. For such a liberty may probably raise those passions which can neither be discharged without trouble, nor satisfyed without a crime 'tis not safe for a man to trust his virtue too far, for fear it should give him the slip! But the danger of such an entertainment is but part of the objection. 'tis all scandal and meanness into the bargain. It does in effect degrade himman nature, sinks reason into appetite, and breaks down the distinctions between man and beast. Goals and monkeys, if they could speak, would express their brutality in such language as this

To argue the matter more at large

Smuttness is a fault in behaviour as well as in religion Tis a very coarse diversion, the entertainment of those who are generally least both in sense and station. The looser part of the mob have no true relish of decency and honour, and want education and thought to furnish out a gentile conversation. Barrenness of fancy makes them often take up with those scandalous liberties. A vitious imagination may blot a great deal of paper at this rate with ease enough and 'tis possible convenience may sometimes invite to the expedient. The modern poets seem to use smut as the old ones did machines, to relieve a fainting invention. When Pegasus is jaded and would stand still, he is apt like other tits to run into every puddle.

Obscenity in any company is a rustick uncreditable talent, but among women 'tis particularly rude. Such talk would be very affrontive in conversation, and not endur'd hy any lady of reputation. Whence then comes it to pass that those liberties which disoblige so much in conversation should entertain upon the stage? Do the women leave all the regards to decency and conscience behind them when they come to the play house? Or does the place transform their inclinations, and turn their former aversions into pleasure? Or were their pretences to sobriety elsewhere nothing but hypocrisy and grimace? Such suppositions as these are all satyr and invective they are rude imputations upon the whole sex. To treat the ladies with such stuff is no better than taking their money to abuse them. It supposes their imagination vitious, and their memories ill furnish'd that they are practised in the language of the stews, and pleas'd with the scenes of brutishness. When at the same time the customs of education and the laws of decency are so very cautious and reserv'd in regard to women I say so very reserv'd, that 'tis almost a fault for them to under stand they are ill used. They can't discover their disgust without disadvantage, nor blush without disservice to their modesty. To appear with any skill in such cant looks as if they had fallen upon ill conversation, or managed their curiosity amiss In a word, he that treats the ladies with such discourse must couclude either that they like it, or they do not To suppose the first is a gross reflection upon their virtue. And as for the latter case, it entertains them with their own aversion, which is ill nature, and ill manners enough in all conscience. And in this particular custom and conscience, the forms of breeding and the maxims of religion are on the same In other instances vice is often too fashiouable, but here a man can't be a sinner without being a clown

In this respect the stage is faulty to a scandalous degree of nauseousness and aggravation For

1st The poets make women speak smuttily Of this the places before mention'd are sufficient evidence if there was occasion they might be multiplyed to a much greater number indeed the comedies are seldom clear of these blemishes and sometimes you have them in tragedy For instance. The Orphans Monimia makes a very improper description, and the royal Leonora in the Spanish Friar runs a strange length in the history of love And do princesses use to make their reports with such filsom freedoms? Certainly this Leonora was the first queen of her family Such raptures are too lascivious for Joan of Naples Are these the tender things Mr Dryden says the ladies call on him for? I suppose he means the ladies that are too modest to show their faces in the pit. This entertainment can be fairly design'd for none but such. Indeed it hits their palate exactly It regales their lewdness, graces their character, and keeps up their spirits for their vocation now to bring women under such misbehaviour is violence to their native modesty, and a mispresentation of their sex. For modesty, as Mr Rapin observes, is the character To represent them without this quality is to of women make monsters of them and throw them out of their Euripides, who was no negligent observer of humane nature, is always careful of this decorum Phædra when possess'd with an infamous passion, takes all imaginable pains to conceal it. She is as regular and reserv'd in her language as the most virtuous matron Tis true, the force of shame and desire, the scandal of satisfying and the difficulty of parting with her inclinations, disorder her to distraction. However, her frensy is not lewd, she keeps her modesty even after she has lost her wits. Had Shakespear secur'd this point for his young virgin Ophelia, the play had been better contrivid Since he was resolv'd to drown the lady lile a kitten, he preach and write in defence of the new creed, his first manifesto being The Truth Exalted (1668), and this was immediately followed by The Sandy Foundation Shaken, in which he expressly set himself to refute from Scripture those 'so generally believed and applauded doctrines, viz. the Trinity of distinct and separate persons in the unity of essence, 'the yulgar doctrine of Satisfaction being dependent on the second person of the Trinity,' and 'the Justification of impure persons by an imputative righteousness' Attacks like this on the commonly received doctrines of the Trinity. the Atonement, and Justification by Faith explain the suspicion and abhorrence with which the early Quakers were regarded by all orthodox communions and sects, and for publishing this treatise without license Penn was committed to the Tower Imprisonment only increased his ardour During a confinement of eight months in 1668-69 he produced several treatises, the best of which, No Cross, no Crown, enjoyed great popularity Shortly after his release he was again taken up and tried by the City authorities The jury sympa thised with the persecuted apostle of peace, and would return no harsher verdict than 'Guilty of speaking in Gracechurch Street.' They were browbeat by the insolent court, and kept two days and nights without food, fire, or light, but they would not yield, and their final verdict was 'Not Guilty' Penn and the jury were all thrown into Newgate On an appeal to the Court of Common Pleas, Penn triumphed, but he was imprisoned six months for refusing the oath of allegiance.

In 1670 Admiral Penn died, reconciled to his son, whom he left sole executor of his will admiral's estate was worth £1500 a year, and he had claims on the Government amounting to about In consideration of these unliquidated but acknowledged claims Charles II granted to William Penn-who longed to establish a Christian democracy across the Atlantic-a vast territory on the banks of the Delaware in North America. Penn was constituted sole proprietor and governor He proposed to call his colony Silvania, as being covered with woods. The king is said to liave suggested that, in compliment to the admiral, Penn should be prefixed, and in the charter the colony was named Pennsilvania. Articles for the settlement and government of the new state were drawn up by Penn, with the assistance, it was said (on insufficient grounds), of Algernon Sidney They were liberal and comprehensive, allowing the utmost civil and religious freedom to the colonists governor sailed to America in 1682, and entered into a treaty of peace and friendship with the native tribes, which was religiously observed. The signing of this treaty under an elm tree the Indian king being attended by his sachems or warriors, and Penn accompanied by a large body of his pilgrim-followers, is one of those picturesque pas sages in history on which poets and painters delight to dwell, but unluckily it seems certain that these Lenni Lenape Indians had, as disarmed subjects of the 'Five Nations,' no right to convey to Penn any property in the soil, which was not theirs The governor, having constituted his council or legislative assembly, laid out his capital city of Philadelphia, and governed the colony wisely for two years, with full tolerance for all that was not by Puritanism regarded as wicked (card playing, play-going, &c. being of course strictly forbidden as 'evil sports and games') Murder alone was treated as a capital offence. The colonial dictator returned to England in 1684.

WILLIAM PENN After F Place

For the next four years and a half, till the abdication of James II, Penn appears in the novel character of a court favourite. He attended Whitehall almost daily, his house was crowded with visitors, and in consequence of his supposed influence with the king he might, as he himself says, have amassed great riches He procured the release of about twelve hundred Quaker brethren imprisoned for refusing to take the oath of allegiance or to attend church. So he was accused of being a Jesuit in disguise, and of holding correspondence with the court of Rome Even Tillotson was led to believe this calumny, but was convinced by Penn of the entire falsehood of the charge Lord Macaulay revised some of the accusations against Penn, and represented him as conniving at the intolerance and corruption of the court. The specific cases adduced rest on doubtful evidence, but evidently Penn, misled by a little selfimportance, and childishly hopeful of the great things to be expected from James, had mixed himself up too much with the proceedings of the court, yet could not prevent all acts of cruelty and extortion MrW E. Forster was held to have proved that and goodness. But for all this, I must allow a great advantage to the gentleman, and therefore prefer his station, just as the apostle Paul, who afer he had humbled the Jews, that insulted upon the Christians with their law and rites, gave them the advantage upon all other nations in statutes and judgments. I must grant that the condition of our great men is much to be pre ferred to the ranks of inferior people. For first, they have more power to do good, and if their hearts be equal to their ability, they are blessings to the people of Secondly, the eyes of the people are any country usually directed to them, and if they will be kind, just, and helpful, they shall have their affections and services. Thirdly, they are not under equal straits with the inferior sort, and consequently they have more help, leisure, and occasion to polish their passions and tempers with books and conversation. Fourthly, they have more time to observe the actions of other nations, to travel and view the laws, customs, and interests of other countries. and bring home whatsoever is worthy or imitable. And so an easier way is open for great men to get honour. and such as love true reputation will embrace the best means to it. But because it too often happens that great men do little mind to give God the glory of their prospenty, and to live answerable to his mercies, but on the contrary live without God in the world, fulfilling the lusts thereof, his hand is often seen either in impoverish ing or extinguishing them, and raising up men of more virtue and humility to their estates and dignity ever, I must allow that among people of this rank there have been some of them of more than ordinary virtue, whose examples have given light to their families. And it has been something natural for some of their descen dants to endeavour to keep up the credit of their houses m proportion to the ment of their founder. And to say true, if there be any advantage in such descent, 'tis not from blood but education, for blood has no intelligence in it, and is often spurious and uncertain, but education has a mighty influence and strong bias upon the affec tions and actions of men In this the ancient nobles and gentry of this lingdom did excel, and it were much to be wisht that our great people would set about to recover the ancient occonomy of their houses, the strict and virthous discipline of their ancestors, when men were honoured for their a chievements, and when nothing more exposed a man to shame than his being born to a nobility that he had not a virtue to support.

The following will show the style of the maxims in Fruits of Solitude, some 850 in number

On Temperance

To this a spare diet contributes much Eat therefore to live and do not live to eat That's like a man, but this below a beast.

Have wholesome but not costly food, and be rather cleanly than dainty in ordering it.

The receipts of cookery are swelled to a volume, but a good stomach excels them all, to which nothing contributes more than industry and temperance.

If thou rise with an appetite, thou art sure to sit down with one.

Rarely drink but when thou art dry, nor then between meals, if it can be avoided

The smaller the drink the clearer the head and the cooler the blood, which are great benefits in temper and business.

Strong liquors are good at some times and in small proportions, being better for physic than food, for cordials than common use.

The most common things are the most useful, which shews both the wisdom and goodness of the great Lord of the family of the world

All excess is ill, but drunkenness is the worst sort, it spoils the health, dismounts the mind, and unmans men, it reveals secrets, is quarrelsome, lascivious, impudent, dangerous, and mad, in fine, he that's drunk is not a man, because he is so long void of reason, that distinguishes a man from a beast.

Penn wrote in all over forty works and pamphlets, and his collected works (1726) fill three volumes. There are Lives by Clarkson (1813), Barker (1852), Janney (1852), Hepworth Dixon (new ed 1856), Burdette (1882) Stoughton (new ed 1863), Sparks, Draper Bridges and others. And see Mr Gosses edition of Some Fruits of Solitude (1900).

Robert Barclay (1648-90), the apologist of the Quakers, was born at Gordonstown in Morayshire, the son of Colonel David Barclay, who had served under Gustavus Adolphus, and lost but recovered his estate under Charles II Robert was educated at the Scots College at Paris, of which his uncle was rector, but withstood, not without difficulty, the temptation to become a Catholic. and returned to his native country in 1664. Two years afterwards his father made open profession of the principles of Quakerism, and in 1667, when only nineteen years of age, Robert Barclay became 'fully convinced,' as his friend William Penn has expressed it, 'and publicly owned the testimony of the true light.' His first defence of the new doctrines, Truth cleared of Calumnies (1670), was a reply to a book published in Aberdeen Barclay walked through the streets of Aberdeenunseasonably-clothed in sackcloth and ashes, and published a Seasonable Warning and Serious Exhortation to and Expostulation with the Inhabitants of Aberdeen Other controversal treatises followed A Catechism and Confession of Faith (1673), and The Anarchy of the Ranters (1676) His great work, originally written and published in 1676 in Latin, appeared in English in 1678, and is entitled An Apology for the true Christian Divinity, as the same is held forth and preached by the People called in scorn Quakers, &-c His appeal in it to the king had no effect in stopping persecution, for after Barclay's return from Holland and Germany, which he visited now and later in company with Fox and Penn, he was in 1677 imprisoned along with many other Quakers at Aberdeen, through the procurement of Archbishop Sharp In prison he wrote a treatise on Universal Love He was soon liberated, and subsequently gained favour at court. Both Penn and he were on terms of intimacy with James II, and just before the sailing of the Prince of Orange for England in 1688, Barclay in a private conference with His Majesty urged James to make some concessions to the people. He was one of twelve Quakers who in 1682 acquired East New Jersey, and was thereafter appointed nominal governor, with power to appoint a deputy frequently to lie, because the persons obtaining these titles, either by election or hereditarily, may frequently be found to have nothing really in them deserving them or answering to them as some to whom it is said. Your Excellency, liaving nothing of excellency in them, and he who is called I our Grace appears to be an enemy to grace, and he who is called Your Hononr is known to I wonder what law of man or be base and igroble what patent ought to oblige me to make a lie, in calling good evil, and evil good I wonder what law of man can secure me in so doing from the just judgment of God, that will make me account for every idle word. And to lie is something more. Surely Christians should be ashamed that such laws, manifestly crossing the law of God, should be among them

Fourthly, as to those titles of Holiness, Eminency, and Excellency, used among the Papists to the pope and cardinals, &c., and Grace, Lordship, and Worship, used to the clergy among the Protestants, it is a most blasphemous usurpation For if they use Holiness and Grace because these things ought to be in a pope or in a bishop, how came they to usurp that peculiarly to themselves? Ought not holiness and grace to be in every Christian? And so every Christian should say Your Holiness and Your Grace one to another Next, how can they in reason claim any more titles than were practised and re ceived by the apostles and primitive Christians, whose successors they pretend they are, and as whose successors (and no otherwise) themselves, I judge, will confess any honour they seek is due to them? Now if they neither sought, received, nor admitted such honour nor titles, how came these by them? If they say they did, let them prove it if they can we find no such thing in The Christians speak to the apostles the Scripture without any such denomination, neither saying, If it please your Grace, Your Holiness, nor Your Worship, they are neither called My Lord Peter, nor My Lord Paul, nor yet Master Peter, nor Master Paul, nor Doctor Peter, nor Doctor Paul, but singly Peter and Paul, and that not only in the Scripture, but for some hun dreds of years after so that this appears to be a manifest fruit of the apostacy For if these titles arise either from the office or worth of the persons, it will not be demed but the apostles deserved them better than any now that call for them. But the case is plain, the apostles had the holiness, the excellency, the grace, and because they were holy, excellent, and gracious, they neither used nor admitted such titles, but these having neither holiness, excellency, nor grace, will needs be so called to satisfy their ambitious and ostentatious mind, which is a mani fest token of their hypocrisy

Fifthly, as to that title of Majesty usually ascribed to princes, we do not find it given to any such in the Holy Scripture, but that it is specially and peculiarly ascribed unto God We find in the Scripture the proud Ling Nebuchadnezzar assuming this title to himself, who at that time received a sufficient reproof by a sudden judg ment which came upon him. Therefore in all the com pellations used to princes in the Old Testament it is not to be found, nor act in the New Paul was very civil to Agrippa, yet he gives him no such title. Neither was this title used among Christians in the primitive times. Hence the Ecclesiastical History of the Reformation of France, relating the speech of the Lord Rochefort at the assembly of the estates of France held under Charles the Ninth in the year 1560, saith, 'That this harangue was well remarked in that he used not the word Majesty, invented by flatterers of late years.' And yet this author [Beza] minded not how his master Calvin used this flattering title to Francis the First, King of France, and not only so, but calls him Most Christian King in the epistle to his Institutions, though by his daily persecuting of the Reformers it was apparent he was far from such even in Calvin's own esteem. Snrely the complying with such vain titles, imposed and introduced by Anti-christ, greatly tended to stain the Reformation and to render it defective in many things.

Barclay 5 Apology and Catechum have been often reprinted, his works were collected in 1692 (1 vol. folio), and republished in 1718

Thomas Ellwood (1639-1713), Milton's Quaker friend, was born at Crowell in Oxford of good family, was educated mainly at the Free School of Thame, and till his conversion to Quakerism in 1659 was a sprightly and rather foppish youth 'taking my swing,' as he writes, 'in all such vain courses as were accounted harmless recreations? His father, as averse to the new creed as Admiral Penn, sometimes beat him with great severity. particularly when the son persisted in remaining covered in his presence. In a succession of embarrassing interviews, Squire Ellwood knocked or 'tore violently' off Thomas's head all the young man's hats, one after the other, and he seems to have been well provided. But there remained another cause of offence

Whenever I had occasion to speak to my father. though I had no hat now to offend him, yet my language did as much, for I durst not say 'you' to him, but 'thou' or 'thee,' as the occasion required, and then he would be sure to fall on me with his fists. At one of these times. I remember, when he had beaten me in that manner, he commanded me, as he commonly did at such times, to go to my chamber, which I did, and he followed me to the bottom of the stairs Being come thither, he gave me a parting blow, and in a very angry tone said 'Sirrah, if ever I hear you say thou or thee to me again, I'll strike your teeth down your throat.' I was greatly gneved to hear him say so, and feeling a word rise in my heart unto him, I turned again, and calmly said unto him 'Should it not be just if God should serve thee so, when thou sayest "thou" or "thee" to him?' Though his hand was up, I saw it sink, and his countenance fall, and he turned away, and left me standing there.

Ellwood is specially interesting as having been a pupil of Milton, and one of those who read to the blind poet in 1662, his services as reader securing from Milton in return guidance in his own studies for two months, until they were ended by illness and a succession of imprisonments His later life was largely spent in controversy and in suffering persecution, mainly for refusing to take the oath of allegiance. The History of the Life of Thomas Ellwood written by his own hand, hut completed b) a friend, was first published in 1714, and often republished (5th ed 1855, ed by Henry Morley, 1885, h<sub>3</sub> C G Crump in 1900) Ellwood furnishes interesting facts about the London prisons, in which he and many of his brother Quakers were confined, and the manner in which they were treated both there and out of doors. It is melancholy to note how very few of all the miseries of their lives would have hefallen them, or how swiftly they could have been got over, had the Quakers been able to make the merely formal concession required of them-on the hat question and the thou question at home, and ahout taking of the oath of allegiance when brought before the magistrates Though as a Quaker faithful unto the utmost extremity, Ellwood evidently found the 'old man' in him asserting itself pretty often in the way of righteous indignation and the impulse to strenuous self defence, and unlike the stricter Friends, he had no scruples about providing for the defence of himself and comrades before the law-courts by help of professional lawyers Besides his own Life, Ellwood wrote a score of controversial treatises, including A Seasonable Dissuasive from Persecution, A Fair Examination of a Foul Paper, Truth Defended, Sacred Histories of the Old and New Testaments, and more than one volume of poems, including a Daviders in five books He edited the Journal of his friend George Fox

In his Life he describes his intercourse with Milton, whose literary standing he defines in a sufficiently surprising manner, and expounds the poet's insistence on a quite un English and a specifically Italian pronunciation of Latin

Milton as Latin Tutor

I mentioned before that when I was a boy I had made some good progress in learning, and lost it all again before I came to be a man, nor was I rightly sensible of my loss therein till I came among the Quakers then I both saw my loss and lamented it, and applied myself with nimost diligence at all leisure times to recover it, so false I found that charge to be which in these times was east as a reproach upon the Quakers, that they despised and decried all human learning, because they denied it to be necessary to a gospel ministry, which was one of the controversies of those times But though I toiled hard and spared no pains to regain what once I had been master of, yet I found it a matter of so great diffi culty that I was ready to say as the noble eunuch to Philip in another case, 'How can I, unless I had some man to guide me?' This I had formerly complained of to my especial friend Isaae Pennington, but now more earnestly, which put him upon considering and contriing a means for my assistance.

He had an intimate aequaintance with Dr Paget, a physician of note in London, and he with John Milton, a gentleman of great note throughout the learned world for the accurate pieces he had written on various subjects and occasions. This person, having filled a public station in the former times, lived now a private and retired life in London, and having wholly lost his sight kept always a man to read to him, which usually was the son of some gentleman of his acquaintance, whom in kindness he took to improve in his learning. Thus by the mediation of my friend Isaac Pennington with Dr Paget, and of Dr Paget with John Milton, was I admitted to come to him, not as a servant (which at that time he needed not), nor to be in the house with him, but only to have the liberty acknowledgment for the favour he had done me in communicating it to me. He asked me how I liked it, and what I thought of it, which I modestly but freely told him, and after some further discourse about it, I pleasantly said to him 'Thou hast said much here of Paradice lost, but what hast thon to say of Paradise found?' He made me no answer, but sat some time in a muse, then brake off that discourse, and fell upon another subject

After the sickness was over, and the city well cleansed, and become safely habitable again, he returned thither And when afterwards I went to wait on him there, which I seldom failed of doing whenever my occasions drew me to London, he shewed me his second poem, called Paradise Regaired, and in a pleasant tone said to me 'This is owing to you, for you put it into my head at Chalfont, which before I had not thought of'

Dr Thomas Sprat, Bishop of Rochester (1635-1713), was praised by Dr Johnson as 'an author whose pregnancy of anagmation and eloquence of language have deservedly set him high in the ranks of literature.' Lord Macaulay also eulogised him as 'a very great master of our language, and pessersed at once of the eloquence of the orator, the controversialist, and the historian' Born at Beaminster in Dorset, at Wadham College, Oxford, he studied mathematics under its warden, Dr Wilkins, in whose house scientific inquirers used to meet Sprat's intimacy with Wilkirs led to his election in 1663 as a member of the Royal Society, and in 1667 he published the history of that learned body, with the object of dissipating the prejudice and suspicion with which it was regarded by the public. Ordained in 1661, he was appointed chaplain to the Duke of Buckingham, whom he is said to have aided in writing the Rehearsal, in 1676 he was made chaplain to the king Successively Canon of Westminster (1669), Canon of Windsor (1681), and Dean of Westminster 1733), he obtained the see of Rochester in 1684. I may ear, by command of King Charles, he pub -hed an account of the Ryehouse Plot, for which, after the Revolution, he printed an apology, but having submitted to the new government, he was allowed, notwithstanding his attachment to the abdicated monarch, to remain unmolested in his bishopric. In 1692 he was falsely charged with 30 ning in a conspiracy for the restoration of Junes, but cleared himself after a confinement of eleven days In his earlier days Sprit wrote poems long included in collections of poetry-one on the death of the Protector (1658), and a Pindaric Ode on the Plague of Athens (1659) His reply to Sorbières' Voyage en Angleterre (1663) was a defence of England and Englishmen, 'full of Just satire and ingenuity,' as Addison said. But his best known work was his History of the Royal Society The Life of his friend Cowley (1667) Dr Johnson called 'a funeral oration rather than a biography' Two collections of sermons (1697 and 1710) were popular 'his language,' said Doddridge, 'is always beautiful.' Sprat was over-much given to hospitality, and over-profuse in expenditure.

God revealed in Experimental Philosophy

We are guilty of false interpretatious of providences and wonders, when we either make those to be miracles that are none, or when we put a false sense on those that are real, when we make general events to have a private aspect, or particular accidents to have some universal signification. Though both these may seem at first to have the strictest appearance of religion, yet they are the greatest usurpations on the secrets of the Almighty, and unpardonable presumptions on his high prerogatives of punishment and reward

And now, if a moderating of these extravagances must be esteemed profaneness, I profess I cannot absolve the experimental philosopher. It must be granted that he will be very scrupnlous in believing all manner of commentaries on prophetical visions, in giving liberty to new predictions, and in assigning the causes and marking ont the paths of God's judgments amongst his creatures.

He cannot suddenly conclude all extraordinary events to be the immediate finger of God, because he familiarly beholds the inward workings of things, and thence perceives that many effects, which use to affinght the ignorant, are brought forth by the common instruments of nature. He cannot be suddenly inclined to pass censure on men's eternal condition from any temporal judgments that may befall them, because his long converse with all matters, times, and places has taught him the truth of what the Scripture says, that 'all things happen alike to all? He cannot blindly consent to all imaginations of devout men about future contingencies, seeing he is so rigid in examining all particular matters He cannot be forward to assent to spiritual raptures and revelations, because he is truly acquainted with the tempers of men's bodies, the composition of their blood, and the power of fancy, and so better under stands the difference between diseases and inspirations

But in all this he commits nothing that is irreligious. 'Tis true, to deny that God has heretofore warned the world of what was to come, is to contradict the very Godhead itself, but to reject the sense which any pri wate man shall fasten to it, is not to disdain the Word of God, but the opinions of men like ourselves. To declare against the possibility that new prophets may be sent from heaven, is to insinnate that the same infinite Wisdom which once shewed itself that way is now at an end But to slight all pretenders that come without the help of miracles, is not a contempt of the Spirit, but a just circumspection that the reason of men be not overreached To deuy that God directs the course of human things is stupidity, but to hearken to every prodigy that men frame against their enemies, or for themselves, is not to reverence the power of God, but to make that serve the passions, the interests, and revenges of men

It is a dangerous mustake into which many good men fall, that we neglect the dominion of God over the world if we do not discover in every turn of himan actions many supernatural providences and miraculous events. Whereas it is enough for the honor of his government that he guides the whole creation in its wonted course of causes and effects as it makes as much for the reputation of a prince's wisdom, that he can rule his subjects peaceably by his known and standing laws, as that he is often forced to make use of extraordinary justice to pumish or reward

Let us then imagine our philosopher to have all slowness of belief and rigour of trial, which hy some is miscalled a blindness of mind and hardness of heart. Let us suppose that he is most unwilling to grant that anything exceeds the force of nature but where a full evidence convinces him. Let it be allowed that he is always alarmed, and ready on his guard, at the noise of any miraculous event, lest his indement should be sur prised by the disguises of faith. But does he by this diminish the anthority of ancient miracles? or does lie not rather confirm them the more, by confining their number, and taking care that every falsehood should not mingle with them? Can he by this undermine Christianity, which does not now stand in need of such extraordinary testimonies from heaven? or do not they rather endanger it who still venture its truths on so hazardous a chance, who require a continuance of signs and wonders, as if the works of our Saviour and his apostles had not been sufficient? Who ought to be esteemed the most carnally minded-the enthusiast that pollutes religion with his own passions, or the experi menter that will not use it to flatter and obey his own desires, but to subdue them? Who is to be thought the greatest enemy of the gospel—he that loads men's faiths by so many improbable things as will go near to make the reality itself suspected, or he that only admits a few arguments to confirm the evangelical doctrines, but then chooses those that are unquestionable?

By this I hope it appears that this inquiring, this scrupulous, this incredulous temper, is not the disgrace but the honour of experiments. And therefore I will declare them to be the most seasonable study for the present temper of our nation. This wild amusing men's minds with prodigies and conceits of providence has been one of the most considerable causes of those spiritual distractions of which our country has long been the theatre This is a vanity to which the English seem to have been always subject above others is scarce any modern historian that relates our foreign wars but he has this objection against the disposition of our countrymen, they used to order their affairs of the greatest importance according to some obscure omens or predictions that passed amongst them on little or no foundations. And at this time, especially this last year [1666], this gloom, and ill boding humour has prevailed. So that it is now the fittest season for experi ments to anse, to teach us a wisdom which springs from the depths of knowledge, to shake off the shadows and to scatter the mists which fill the minds of men with a vain consternation. This is a work well becoming the most Christian profession For the most apparent effect which attended the passion of Christ was the putting of an eternal silence on all the false oracles and dissembled inspirations of ancient times

Cowley's Love of Retirement

Upon the kings happy restoration, Mr Cowley was past the fortieth year of his age, of which the greatest part had been spent in a various and tempestinous condition. He now thought he had saerificed enough of his life to his curiosity and experience. He had en joyed many excellent occasions of observation. He had been present in many great revolutions, which in that timultuous time disturbed the peace of all our neighbour opposed the course of a government in a pure and unselfish spirit, that man was Lord William The suspicious correspondence with Barillon (see the section on ALGERNON SIDNEI, Vol I page 715) leaves him unsullied, for the ambassador distinctly mentions Russell and Lord Holles as two who would not accept bribes When brought to trial (July 1683), under the same circumstances as those which have been related in Sidney's case—with a packed jury and a brutal judge-and refused a counsel to conduct his defence, the only grace that was allowed him was to have an amanuensis When Lord Russell asked, 'May I have somebody to write, to assist my memory?, the Attorney-General answered, 'Yes, a servant,' and the Lord Chief-Justice added, 'Any of your servants shall assist you in writing anything you please for you.' But Lord Russell proudly replied, 'My wife is here, my lord, to do it.' And when the spectators turned their eyes and beheld the devoted lady rising to and her lord in his uttermost distress, a thrill of sympathy ran through the assembly Lady Russell, after the condemnation of her husband, personally pled for his pardon, but in vain. He loved her as such a wife deserved to be loved, and on taking his final farewell of her, said, 'The bitterness of death is now past!' Fifty years after Lady Russell's death appeared that collection of her Letters which entitled her to a place in our literary history Dr Fitzwilliam, her father's chaplain, became Canon of Windsor Lord William Cavendish, afterwards second Duke of Devonshire, married Lady Russell's daughter Henri Massue de Ruvigni, Lidy Russell's cousin, was a Huguenot noble (son of a French ambassador) who settled in England on the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, took service under William III, and was made Viscount (1692) and Earl (1697) of Galway

To Dr Fitzwillam.

As you profess, good Doctor, to take pleasure in your writings to me, from the tesumony of a conscience to forward my spiritual welfare, so do I to receive them'as one to me of your friendship in both worldly and spiritual concernments, doing so, I need not waste my time nor yours to tell you they are very valuable to me. That you are so contented to read mine, I make the just allowance for, not for the worthiness of them, I know it cannot be, but however, it enables me to keep up an advantageous conversation without scruple of being too troublesome. You say something sometimes, by which I should think you seasoned or rather tainted with being so much where compliment or praising is best learned, but I conclude that often what one heartily wishes to be in a friend, one is apt to believe is so. The effect is not nought towards me, whom it animates to have a true, not false title to the least virtue you are disposed to attribute to me. Let I am far from such a vigour of mind as surmounts the secret discontent so hard a destiny as mine has fixt in my breast, but there are times the mind can hardly feel displeasure as while such friendly conversation entertaineth it, then a grateful sense moves one to express the courtesie.

If I could contemplate the conducts of Providence with the uses you do, it would give ease indeed, and no disas trous events should much affect us. The new scenes of each day make me often conclude myself very void of temper and reason, that I still shed tears of sorrow and not of joy, that so good a man is landed safe on the happy shore of a blessed eternity, doubtless he is at rest, tho' I find none without him, so true a partner he was in all my joys and griefs. I trust the Almighty will pass hy this my infirmity. I speak it in respect to the world. from whose enticing delights I can now be better weaned I was too rich in possessions whilst I possest him relish is now gone, I bless God for it, and pray, and ask of all good people (do it for me from such you know are so) also to pray that I may more and more turn the stream of my affections upwards, and set my heart upon the ever-satisfying perfections of God, not starting at his darkest providences, but remembering continually either his glory, justice, or power is advanced by every one of them, and that mercy is over all his works, as we shall one day with ravishing delight see in the mean time. I endeavour to suppress all wild imaginations a melancholy fancy is apt to let in, and say with the man in the gospel 'I believe, help thou my unbelief'

WOBORNE ABBY, 27th Noor 1685

To Lord Cavendish.

Tho' I know my letters do Lord Cavendish no service, yet as a respect I love to pay him, and to thank him also for his last from Limbeck, I had not been so long silent, of the death of two persons both very near and dear to me had not made me so uncomfortable to myself, that I knew I was utterly unfit to converse where I would never be ill company The separation of friends is My sister Mountague was one I loved ten derly, my Lord Gainsborough was the only son of a sister I loved with too much passion they both deserved to be remembered kindly by all that knew them both began their race long after me, and I hoped should have ended it so too, but the great and wise Disposer of all things, and who knows where 'tis best to place his creatures, either in this or in the other world, has ordered it otherwise. The hest improvement we can make in these cases, and you, my dear Lord, rather than I, whose glass runs low, while you are young, and I hope have many happy years to come, is, I say, that we should all reflect there is no passing thro' this to a better world without some crosses, and the scene sometimes shifts so fast, our course of life may be ended before we think we have gone half way, and that a happy eternity depends on our spending well or ill that time allotted us here for probation

Live virtuously, my lord, and you can't dye too soon, nor live too long I hope the last shall be your lot, with many blessings attending it 29th October 1690.

To the Earl of Galway

I have before me, my good lord, two of your letters, both partially and tenderly kind, and coming from a sincere heart and honest mind (the last a plain word, but, if I mistake not, very significant) are very comfort able to me, who, I hope, have no proud thoughts of myself as to any sort. The opinion of an esteemed friend, that one is not very wrong, assists to strengthen a weak and willing mind to do her duty towards that

Almighty Being who has from infinite bounty and goodness so checkered my days on this earth, as I can thank fully reflect I felt many, I may say as many years of pure and (I trust) innocent, pleasant content, and happy enjoy ments as this world can afford, particularly that higgest blessing of loving and being loved by those I loved and respected, on earth no enjoyment certainly to be put in the ballance with it. All other are like wine, which intoxicates for a time, but the end is bitterness, at least not profitable. Mr Waller, whose picture you look upon, has, I long remember, these words

'All we know they do above

Is that they sing and that they love'

The best news I have heard is, you have two good companions with you, which I trust will contribute to divert you this sharp season, when, after so sore a fit as I apprehend you have felt, the air even of your improving pleasant garden can't be enjoyed without hazard.

Richard Cumberland (1631-1718), born at London, and educated at St Paul's and at Cambridge, held various cures from 1658, and was raised by King William to the see of Peterborough in 1691 He had published, in 1672, a Latin work, De Legibus Natura Disquisitio Philosophica, 'A Philosophical Inquiry into the Laws of Nature, in which their form, order, promulgation, and obligation are investigated from the nature of things, and in which also the philosophical principles of Hobbes, moral as well as civil, are considered and refuted? This erudite but verbose treatise expounds some novel views. and lays down a distinctly utilitarian criterion in The laws of nature he deduces from the results of human conduct, regarding that to be commanded by God which conduces to the happiness of man The public good is the summum bonum, and 'universal benevolence' the fountain of all virtue. He wrote also a learned essay on Jewish Weights and Measures (1686), dedicatedoddly enough-to his friend Samuel Pepvs, then President of the Royal Society, and a translation of Sanchomatho's Phanician History (translated from Eusebius, with disquisitions, not published till 1720) He was a really learned man and an acute thinker, but at best a poor writer sentences are involved, he lacks humour and vivacity, grace and point, and his works are hopelessly tedious even where most suggestive. In the performance of his Episcopal duties he displayed rare activity, moderation, and benevolence. When expostulated with by friends about his too great labours, he replied with the now proverbial maxim, 'I will do my duty as long as I can, a man had better wear out than rust out.' Yet he lived to the age of eighty-six, in the enjoyment of such mental vigour that he successfully studied Coptic only three years before his death. The dramatist who bore the bishop's name was his great-grandson.

There is a Life by Payne prefixed to the Sanchoniathon (1720). The De Legibus was twice translated (by Meacock in 1727, by Towers in 1750).

The self, I mean thy Better Half, already Dead!
The Tear, were just which at thy Birth did flow,
For then, alass! thou cams't t'engage
The Miseries of Life, but now
Thou art allowed to quit the Tragick Stage,
Now to be careful to prolong the seene,
And act thy Troubles o'er agen,

Is Tolly not to be forgiv'n even in thy doating Age

Can Cramps, Catarrhs, and Palsies be Such charming Company?
What Pleasures can the grave deprive Thy Senses of? what Inconvenience give,
From which thou art exempted while alive?
At worst thou canst but have Cold lodging in the grave,
Nor ly'st thou warmer now, tho' cover'd o'er

In Turr, till thy faint limbs can bear no more.

Thou leeps't each might in so much Sear cloth bound,
Thou det need no more to lodge thee underground

Nicholas Brady (1659-1726), born at Bandon, as educated at Westminster, Christ Church (Oxford), and Dublin, and held from 1696 to his death the living of Richmond, along with Stratford-on Avon and Clapham in succession. He also kept a school at Richmond. The metrical version of the Psalms by him and Tate was authorised in 1696. His tragedy, The Rape, on a plot from the history of the Goths and Vandals, his blankverse Eneid, his Ode for St Cecilia's Day, and his sermons have long since sunk into deserved oblivion.

Thomas Tenison (1636-1715), Archbishop of Canterbury, born at Cottenham in Cambridge shire, studied at Corpus Christi, Cambridge, and was made Bishop of Lincoln by William III in 1691, and primate of all England in 1694. He was a favourite at court, crowned Queen Anne and George I, and strongly supported the Hanoverian succession. His works comprise anti-papal tracts, sermons, and a criticism of Hobbes, but though Swift was unfair when he said he was a very dull man, the Archbishop was not a power in literature, and his books are not read.

Matthew Menry (1662-1714) was born at Broad Oak farmhouse, Malpas, Flintshire, the son of Philip Henry, a pious and learned minister, just ousted by the Act of Uniformity. He entered as a student of law in Gray's Inn, but, yielding to a strong desire for the office of the ministry, he soon abandoned the pursuit of the law, and turned his attention to theology, which he studied with great diligence and zcal. In 1687 he was chosen pastor of a Nonconformist congregation at Chester, whence he removed in 1712 to Hackney Of a variety of theological works published by him, the largest and best I nown is his Exposition of the Old as d New Testaments (1710), which he did not live to complete, the Commentary on the Epistles being added by various divines. The work has little exegetical value, and is far from being a safe guide to the actual meaning of the sacred text, but as a treasury of practical religion and manual of hints for pulpit use, it soon secured a place in the very first class of expositors vorks Robert Hall for the last two years of his life read daily two chapters of Matthew Henry's Commentary, increasingly delighted with the cop ousness, variety, and pious ingenuity of the thoughts, the simplicity, strength, and pregnancy of the expressions. Chalmers was a warm admirer of Henry, and for nearly two centuries the Commentar was the constant study companion and vade-recum of a very large proportion of evangelical preachers of all denominations in English-speaking countries and colonies The following extract from the exposition of Matthew vi. 21 may be taken as a specimen of the persons and pointed remarks with which the work abounds

'Te cannot serve God and Memmon.'

Mamrion 's a Syriack word that signifies gain, so that whatever it is in this world that is, or that we account to be gain to us (as S. Paul speaks, Phil iii 7), that's mammon 'Whatever is in the world, the last of the fiesh, the lnst of the eye, and the pride of life,' it is mammon. To some their belly is their mammon, and they serve that; to others, their ease, their sports and pastimes, are their mammon, to others, worldly riches, to o ners, honours and preferments the praise and applanse of men was the Phansees' mammon, in a word, self, the nn tv m which the world's trinity centres. sensual secular self, is the mammon which cannot be served in conjunction vall God for if it be served, 'tis in competition with him, and in contradiction to him He does no say we must not, or we should not, but we canno serve God and mammon, we cannot love both, or hold to both, or hold by both, in ob ervance, obedience, attendance, trus', and dependence, for they 'My are contrary the one to the other. God saith son, give me thine heart, Mainmon saith 'No, give it me' God saith 'Be content with such things as ye have,' Mammon saith 'Grasp at all that ever thou cana--" Rem, rem, quocunque modo rem."' God saith 'Defraud no , never tell a lye, be honert and just in all the dealings, ' Mammon saith 'Cheat thy own father if thou canst get by it' sanh 'Be chantable,' Mammon sanh 'Hold thy own, this giving undoes us all.' God saith 'Be careful for nothing,' Mammon south 'Be careful for every thing' God saith 'Keep holy the Sabbath-day,' Hammon saith 'Make use of that day, as well as any other, for the world' Thus inconsistent are the commands of God and Mammon, so that we cannot serve both Let us not, then, halt between God and Baal, but "chuse you this day's hom ye will serve," and abide by your choice.

Henry Aldrich (1647-1710), born at Westmunster, passed in 1662 from Westmunster School to Christ Church, Oxford, of which he became a canon in 1682, and dean in 1689. He it was who urged Charles Boyle to edit the Epistles of Phalaris (see Vol I p 754), and so started a memorable controvers. He designed the Peckwater Quadrangle, wrote the well-known catch, 'Hark, the bonny Christ Church Bells,' and a 'smoling catch' for four smokers, set. English words to Italian anthems and songs, and indited Latin verses and epigrams, but he is less remembered as architect, verse-writer, composer, or inveterate smoker than as the author of the Artis Logica Compendium (1691), which was long a standard text-book, and of which, though it is a by no means brilliant performance, a new edition appeared in 1862.

Humphrey Prideaux (1648-1724), born at Padstos, from Westminster passed to Christ Church, Oxford His Marmora Oxoniensia (1676), an account of the Arundel Marbles, procured for him patronage through which he was in 1679 appointed rector of St Clement's, Oxford, and erelong a canon of Norwich 1688 he became Archdeacon of Suffolk, and in 1702 Dean of Norwich His nine works include a Life of Mahon et (1697), Directions to Churchwardens (1701, 15th ed. 1886), and The Old and New Testamert connected in the History of the Jews and Neighbouring Nations (1715-17, 27th ed 1876) See Prideaux's Letters to John Ellis (Camden Soc. 1875) In virtue of the first and last named books he long ranked as a historian. The Life of Mahomet is wholly polemical, levelled as much against the English deists as against the Arabian impostor But Prideaux's Connection, as the more important work was generally called, was a solid contribution to the knowledge of the subject, though in nowise profound or original, and was only superseded in general use by more scholarly works a century and a half after its appearance.

Sir George Etherege, the Restoration dramatist who in England founded the comedy of intrigue, was born probably in 1634. He lived much in his early life at Paris, studied law, had an intrigue with the actress Mrs Barry (on whose daughter he afterwards settled £6000), was knighted and married a wealthy widow, and in 1686 was Resident at the Imperial court at Ratisbon He varied the monotony of what he regarded as banishment with coursing, drinking, play, flirtation with actresses, and correspondence with Middleton, Dryden, Betterton, and others He seems to have died in Paris in 1691, and not, as used to be said, by falling downstairs after a banquet at Ratis-He sought his inspiration in Molière, and out of his comedy of intrigue grew the legitimate comed, of manners that culminated in Congreve and rendered possible the dramatic triumphs of Goldsmith and Sheridan The Jonsonian types and 'humours' made way for real characters, sketched from the life even when the portraiture is but superficial, his fops are unsurpassed He is less brutal and more sprightly and frivolous than Wycherley, but not so eminent a master of theatrical effect, several of his characters are more perfectly individualised, more human, concrete, and living than either Wycherley's or Congreve's, though Congreve's worl shows Rochester lamented that Etherege's more power indolence checked the productiveness of a min 'who had as much sense, fance, judgment, and wit as any writer of the day' His three plays are The Comical Revenge, or, Love is a Tub (1664), She World of She Could (1668), and The Mar of Mode, or, Sir Fopling Flutter (1676)-all The first is mainly highly popular in their day a farce, the second has serious scenes and a good deal of buffoonery, the third is the best and most readable. Dorimant, accepted as a sketch of Rochester, and Sir Fopling a study of the then famous Beau Hewitt, with points taken from Etherege himself, passed into literature as striking characterisations Medley was Sir Charles Sedley With all his grossness, 'gentle George' shows both restraint and a certain distinction

See Gosse's Seventeenth Century Studies (1883), and the edition of Etherege's works by A. W. Verny (1888).

Thomas Shadwell, a dramatic writer of some note in his day, though now hardly remembered save as the 'MacFlecknoe' of Dryden's satire, was born in 1640 or 1642 at Broomhill House, near Brandon in Norfolk, the son of a gentleman of He passed from Cambridge without a degree to the Middle Temple, but not finding law to his liking, he deserted it, and after an interval of foreign travel, betook himself seriously to literature. His first comedy of The Sullen Lovers (1668), based on Molicre, had great success, and he continued from year to year to entertain the town with a succession of pieces. of which nearly a score are extant and fill a complete edition in four volumes (1720) condemned The Royal Shepherdess (1668) for its silliness. The Humourists is not open to the same criticism Lpsom Wells (1720) is coarse but clever The Miser is Moliere's Avaie with new characters and incidents The Enchanted Island is a rifacimento of Shakespeare's Tempest, and in his preface to Timon of Athens, while professing respect for 'the inimitable hand of Shakespear,' Shadwell 'can truly say, I have made it into a play,' by dislocating the action, introducing new and superfluous characters (especially women) and new scenes and passages, omitting much of the best, abridging, paraphrasing, and expanding Shakespeare's words, and transmogrifying the whole into a caricature The Libertine has Don Juan for hero The True Widow. The Lancashire Witches, The Squire of Alsatia, Bury Fair, The Amorous Bigot, and The Volunteers (not published till 1693) are others of the Shadwell made Ben Jonson his model, and sought to amuse by the humours or eccen tricities of his typical characters, but most of his plays belong rather to the comedy of manners as illustrated by Wycherley Shadwell also wrote numerous odes and occasional poems The immortality which the plays must have failed to achieve for him he vas fated to attain in another way With Dryden he was at first on terms of friendly intimacy, and indeed the great poet contributed the prologue to his True Widow, but when Dryden flung his Absalom and Achitophel and The Medal into the cause of the court, Shadwell was rash enough to make a gross attack upon him in the Medal of John Bayes, with such uncomplimentary terms as 'half wit, half-fool,' 'abandoned rascal,' 'knavery,' and the like. Dryden heaped deathless ridicule upon his antagonist in the stinging satire of MacFlecknoe and as 'Og' in the second part of Absalom and Achitophel MacFlecknoe is called on the titlepage 'a Satire on the True Blue Protestant T S,' described further as the literary heir and representative of Flecknoe, whom Dryden thought proper to treat as a despicable rhymester (see Vol. I p 784)

Though Shadwell's works, hasty and careless as they are, exhibit lively talent and comic force, all that the reading world now knows of Shadwell is that 'Shadwell never deviates into But this is obviously a preposterous exaggeration He was not a poet, but his plays are clever and skilfully put together were gross and indecent could be no reason for Dryden's denunciation, and no doubt personal, professional, and religious hostility made Dryden uncritical in the extravagance of his abuse, as he was unreasonable in the vituperative terms he used of his habits and personal appearance. Rochester, who was no fool, credited Shadwell with exceptional wit and humour in conversation. if not in his plays Addison praised his humour Scott recognised him as an acute observer of human nature, and Mr G A. Aitken has recently spoken of his 'excellent but coarse' comedies, giving interesting pictures of the times have been some consolation to Shadwell to succeed his enemy in the laureateship, which in 1688 Dryden had to resign He did not survive long to enjoy it, however, as in 1602 he died-of an overdose of laudanum, it is said 'The times' by Shadwell's representation seem to have been as unvirtuous and anti-virtuous as it is possible to conceive. Of the seven ladies or maids who appear in Epsoin Wells, four are expressly described amongst the dramatis persona as 'an imperious strumpet, 'very whomsh,' or worse, and the other three might have been described in terms not much more complimentary main business and amusement alike of men and women was the unholiest self-indulgence of the obtrusive loyalty to Church and State professed by most of the characters, the clergy who appear are degraded, servile vulgarians, whom the fine old English gentlemen treat with the utmost contempt and insolence (the passages in the Lancashire Witches which give the most disrespectful pictures of a domestic chaplain were expunged at first playing by the Master of the Revels, but printed in italic, the grossest passages seem to have passed muster from the beginning) The fine old English gentleman who hates London ways and French habits equally gives an account of the London magistrates singularly like the revelations in the Tammany trials-the magistrates live off blackmail exacted from footpads, pickpockets, and improper persons of various sex In the Lancashire Hitches the and condition Lancashire dialect is freely used, and with good effect, and the representation of witch-proceedings are justified by long notes from the Malleus Maleficarum, from Remigius, Bodinus, and many other authors

In the Squire of Alsatia, Belfond, the foolish son of a country squire, comes to London in the absence of his father, and falls among a set of bullies and sharpers—Cheatly, Shamwell, and Captain Hackum—who frequent the Whitefriars or Alsatia, a place behind the Temple, which still preserved the old privileges of sanctuary, and had thus become a notorious haunt of the worst characters in the town. Its privileges were abolished in 1697, nine years after Shadwell's play appeared

Shadwell's works were published, with a Life, in four volumes in 1720. An edition of The Laucashire Witches was printed by Mr Halliwell (afterwards Halliwell Phillipps) in 1853.

William Wycherley (1640 '-1716), born at Clive near Shrewsbury, where his father possessed a handsome property, was, next to Congreve, chief of the school of the comedy of manners bred to the law, Wycherley did not practise his profession, but lived gaily 'upon town' Pope says he had 'a true nobleman look,' and he was one of the favourites of the Duchess of Cleveland. He wrote four comedies—Love in a Wood (1672), The Gentleman Dancing-master (1673), The Country Wife (1675), and The Plain Dealer (1677) first was received with applause, the second, a farcical comedy of intrigue, was not so popular, the Country Wife, greatly cleverer, is much coarser in plot and details than Molière's École des l'emmes, on which it is largely based, the Plain Dealer, his masterpiece, is founded on Le Misanthrope The first was written when the author was only nineteen, the last was acted in 1674. In spite of its naughtiness, the Country Wife was praised by Steele as a 'very pleasant and instructive satire, Dryden calls Wycherley 'my dear friend' and an excellent poet, speaks of 'the satire, wit, and strength of manly Wycherley,' and commends the Plain Dealer as 'one of the most bold, most general, and most useful satires which has ever been presented in the English theatre' phrase 'manly Wycherley' must surely have had in it something of the nature of a complimentary pun, and an allusion to the chief character in the Voltaire says 'All Wycherley's Plain Dealer strokes are stronger and bolder than those of our Misanthrope, but then they are less delicate, and the rules of decorum are not so well observed' Pope was proud to receive the notice of the author of the Country Wife Their published correspondence is well known, and is interesting from the superiority maintained in their intercourse by the boy-poet of sixteen over his mentor of sixty-four The pupil grew too great for his master, and the unnatural friendship was dissolved, renewed, and broken again Wycherley represents the comedy of manners. not the comedy of human nature, wit, humour, sprightly conversation, mirthful situations and talk, are aimed at rather than strength of plot or credibility The whole is utterly artificial, and therefore the nastiness is perhaps less offensive. Congreve is vastly more brilliant in Wycherley's own line. Macaulay has vehemently impeached Wycherley's profligacy and the indecency and artificiality of his plays, and has justly said that his verse, of which a volume was published late in his life, was beneath criticism. Leigh Hunt thought some of the detached Maxims and Reflections written by Wycherley in his old age not unworthy of his reputation, and quoted as specially good, 'The silence of a wise man is more wrong to mankind than the slanderer's speech' Wycherley married the young widow the Countess of Drogheda, lived unhappily with her, and after her death was constantly in debt or money troubles spent some years in the Fleet, but James II, having seen the Plain Dealer, paid his debts and gave him a pension. At the age of seventy-five Wycherley married a young girl in order to defeat the expectations of his nephew, and died cleven days afterwards. The extracts that follow are both from the Plain Dealer

Man Very well, but I that am an unmannerly ser fellow, if I ever speak well of people (which is very seldom indeed) it should be sure to be behind their backs, and if I would say or do ill to any, it should be to their faces. I would jostle a proud, strutting, over looking coxcomb, at the head of his sycophants, rather than put out my tongue at him when he were past me, would frown in the arrogant, big, dull face of an over

As Mr Swinburne has put it 'This improper woman of genius was the first literary abolitionist—the first champion of the slave on record in the history of fiction' That is a better justification than ought else in her plays and novels for her resting-place in Westminster Abbey, and brings her into strange companionship with Mrs Beecher Stowe. An eighth edition of her works appeared in 1735

Song from Abdelazer'

Love in fantastic triumph sat,
Whilst bleeding hearts around him flowed,
For whom fresh pains he did create,
And strange tyrunnic power he shewed
From thy bright eyes he took his fires,
Which round about in sport he hurled
But 'twas from mine he took desires Enough to undo the amorous world

From me he took his sighs and tears,
From thee his pride and eruelty,
From me his languishment and fears,
And every killing dart from thee
Thus thou and I the god have armed,
And set him up a deity
But my poor heart alone is harmed,
While thine the victor is, and free.

The Dream

The grove was gloomy all around, Murmuring the stream did pass, Where fond Astrea laid her down Upon a bed of grass, I slept and saw a piteous sight, Cupid a weeping lay, Till both his little stars of light Had wept themselves away Methought I asked him why he cried, My pity led me on,-All sighing the ead boy replied, 'Alas! I am undone! As I beneath you myrtles 12), Down by Diann's spring's, Amyntas stole my bow aviay, And pinioned both my wings.' 'Alas 1' I eried, "twas then thy darts Wherewith he woundled me? Thou mighty deity of liearts, He stole his power from thee? Revenge thee, if a god thou be, Upon the amorous swain, I'll set thy wings at liberty, And thou shalt fly again,

And, for this service on my part,
All I demand of thee
Is, wound Amyntas' cruel heart,
And make him die for me.'
His silken fetters I untied,
And those gay wings displayed,
Which gently fanned, he mounting cried,
'Farewell, fond easy maid!'
At this I blushed, and angry grew
I should a god believe,
And waking found my dream too true,
For I was still a slave

Oroonoko, the hero of the romance, was a young and gallant African prince, grandson of the reigning king, eminently accomplished and distinguished for his military provess, he was thus shamefully betrayed into slavery by Englishmen

Oroonoko was no sooner return'd from this last con quest, and receiv'd at court with all the joy and magnificence that could be express'd to a young victor, who was not only return'd triumphant, but belov'd like a deity, than there arriv'd in port an Inglish ship. The master of it had often before been in these countries, and was very well known to Oroonoko, with whom he had traffick'd for slaves, and had us'd to do the same with his predecessors.

This commander was a man of a finer sort of address and conversation, better bred, and more engaging than most of that sort of men are, so that he seem'd rather never to have been bred out of a court, than almost all his life at sea This captain therefore was always better received at court than most of the traders to those countries were, and especially by Oroonoko, who was more envilued, according to the European mode, than any other had been, and took more delight in the white nations, and, above all, men of parts and wit. To this captain he sold abundance of his slaves, and for the favour and esteem he had for him, made him many pre sents, and oblig'd him to stay at court as long as possibly he could Which the captain seem'd to take as a very great honour done him, entertaining the prince every day with globes and maps, and mathematical discourses and instruments, eating, drinking, hunting, and living with him with so much familiarity, that it was not to be doubted but he had gain'd very greatly upon the heart of this gallant young man And the captain, in return of all these mighty favours, besought the prince to honour his vessel with his presence some day or other at dinner, before he should set sail, which he condescended to accept, and appointed his day. The captain, on his part, fail'd not to have all things in a readiness, in the most magnificent order he could possibly and the day being come, the captain, in his boat rieldly adorn'd with carpets and velvet cushions, rowed to the shore to receive the prince, with another longboat, where was plac'd all his musick and trimpets, with which Oroonoko was extremely delighted, who met him on the shore, attended by his French governor, Jamoan, Aboan, and about an hundred of the noblest of the youths of the court and after they had first carried the prince on board, the boats fetch'd the rest off, where they found a very splendid treat, with all sorts of fine wines, and were as well enter tain'd as 'twas possible in such a place to be

The prince having drank hard of punch and several sorts of wine, as did all the rest (for great care was taken they should want nothing of that part of the entertain ment), was very merry, and in great admiration of the ship, for he had never been in one before, so that he was curious of beholding every place where he decently might The rest, no less curious, who were not quite overcome with drinking, rambled at their pleasure force and aft, as their fancies guided 'em so that the captain, who had well laid his design before, gave the word, and seiz'd on all his guests, they dapping great irons sud dealy on the prince, when he was leap'd down into the hold, to view that part of the vessel and loeling him fast down, securd him. The same treachery was us'd to all the rest, and all in one instant, in several places of the ship, were lash'd fast in irons, and betray'd to slavers That great design over, they set all hands at worl to hoist sail, and with as treacherous as fair a wind they made from the shore with this innocent and glorious prize, who thought of nothing less than such an entertainment

Some have commended this act as brave in the cap tain, but I will spare my sense of it, and leave it to my render to judge us he pleases. It may be easily guess d in what manner the prince resented this indignity, who may be best resembled to a hon taken in a toil, so he raged, so he struggled for hixery, but all in viin and they had so wisely minniged his fetters, that he could not use a hand in his desence, to quit himself of a life that would by no means endure slavery nor could be move from the place where he was ty d, to any solid part of the ship, against which he might have beat his head, and have finish'd his disgrace that way. So that being deprived of all other means, he result'd to perish for want of food, and pleased at last with that thought and tell d and tir'd by rage and indignation, he laid himself dos n and sullenly resolved upon dying, and refused all things that were brought him

This did not a little vex the captain, and the more so because he found almost all of cm of the same humour, so that the loss of so many brave slaves, so tall and goodly to behold, would have been very considerable the there fore order d one to go from him (for he would not be seen himself) to Oroonoko, and to assure him he was afflicted for having rashly done so unhospitable a deed, and which ; could not be now remedied, since they were for from shore, but since he resented it in so ligh a nature, he assur'd him he would revoke his resolution, and set both him and his friends ashore on the next land they should touch at, and of this the messenger gave him his oath, provided he would resolve to live And Oroonol o, whose honour was such, as he never had violated a word in his life himself, much less a solemn asseveration, la hev'd in an instant what this man said, but reply d he expected for a confirmation of this to have his shameful fetters dismiss'd. This demand was carried to the cip tain, who return'd him answer that the offence had been so great which he had put upon the prince, that he durst not trust him with liberty while he remain'd in the ship, for fear lest by a valour natural to lum, and a revenge that would animate that vilour, he might commit some outrage fatal to himself and the king his master, to whom the vessel did belong To this Oroonoko reply d, he would engage his honour to behave himself in all friendly order and manner, and obes the command of the captain, as he was lord of the king's vessel, and general of those men under his command

This was deliver'd to the still doubting captain, who could not resolve to trust a heathen, he said, upon his parole, a man that had no sense or notion of the god that he worshipped Oroonel o then reply d, he is every sorry to hear that the captain pretended to the kno sledg and nor hip of any gods, who had taught him no b ner principles than not to credi as he would be credi li but they told him the difference of their faith oceas on d that district for the captain had prote ted to him apen the word of a Christian, and as orn in the name of a great God, which if he should violate, he must expect et real torments in the world to come. "Is that all the oldiga tions he has to be just to his oath? (refly d Orional or I et him I now, I sucar la ma homour, a lucia in suotate would not only ren ler me contemptible and de pre- t by all brase and honest men and to give my off perpetual pain, but it would be etern-the offendin and dig feesing all mail and learning betra arg, circumverting and onterging all men. But praishtien's hereafter are sof ford by one shelf and the will take in common whether this God has re en it error no tis stare w secretly, and deferred so long, while the man of rehonour suffer every moment the sorn and contenue of the hones er world, and discovery day in minimals in his fame, which is more y highle than life. I speck he this to move label, but it show you how you mit ake when you magine that he who will yin't a his hit air will keep his word with his god " 5% turning from him with a di dainful sinde he refreed to miswer han, also he neged him to I now what one or he should cores he ck to his cap ain so that he departed with our eagen, any more

The cap ain pondering and considing what to the is was concluded that nothing bit Oromot on Harts would encourage any of the reis to be a except the Liberta would encourage any of the reis to be a except the Liberta whom the captain could not prefer to keep in one but only told him he was secretal because he must not something in favour of the prince. Lat that the should be fixed as soon as they came to land. So that they can childed it wholly necessary to five the prince from his irons that he might show him if to the reis that they mush have an evel upon hum, and that they could not fear a single man.

This bein, resolved to make the obligation of eigenter the captain lumiselt went to Oroon do, where, after many compliments and as urances of what he had already promised, he, receiving from the prince his parole at his hand for his good behaviour, drames d his rrows, and brought him to his own each n where, after having treated and reposed him a while (for he had neither eat nor slept in four days before) he has night him to visit those obstinate people in change who refused all mainer of sustenance, and intreated him to oblige can to eat, and assure can of their liberty the firit opportunits.

Oronnol o, who was too generous no to give credit to his words, show'd himself to his people, who were transported with execus of jay at the sigh of their darling prince, falling at his feet and kissing and embruon, cm believing as some divine oracle, all he as and embruon, and believing as some divine oracle, all he as and embruors that he came those whom he had seen act so nobly in arms and that they could not give him greater proofs of their love and friendship since twas all the security the captain (his friend) could have against the revenge, he said, they maint possibly justly take for the injuries sustained by him. And they all with one accord assur'd him that they could not suffer enough, when it was for his repose and safets

After this they no longer refused to eat, but took what was bronght 'em, and were pleased with their captivity, since by it they hoped to redeem the prince, who all the rest of the voyage was treated with all the respect due to his birth, tho' nothing could divert his melancholy, and he would often sigh for Imoinda, and think this a prinishment due to his misfortane in having left that noble maid behind him that fatal night in the Otan, when he fled to the camp

Possess'd with a thousand thoughts of past joys with this fair young person, and a thousand griefs for her eternal loss, lie endnr'd a tedious voyage, and at last arrived at the month of the river of Sirinam, a colony belonging to the king of England, and where they were to deliver some part of their slaves There the ---chants and gentlemen of the country going on board, to demand those lots of slaves they had already agreed on, and, amongst those, the overseers of those plantations where I then chanc'd to be, the captain, who had given the word, order'd his men to bring up those noble slaves in fetters, whom I have spoken of, and having put 'em some in one and some in other lots, with women and children (v hich they call Pickaninies), they sold 'em off as slaves to several merchants and gentlemen, not putting any two in one lot, because they would separate 'em far from each other, nor daring to trust 'em together, lest rige and courage should put 'em upon contriving some great action, to the ruin of the colony

Oroonoko was first seiz'd on, and sold to our overseer, who had the first lot, with seventeen more of all sorts and sizes, but not one of quality with him. When he saw this, he found what they meant, for, as I said, he under stood English pretty well, and being wholly unarm'd and defenceless, so as it was in vain to make any resist ance, he only beheld the captain with a look all fierce and disdainful, upbraiding him with eyes that forc'd blushes on his guilty cheeks, and cry d in passing over the side of the ship 'Farewel, Sir, 'tis worth my suffer ings to gain so true a knowledge, both of you and of your gods, by whom you swear' And desiring those that held him to forbear their pains, and telling 'em he would make no resistance, he cry'd, 'Come, my fellow slaves, let us descend, and see if we can meet with more honour and honesty in the next world we shall touch upon ' So he nimbly leapt into the boat, and showing no more concern, suffer'd himself to be row d up the river, with his seventeen companions.

The gentleman that bought him was a young Cornish gentleman, whose name was Trefry, a man of great wit and fine learning, and was carried into those parts by the lord ---, Governor, to manage all his affairs. He re flecting on the last words of Oroonoko to the captain, and beholding the richness of his vest, no sooner came into the boat but he fix'd his eyes on him, and finding something so extraordinary in his face, his shape and mien, a greatness of look, and haughtiness in his air, and finding he spoke English, had a great mind to be enquiring into his quality and fortune, which, though Oroonoko endeavonr'd to hide, by only confessing he was above the rank of common slaves, Trefry soon found he was yet something greater than he confess'd, and from that moment began to conceive so vast an esteem for him, that he ever after lov'd him as his dearest brother, and shew d him all the civilities due to so great a man

Elkanah Settle (1648-1724), born at Dunstable, went from Oxford University to London to make a living by his pen, and at eighteen (in 1665) made a hit by his tragedy of Cambyses (printed 1671) To annoy Dryden, Rocbester got his high-flown Empress of Morocco played at Whitehall by the court lords and ladies (1671) In Absalom and Achitophel Dryden, enraged and icalous, scourged 'Doeg' with his scorn, and Settle replied, not very effectively, in Absalour Senior, or Achitophel Transprosd, and Reflectious on Some of Mr Dryden's Plays Love and Revenge, The Conquest of China, Ibrahim or the Illustrious Bassa, and Fatal Love were acted before 1680 For a time petted by the court, he had lost favour and took the Whig side, writing in this cause not merely The Temale Prelate, a play on Pope Joan, but a series of pamphlets in Shaftesbury's interest and against the succession of the Duke of York. But in 1683 he was writing down Oates, ridiculing the Popish Plot, denouncing Lord William Russell and Algernon Sidney, and making a Panegyrick of Judge Jeffreys, and (in 1685) issuing a Heroic Poem in bonour of James II's coronation Appointed City poet in 1691, in the following years he brought out a series of City He compiled lives of two impostors and cheats, a pamphlet on the cruelties of the Dutch towards the English in the East Indies. and a 'Pindarick' ode on the propagation of the gospel in foreign parts The Ladies Triumbh was the last of some eight plays produced between 1694 and 1718, but long ere this their author was writing comicalities for Bartholomew Fair, acting in a booth there, and producing (for a livelihood) elegies and complimentary poems. Thomas Otway (1652-85), born twelve years after Wycherley, was one of Dryden's younger contemporaries who succeeded where the master had failed, his plays - brilliant achievements associated with a melancholy history - sound the tones of deepest tragedy with singular Born the son of a clergyman at Trotton near Midhurst in Sussex, Otway proceeded from Winchester College to Christ Church, Oxford, but left in 1672 without taking his degree. same year he made his appearance as an actor on the London stage. It was an absolute breakdown, but here he doubtless acquired a knowledge of dramatic art which stood him in good stead when he began to write for the theatre produced three tragedies, a farce, and a comedy -Alcibiades (1675), Don Carlos (1676, based on the same French romance by St Réal as Schiller's), Titus and Berenice (from Racine, 1677), The Cheats of Scapen (adapted from Molicre, 1677), and Friendship in Fashion (1678)—which were successfully performed, but Otway was always in poverty, mainly owing to drink and other kinds of dissipation Betterton, Mrs Barry, and Mrs Bracegirdle were amongst the actors who helped to secure popularity for his plays, it was a lifelong heart-break to the dramatist that Mrs Barry flouted his almost abject devotion to her The Earl of Plymouth procured him in ensignship in a foot regiment, and the poet went for a year or two to Flanders He was soon cashiered for his irregularities, and returning to England, he resumed writing for the stage. In 1680 he produced The Orphan and Cains Marius, tragedies, in 1681, The Soldier's Fortune, a comedy full of autobiographical detail, and in 1682, Venice Preserved The Atheist (1684), a continuation of The Soldier's Fortune, was his last play, and Otway's short but eventful life came to a premature end after twenty years of want and extravagance. One biographer says the cause of his death was his hastily swallowing, after long fasting, a piece of bread which charity had supplied. Another story makes him die of fever brought on by fittigue or by drinking water when violently heated. Whatever was the last of his misfortunes, he was at the time in great poverty, and apparently skulking from creditors at a publichouse on Tower Hill.

The fame of Otway now rests on his two trage dies, The Orphan and Venice Preserved, but on these it rests as on the pillars of Hercules Scott said his talents in scenes of passionate affection 'rival at least and sometimes excel those of Shakespeare more tears have been shed, probably, for the sorrows of Belvidera and Monimia than for those of Juliet and Desdemona.' This is excessive praise. The inherent indelicacy and unpleasant associations of the plot have driven The Orphan from the theatres, but Venice Preserved was played at Drury Lane so recently as 1829 The stern, plotting character of Pierre is well contrasted with the presolute, sensitive, and affectionate nature of Jaffier, and the harsh, unnatural cruelty of Priuli serves as a dark shade to set off the bright purity and tenderness of his daughter Belvidera is Otway's creation, a creation of high dramatic genius The dramatist's genius shines in his delineation of the passions of the heart, the ardour of love, and the excess of misery and despair His humour is clumsy and gross, and his comedy is very poor, though the farce is funny and rollicking is in Otway little of the rant or bombast Dryden too of an admitted. He was partly influenced by French models, there is something classical in the simplicity and skill he shows in the working of his plots, and in his concentration of interest on a few figures or groups of figures, of development of character there is little or none. The versification is sometimes rugged and irregular, and there are plenteous redundancies and inflated expressions, due largely to linste and carelessness Venice Preserved, which Mr Gosse, like most critics, has praised as 'simply the greatest tragic drama between Shakespeare and Shelley,' excited keen interest in French, Dutch, German, Russian, and Italian versions. The following extract is the opening of the play, the shorter detached extracts which follow it are all from The Orphan

From 'Venice Preserved.'

Printh No more! I'll hear no more, begone and leave me.

Jaffier Nothers me! by my suffering but you shall!

** lord, my lord! I'm not that abject wretch

** is hil ince Patience! where's the distance throws

Me b ck so far, but I may boldly speak la nght, though proud oppression will not hear me?

Pri Have you not wronged me?

Could my nature e'er

Have brooked injustice or the doing wrongs, I need not now thus low have bent myself To gain a hearing from a cruel father Wronged you?

I es, wronged me! in the nicest point, The honour of my house, you've done me wrong You may remember-for I now will speak, And urge its baseness-when you first came home From travel, with such hopes as made you looked on By all men's eves, a youth of expectation, Pleased with your growing virtue, I received you, Courted and sought to raise you to your ments, My house, my table, may my fortune too, My very self was vours, you might have used me To your best service, like an open friend I treated, trusted you, and thought you mine, When, in requital of my best endeavours, You treacherously practised to undo me, Seduced the weakness of my age's darling, My only child, and stole her from my bosom-Oh, Belvidera!

Jaf 'Tis to me you owe her Childless you had been else, and in the grave Your name extinct, no more Pruli heard of You may remember, scarce five years are past, Since in your brigantine you sailed to see The Adriatic wedded by our duke, And I was with you your unskilful pilot Dashed us upon a rock, when to your boat You made for safety, entered first yourself, The affrighted Belvidera, following next, As she stood trembling on the vessel's side, Was by a wave washed off into the deep. When instantly I plunged into the sea, And buffeting the billows to her rescue, Redeemed her life with half the loss of mine. Like a rich conquest, in one hand I bore her, And with the other dashed the saucy waves, That thronged and pressed to rob me of my prize. I brought her, gave her to your despairing arms Indeed, you thanked me, but a nobler gratitude Rose in her soul for from that honr she loved me, Till for her life she paid me with herself

Pri. You stole her from me, like a thief you stole

At dead of night, that cursed hour you chose To rifle me of all my heart held dear May all your joys in her prove false, like mine I A sterile fortune and a barreu bed Attend you both continual discord make Your days and nights bitter and grievous still May the hard hand of a vexatious need Oppress and grind you, till at last you find The curse of disobedience all your portion!

Jaf Half of your curse you have bestowed in vain Heaven has already crowned our faithful loves With a young boy, sweet as his mother's beauty May he live to prove more gentle than his grandsire, And happier than his father 1

Pri Rather live
To but thee for his bread, and din your ears
With hungry cries, whilst his unhappy mother
Sits down and weeps in bitterness of want

Jaf You talk as if 'twould please you

Pri 'Twonld, by Heaven'
Once she was dear indeed, the drops that fell
From my sad heart when she forgot her duty,

The fountain of my life, were not so precious! But she is gone, and if I am a man I will forget her Jaf Would I were in my grave!

Pre
And she, too, with thee,
For living here, you're but my cursed remembrancers

I once was happy 1

Jaf You use me thus, because you know my soul Is fond of Belvidera. You perceive My life feeds on her, therefore thus you treat me. Were I that thief, the doer of such wrongs As you upbraid me with, what hinders me Bnt I might send her back to you with contumely, And court my fortune where she would be kinder?

Pri You dare not do't.

Jaf Indeed, my lord, I dare not. My heart, that awes me, is too much my master Three years are past since first our vows were plighted, During which time the world must bear me witness I've treated Belvidera like your daughter, The daughter of a senator of Venice Distinction, place, attendance, and observance, Due to her birth, she always has commanded

Out of my little fortune I have done this, Because, though hopeless e'er to win your nature, The world might see I loved her for herself, Not as the heiress of the great Priuli

Pri No more

Jaf Yes, all, and then adieu for ever There's not a wretch that lives on common charity But's happier than me, for I have known The luscious sweets of plenty, every night Have slept with soft content about my head, And never waked but to a joyful morning Yet now must fall, like a full ear of corn, Whose blossom'scaped, yet's withered in the ripening

Pt Home, and be humble, study to retrench, Discharge the lazy vermin of thy hall,
Those pageants of thy folly
Reduce the glittering trappings of thy wife
To humble weeds, fit for thy little state
Then to some suburb cottage both retire,
Drudge to feed loathsome life, get brats, and starve.
Home, home, I say

[Exit

Jaf Yes, if my heart would let me—
This proud, this swelling heart—home I would go,
But that my doors are hateful to mine eyes,
Filled and dammed up with gaping creditors,
Watchful as fowlers when their game will spring,
I've now not fifty ducats in the world,
Yet still I am in love, and pleased with ruin.
O Belvidera! Oh! she is my wife—
And we will bear our wryward fate together,
But ne'er know comfort more.

[Belvidera enters]

Jaf Poor Belvidera!

Belvidera Lead me, lead me my virgins
To that kind voice. My lord, my love, my refuge l
Happy my eyes when they behold thy face,
My heary heart will leave its doleful beating
At sight of thee, and bound with sprightful joys
Oh smile as when our loves were in their spring,
And cheer my fainting sonl 1

Jaf

As when our loves
Were in their spring! His, then, my fortune changed
Art thou not, Belvidera, still the same, [thee?
Kind, good, and tender, as my arms first found thee?
If thou art altered, where shall I bave harbour?
Where case my loaded heart? oh, where complain?

Bel Does this appear like change, or love decaying, When thus I throw myself into thy bosom, With all the resolution of strong truth? Beats not my heart as 'twould alarum thine To a new charge of bliss? I joy more in thee Than did thy mother when she hugged thee first, And blessed the gods for all her travail past

Jaf Can there in woman be such glorious faith? Since all ill stories of thy sex are false. Oh woman, lovely woman! Nature made thee To temper man we had been brutes without you, Angels are painted fair, to look like you There's in you all that we believe of Heaven, Amazing brightness, purity, and truth, Eternal joy, and everlasting love.

Bd If love be treasure, we'll be wondrous rich I have so much my heart will surely break with't Vows ean't express it when I would declare How great's my joy, I'm dnmb with the big thought, I swell and sigh and labour with my longing Oh lead me to some desert, wide and wild,

Barren as our misfortunes, where my soul May have its vent, where I may tell aloud To the high heavens and every list'ning planet, With what n boundless stock my bosom's fraught, Where I may throw my eager arms about thee, Give loose to love, with kisses kindling joy, And let off all the fire that's in my heart!

Jaf O Belvidera! doubly I'm a beggar
Undone by fortune and in debt to thee
Want, worldly want, that bungry meagre fiend,
Is at my heels, and chases me in view
Canst thou bear cold and hunger? Can these limbs, Framed for the tender offices of love,
Endure the bitter gripes of smarting poverty?
When banished by our miseries abroad
(As suddenly we shall be) to seek out
In some far climate where our names are strangers
I or charitable succour, wilt thou then,
When in a bed of straw we shrink together,
And the bleak winds shall whistle round our heads, Wilt thou then talk thus to me? Wilt thou then Hush my cares thus, and shelter me with love?

Bel Oh I will love thee, even in madness love thee

Though my distracted senses should forsake me,
I'd find some intervals when my poor heart
Should 'suage itself, and be let loose to thine
Though the bare earth be all our resting place,
Its roots our food, some clift our habitation,
I ll make this arm n pillow for thy head,
And as thou sighing liest and swelled with sorrow, Creep to thy bosom, pour the balm of love
Into thy soul, and kiss thee to thy rest,
Then praise our God, and watch thee till the morning

Jaf Hear this, you Heavens, and wonder how you

Reign, reign, ye monarchs that divide the world, Busy rebelhon ne'er will let you know Tranquillity and happiness like mine, Like gaudy ships, the obsequious billows fall And rise again, to lift you in your pride, They wait but for a storm, and then devour you I in my private bark already wrecked, Like a poor merchant, driven on unknown land, That had by chance packed up his choicest treasure In one dear casket, and saved only that Since I must wander farther on the shore, Thus ling my little but my precious store, Resolved to scorn and trust my fate no more made her !

Parting

Where am I? Surt I wander midst enchantment, And never more shall find the way to rest. But O Monima' art thou indeed resolved To punish me with everlasting absence? Why turn'st thou from me? I'm alone already Methinks I stand upon a naked beach Sighing to winds and to the seas complaining, Whilst afar off the vessel sails away, Where all the treasure of my soul's embarked Wilt thou not turn? O could those eyes but speak, I should know all, for love is pregnant in them, They swell, they press their beams upon me still Wilt thou not speak? If we must part for ever, Give me but one kind word to think upon, And please myself withal, whilst my heart's breaking

A Witch

Through a close lane as I pursued my journey, And meditated on the last night's vision, I spied a wrinkled hag, with age grown double, Picking dry sticks, and mumbling to licrself, Her eyes with sealding rheum were galled and red, Cold palsy shook her head, her hands seemed withered. And on her crooked shoulders had she wrapped The tattered remnant of an old striped hanging, Which served to keep her carcass from the cold So there was nothing of a piece about her Her lower weeds were all o'er coarsely patched With different coloured rags—black, red, white, yellow-And seemed to speak variety of wretchedness I usked her of my way, which she anformed me, Then craved my charity, and bade me hasten To save a sister At that word I started !

A Splenetic View of Woman

Woman the fountain of all human frailty 1
What mighty ills have not been done by woman 1
Who was 't betrayed the Capitol? A woman Who lost Mark Antony the world? A woman
Who was the cause of a long ten years war,
And laid at last old Troy in ashes? Woman,
Destructive, damnable, deceitful woman,
Woman to man first as a blessing given.
When innocence and love were in their prime.
Happy a while in Paradise they lay,
But quickly woman longed to go astray,
Some foolish new adventure needs must prove,
And the first devil she saw she changed her love,
To his temptations lewdly she inclined
Her soul, and for an apple damned mankind.

Morning

Wished Morning's come, and now upon the plains And distant mountains, where they feed their flocks, The happy shepherds leave their homely huts, And with their pipes proclaim the new born day The lusty swain comes with his well filled scrip Of healthful viands, which, when hunger calls, With much content and appetite he eats, To follow in the fields his daily toil, And dress the grateful glebe that yields him fruits. The beasts that under the warm hedges slept, And weathered out the cold bleak night, are up, And, looking towards the neighbouring pastures, raise The voice, and bid their fellow brutes good morrow The cheerful birds, too, on the tops of trees, Assemble all in choirs, and with their notes Salute and welcome up the rising sun.

A Boar Hunt

When you Castalio, and your brother left me, Forth from the thickets rushed another boar, So large, he seemed the tyrant of the woods, With all his dreadful bristles raised up high, They seemed a grove of spears upon his back, Foaming he came at me where I was posted, Best to observe which way he'd lead the chase, Whetting his huge long tusks, and gaping wide, As if he already had me for his prey, Fill brandishing my well poised javelin high, With this bold executing arm I struck. The ugly brindled monster to the heart.

Fine Speeches

Fine speeches are the instruments of knaves Or fools that use them when they want good sense, But honesty needs no discusse nor ornament

Honest Men.

Honest men Are the soft easy cushions ou which knaves Repose and fatten

Otway translated one or two things from Ovid and Horace, wrote a number of prologues and epilogues, some epistles and occasional verses, and a few songs Windsor Castle, published posthumously, is a panegyric of Charles II The Poet's Complaint of his Muse, or a Satire against Libels (1680), is largely laudation of the Duke of York, the fickle Muse having deserted her true love for Libel, the anti-Catholic agitation which temporarily drove James from England in 1679 The mutual devotion of the poet and the Muse is first described, and in the sixth of the twenty one stanzas of this nondescript 'Pindaric' ode the breach between them is thus described

But in this most transporting height,
Whence I looked down, and laught at fate,
All of a sudden I was altered grown,
I round me looked, and found myself alone,
My faithless Muse, my faithless Muse, was gone,
I tried if I a verse could frame

Oft I in vain involed my Clio's name.

The more I strove, the more I fuled,
I chased, I bit my pen, curst my dull skull, and railed, Perchand to force m' untoward thought, and at the left

Resolved to force m' untoward thought, and at the last
A line came forth, but such a one, [prevailed.
No travelling matron in her child birth pains,
Full of the joyful liopes to bear a son,
Was more astonished at th' unlooked for shape

Of some deformed baboon, or ape, Than I was at the hideous issue of my brains

I tore my paper, stabbed my pen,

And swore I'd never write again,

Resolved to be a doating fool no more
But when my reckoning I began to make,
I found too long I'd slept, and was too late awake,

I found m' ungrateful Muse, for whose false sake
I did myself undo,

Had robbed me of my dearest store, My precious time, my friends, and reputation too, And left me helpless, friendless, very proud, and poor

The whistling winds blew fiercely o'er his head, Cold was his lodging, hard his bed,
Aloft his eyes on the wide heavens he cast,
Where we are told peace only's found at last,
And as he did its hopeless distance see,
Sighed deep and cried, How far is peace from me'

This is one of Otway's songs

The Enchantment

I did but look and love a while, 'Twas but for one half hour, Then to resist I had no will, And now I have no power To sigh and wish is all my ease, Sighs, which do heat impart Enough to melt the coldest ice, Yet cannot warm your heart

O' would your pity give my heart One corner of your breast, 'Twould learn of yours the winning art, And quickly steal the rest

The best edition of Otway is Thornton's (3 vols 1813). See Johnson's Lives, Ward's Dramatic Literature, Mr Gosse in Seventeenth Century Studies and the Hon Roden Noels volume on Otway in the 'Mermaid Series (1888). There are German books on the Don Carlos of Otway and Schiller and their relation to the romance of the Abbé St Réal by Löwenberg (1886) and Ernst Muller (1888).

Thomas Southerne (1660-1746) was born at Osmantown near Dublin, and studied at Trinits College, but in 1678 came to England and enrolled himself in the Middle Temple as a student of law He entered the army in 1685, and rose rapidly to the rank of captum, but the Revolution dashed his hopes of further promotion. He was a friend of Dryden, who entrusted him with the completion of his Cleomenes, was praised by Pope, and lived to be spoken of as 'the poets' Nestor' His later days were spent in retirement and in the possession of a considerable fortune, largely the outcome of his dramatic successes He wrote ten plays, but only two fully exhibit his characteristic powers-Isa bella, or the Fatal Marriage (1694), and Oroonoko (1696) The latter is founded on Aphra Behn's novel (see above, page 57), and that on an actual occurrence, Oroonoko, an African prince, having been stolen from his native kingdom of Angola and carried to one of the West India Islands impassioned intensity of Oroonoko's sufferings, his burst of horror and indignation at the slave-trade, and his devotion to the beautiful and virtuous Imoinda are powerfully and pathetically presented Isabella is more regular than Oroonoko, and the part of the heroine affords scope for a tragic actress scarcely inferior in pathos to Belvidera, but on the whole Southerne is excelled by Otway in depth of passion and vigorous character drawing. The plot of Isabella is also based on Mrs Behn's romance of The Nun In abject distress and believing her husband to be dead, Isabella is hurried into a second marriage. Biron returns, and the heroine's agony ends in madness and death. Comic scenes are interspersed throughout Southerne's tragedics. which, though they relieve the sombre colouring of the main action and interest of the piece, are some times misplaced and unwelcome. Thus there were comic scenes in Oroonoko, subsequently omitted And bathos intrudes from time to time, as will be seen in the extracts Of the comedies, one or two are amusing, though more than gross enough. In the following scene from Oromoko hero and heroine unexpectedly meet after long separation, both being now slaves on the plantations of Surmam (at this time British), in the presence of the Governor Oroonoko O all you gods Who govern this great world and bring about Things strange and unexpected, can it be? My soul steals from my body through my eyes, All that is left of life I'll gize away, And die upon the pleasure.

This is strange! Governor Orov If you but mock me with your image here [He runs to her If she be not Imounda-

Ha! she faints!

Nay, then, it must be she-it is Imoinda My heart confesses her, and leaps for joy, Kasses her To welcome her to her own empire here. I feel her all in every part of me O let me press her in my eager arms, Wake her to life, and with this kindling kiss Give back that soul she only sent to me Imounda! oh, thy Oroonoko calls.

Imoinda (reviving) My Oroonoko! Oh! I can't be heve

What any man can say But if I am

To be deceived, there's something in that name, That voice, that face-

Oh! if I know myself, I cannot be mistaken Never here Embracing her Orco

You cannot be mistaken I am vours, Your Oroonoko, all that you would have, Your tender, loving husband

Imo All, indeed, That I would have my husband! then I am Alive, and waking to the joys I feel They were so great, I could not think 'em true, But I believe all that you say to me For truth itself, and everlasting love, Grows in this breast, and pleasure in these arms

Oros Take, take me all, inquire into my heart-You know the way to every secret there-My heart, the sacred treasury of love And if in absence I have disemployed A mite from the rich store, if I have spent A wish, a sigh, but what I sent to you, May I be cursed to wish and sigh in vain, And you not pity me.

Oh! I believe, And know you by myself If these sad eyes, Since last we parted, have beheld the face Of any comfort, or once wished to see The light of any other heaven but you, May I be struck this moment blind, and lose Your blessed sight, never to find you more.

Oroo Imoinda! Oh! this separation Has made you dearer, if it can be so, Than you were ever to me. You appear Like a kind star to my benighted steps, To guide me on my way to happiness I cannot miss it now Governor, friend, I ou think me mad, but let me bless you all, Who anyways have been the instruments Of finding her again Imoinda's found l And everything that I would have in her

B'andford Sir, we congratulate your happiness, I do most heartily

And all of us. But low it comes to pass-

That would require More precious time than I can spare you now

I have a thousand things to ask of her, And she as many more to know of me But you have made me happier, I confess, Acknowledge it, much happier than I Have words or power to tell you Captain, you, Even you, who most have wronged me, I forgive. I will not say you have betrayed me now I'll think you but the minister of fate, To bring me to my loved Imoinda here Ino How, how shall I receive you? how be worthy

Of such endearments, all this tenderness? These are the transports of prosperity, When fortune smiles upon us

Let the fools Oroo Who follow fortune live upon her smiles, All our prosperity is placed in love, We have enough of that to make us happy This little spot of earth you stand upon Is more to me than the extended plains Of my great father's kingdom In full delights, in joys to power unknown, Your love my empire, and your heart my throne.

From 'The Fatal Marriage'

Isabella I've heard of witches, magic spells, and charms, That have made nature start from her old course, The sun has been eclipsed, the moon drawn down From her career still puler, and subdued To the abuses of this under world Now I believe all possible. This ring, This little ring with necromantic force, Has rused the ghost of pleasure to my fears, Conjured the sense of honour and of love Into such shapes, they fright me from myself! I dare not think of them

Nurse (entering) Madam, the gentleman's below Isa I had forgot, pray, let me speak with him.

[Exil Nurse.

This ring was the first present of my love To Biron, my first husband, I must blush To think I have a second Biron died (Still to my loss) at Candy, there's my hope, Oh, do I live to hope that he died there? It must be so, he's dead, and this ring left, By his last breath, to some known faithful friend, To bring me bick again, that's all I have to trust to. Enter BIRON

My fears were woman's-I have viewed him all, And let me, let me say it to myself, I live again, and rise but from his tomb Biron Have you forgot me quite?

Forgot you! Bir Then sarewell my disguise, and my missortunes! My Isabella ! [He goes to her, she faints

Isa Hai

Oh ' come agun, Thy Biron summons thee to life and love, Once I had charms to wake thee, Thy once loved, ever loving husband calls, Thy Biron speaks to thee.

My husband! Biron! Bir Excess of love and joy for my return Has overpowered her I was to blame To take thy sex's softness unprepared, But sinking thus, this dying in my arms, This ecstasy has made my welcome more

[Going

Than words could say Words may be counterfeit, False coined, and current only from the tongue, Without the mind, but passion s in the sonl, And always speaks the heart Where have I been? Why do you keep him from me? I know his voice, my life, upon the wing, Hears the soft Inre that brings me back again . 'Tis he himself, my Biron, the dear man. My true loved husband, do I hold you fast, Never to part again? Can I believe it? Nothing but you could work so great a change, There's more than life itself in dving here. If I must fall, death's welcome in these arms. Bir Live ever in these arms. But pardon me, Excuse the wild disorder of my sonl . The joy, the strange surprising joy of seeing you, Of seeing you again, distracted me. Bir Thou everlasting goodness ! Isa Answer me

What hand of Providence has brought you back To your own home again? O satisfy Th' impatience of my heart, I long to know The story of thy sufferings Oli, tell me all, For every thought confounds me

My best life! at leisure all. Isa We thought you dead, killed at the siege of Candy Bir There I fell among the dead, But hopes of life reviving from my wounds. I was preserved but to be made a slave

I often writ to my hard father, but never had An answer I writ to thee too

What a v orld of woe Isn Had been prevented but in hearing from you! Bir Alas! thou couldst not help me Isa. You do not know how much I could have done. At least, I'm sure I could have suffered all, I would have sold myself to slavery,

Without redemption, given up my child, The dearest part of me, to basest wants

Bir My little boy !

My life, but to have heard Aside You were alive-which now too late I find. Bir No more, my love, complaining of the past, 'Tis over price We lose the present 10y

Of all my pains that thus we meet again. I have a thousand things to say to thec.

[Aside Isa Would I were past the hearing Bir How does my child, my boy, my father too?

I hear he's living still.

Well, both, both well, And may he prove a father to your hopes, Though we have found him none.

Come, no more tears. Bir

Isa Seven long years of sorrow for your loss Have mourned with me.

And all my days to come Shall be employed in a kind recompense For thy afflictions Cau't I see my boy?

Isa He's gone to bed, I'll have him brought to you. Bir To-morrow I shall see him, I want rest Myself, after my weary pilgrimage

Isa Alas! what shall I get for you? Bir Nothing but rest, my love. To-night I would not Be known, if possible, to your family

I see my nurse is with you, her welcome would Be tedious at this time, to morrow will do better

Isa I'll dispose of her, and order everything As you would have it.

Bir Grant me but life, good Heaven, and give the To make this wondrous goodness some amends. Imeans And let me then forget her, if I can Oh! she deserves of me much more than I Can lose for her, though I again could venture A father and his fortune for her love! You wretched fathers, blind as fortune all ! Not to perceive that such a woman's worth Weighs down the portions von provide your sons. What is your trash, what all your heaps of gold. Compared to this, my heartfelt happiness? What has she in my absence undergone! I must not think of that, it drives me back Upon myself, the fatal cause of all Isa (returning) I have obeyed your pleasure -

Everything is ready for you.

Bir I can want nothing here, possessing thee. All my desires are carried to their aim Of happiness, there's no room for a wish, But to continue still this blessing to me, I know the way, my love. I shall sleep sound

Isa Shall I [attend] you?

By no means, I've been so long a slave to others' pride, To learn, at least, to wait upon myself, You'll make haste after?

Isa I'll but say my prayers, and follow you. My prayers ' no. I must never pray again

Prayers have their blessings, to reward our hopes, But I have nothing left to hope for more

What Heaven could give I have enjoyed, but now The baneful planet rises on my fate,

And what's to come is a long life of woe, Yet I may shorten it. I promised him to follow-him!

Is he without a name? Biron, my husband

My husband! Ha! What, then, is Villeroy? Oh, Biron, hadst thou come but one day sooner I would have followed thee through beggary, Through all the chances of this mortal life. Wandered the many ways of wretchedness With thee, to find a hospitable grave.

For that 's the only bed that 's left me now What's to be done? for something must be done.

Two husbands ' yet not one '

And yet a wife to neither Hold, my brain. Ha! a lucky thought

Works the right way to rid me of them all, All the reproaches, infamics, and scorns, That every tongue and finger will find for me. Let the just horror of my apprehensions But keep me warm, no matter what can come. Tis but a blow If I should miss my heart?-But every part is mortal to such wounds. Yet I will see him first,

Have a last look, to heighten my despair, And then to rest for ever

Editions of his plays were published in 1713 and 1721 (2 vols.), a better one in three volumes with a Life of Southerne, was dedicated to Garrick in 1774. In a prologue he had been called great Otways peer, and greater Dryden's friend. vived The Aun in 1757, but had to Bowdlerise it Orognoko was still being performed about 1830. opposers whatever, has bravely and generously starved a million of poor Higonots at home, and sent to ther million of them a-grazing into foreign countries, contrary to solemn edicts and repeated promises, for no other provocation that I know of but because they were such coxcombs as to place him upon the throne. In short, friend Nero. thou mayest pass for a rogue of the third or fourth class, but be advised by a stranger, and never shew thyself such a fool as to dispute the pre-eminence with Lewis le Grand, who has murdered more men in his reign, let me tell thee, than thon hast murdered tines, for all thon art the viest thrummer upon cat gut the sun ever beheld However, to give the devil his due, I will say it before thy face and behind thy back, that if thou hadst reigned as many years as my gracions master has done, and hadst had, instead of Tigellinus, a Jesuit or two to have governed thy conscience, thon mightest, in all probability, have made a much more magnificent figure, and been inferior to none but the mighty monarch I have been talking of

An Indian's Account of a London Gaming-house

The English pretend that they worship but one God, but for my part, I don't believe what they say, for besides several living divinities, to which we may see them daily offer their vows, they have several other manimate ones to whom they pay sacrifices, as I have observed at one of their public meetings, where I hap pened once to be

In this place there is a great altar to be seen, built round and covered with a green wachum, lighted in the midst, and encompassed by several persons in a sitting posture, as we do at our domestick sacrifices. At the very moment I came into the room, one of those, who I supposed was the priest, spread upon the altar certain leaves which he took out of a little book that he held in his hand. Upon these leaves were represented certain figures very awkwardly painted, however, they must needs be the images of some divinities, for in proportion as they were distributed round, each one of the assistants made an offering to it, greater or less according to his devotion. I observed that these offerings were more considerable than those they make in their other temples

After the aforesaid ceremony is over, the priest lays his hand in a trembling manner, as it were, upon the rest of the book, and continues some time in this posture, seized with fear, and without any action at all. All the rest of the company, attentive to what he does, are in suspense all the while, and the unmovable assistants are all of them in their turn possest by different agitations, according to the spirit which happens to seize them. One joins his hands together, and blesses Heaven, another, very earnestly looking upon his image, grinds his teeth, a third bites his fingers, and stamps upon the ground with his feet. Every one of them, in short, makes such extra ordinary postures and contortions, that they seem to be no longer rational creatures. But scarce has the priest returned a certain leaf, but he is likewise seized by the same fury with the rest. He tears the book, and devours it in his rage, throws down the altar, and curses the sacrifice. Nothing now is to be heard but complaints and groans, cries and imprecations. Seeing them so transported and so furious, I judge that the God that they worship is a jealous deity, who, to punish them for what they sacrifice to others, sends to each of them an evil demon to possess him

Laconics, or New Maxims of State and Conversation.

If your friend is in want, don't carry him to the tavern, where you treat yourself as well as him, and entail a thirst and headache upon him next morning. To treat a poor wretch with a bottle of Burgundy, or fill his snuff box, is like giving a pair of lace ruffles to a man that has never a shirt on his back. Put something into his pocket.

What is sauce for a goose is sauce for a gander When any calamities befell the Roman empire, the pagans used to lay it to the charge of the Christians when Christianity became the imperial religion, the Christians returned the same compliment to the pagans.

That which passes for current doctrine at one juncture and in one chimate won't do so in another. The cavaliers, in the beginning of the troubles, used to trump up the 12th of the Romans upon the parliament, the parliament trumped it upon the army, when they would not disband, the army back again upon the parliament, when they disputed their orders. Never was poor chapter so unmercifully tossed to and fro again.

Not to flatter ourselves, we English are none of the most constant and easy people in the world. When the late war pinched us—Oh! when shall we have a peace and trade again? We had no sooner a peace, but—Huzza, boys, for a new war! and that we shall soon be sick of

The surest way of governing, both in a private family and a kingdom, is for a husband and a prince sometimes to drop their prerogative.

What a fine thing it is to be well mannered upon occasion! In the reign of King Charles II a certain worthy divine at Whitehall thus addressed himself to the auditory at the conclusion of his sermon. John Vanbrugh united what Leigh Hunt called - for no very obvious reason - the 'apparently incompatible geniuses' of comic writer and architect. His Blenheim and Castle Howard have outlived The Provoked Wife or The Relapse, yet the latter were for many years highly popular, and even Pope, though he admits his want of grace, says that he never wanted wit The grand son of a Ghent Protestant refugee (Vanbrug), Vanbrugh was the son of a Cheshire sugar-baker who rose to be an esquire and comptroller of the Treasury Chamber, besides marrying the daughter of Sir Dudles Carlton Baptised in London 24th January 1664, young Vanbrugh was educated as architect in France, and by his wit, handsome figure, and geniality won a footing in society

SIR JOHN VANBRUGH
painted in 1725

1685 he obtained a commission in the army 1690 he was seized at Calais and imprisoned at Vincennes and in the Bastille, before his release in 1692 he had been planning a comedy Relapse (suggested by Colley Cibber's work) was produced with success in 1697, and was recast by Sheridan (as A Trip to Scarborough) in 1777, and by Hollingshead in 1870 Æsop (based on a French original) followed directly, The Provoked Wife (1697) produced a powerful impression The indecencies of the Relapse and the Provoked Wife were largely utilised by Jeremy Collier in his philippic against the contemporary stage. Later pieces were The False Friend (1702, from Lesage), and The Country House, The Confederacy, The Mistake (from Molière in 1705) Meanwhile as architect he had made his famous design for Castle Howard (built 1702-14), and Lord Carlisle appointed him Clarencieux King at-Arms In 1703-5 he built the

Oueen's Theatre in Haymarket, of which he was lessee, manager, and principal dramatic author In 1705 also he commenced his novel and imposing design for the great national structure at Blenheim, an enterprise that led to quarrels with the imperious Duchess of Marlborough, and was stopped by the queen's command in 1712 He was licavily out of pocket by the transaction, though some of the arrears were paid in the next The Duchess did her best to irritate and annoy him, and to make him liable for outlays Spite of these embarrassmade on her behalf ments, he built many noteworthy mansions, in cluding Dalkeith Palace, was knighted by George I. and appointed comptroller of the royal works and architect to Greenwich Hospital (in succession to He died at Whitehall, 20th March 1726 At the time of his death Vanbrugh was engaged on a comedy, finished by Colley Cibber as The Provoked Husband, and long a favourite piece. The architectural designs of Vanbrugh were praised by Sir Joshua Reynolds for their display of imagina tion and their originality of invention, but ridiculed by Swift and other wits of the day for heaviness and incongruity of design. His aim was always to produce the impression of vastness and grandiosity

The first thing in Vanbrugh's plays which strikes the reader is the lively ease of his dialogue greve had more wit, but less nature and less genuine unaffected humour and gaiety drew more from living originals, and depicted the manners of his times—the coarse debauchery of the country knight, the gallantry of town wits and fortune hunters, and the love of French intrigue and French manners in his female characters. Lord Foppington in the Relapse is the original of most of those luxurious coxcombs who abound in modern comedy, intent on dress, fashion and self indulgence, full of silly affectations (as in utterance), but not without wit and spirit he loses his mistress he consoles himself with this reflection

Now, for my part, I think the wisest thing a man can do with an aching heart is to put on a serene counter ance, for a philosophical air is the most becoming thing in the world to the face of a person of quality. I will therefore bear my disgrace like a great min and let the people see I am above an affront [Aloud] Dear Tam, since things are thus fallen out, prithee give me leave to wish thee joy. I do it de bon court—strike me dumb! You have married a woman beautiful in her person, charming in her airs, prudent in her conduct, canstant in her inclinations, and of a nice marality—split my windpipe!

The young lady thus eulogised, Miss Hoyden, is the lively, ignorant, romping country-girl to be met with in most of the comedies of this period. In the Provoked Wife the coarse pot-house valour and absurdity of Sir John Brute (Garrick's famous part) is well contrasted with the fine lady airs and affectation of his wife, transported from the country to the hotbed luxuries of London fashion and extravagance. Such scenes delighted our playgoing ancestors, and may still please us, in spite of faults of taste, for their own wit and, like antique family portraits, as pictures of a departed generation Vanbrugh's portraits were exaggerated and heightened for dramatic effect, yet on the whole they are characteristic likenesses There is an endless flow of vivacity and plenty of lively satire and broadly humorous raillery, but the whole is dashed with the most unblushing licentiousness 'The licence of the times,' as Leigh Hunt says, 'allowed Vanbrugh to be plain spoken to an extent which was perilous to his animal spirits, but, like Dryden, he to some extent repented of these indiscretions-though he was one of the most confident 'answerers' of Collier's impeachment.

The following is part of the scene in the Provoked Wife in which Sir John Brute, having disguised himself in his lady's dress and joined in a drunken midnight frolic, is taken by the constable and watchmen before a Justice of the Peace

Justice Well, Mr Constable, what is the matter there? Constable An't please your worship, this here comical sort of a gentlewoman has committed great outrages to-night. She has been frolicking with my Lord Rake and his gang, they attacked the watch, and I hear there has been a man killed. I believe 'tis they have done it.

Just Why, truly, she does seem a little masculine about the mouth.

2nd Watchman Yes, and about the hands too, an't please your worship I did but offer in mere civility to help her up the steps into our apartment, and with her gripen fist—ay, just so, sir [Sir John knocks him down Sir John I felled him to the ground like an ox.

Just Out upon this boisterous woman! Out upon her!
Sir John Mr Justice, he would have been uncivil! It was in defence of my honour, and I demand satisfaction was in defence of my honour, and I demand satisfaction 2nd Watch I hope your worship will satisfy her honour in Bridewell, that fist of hers will make an admirable hemp beater

Sir John Sir, I hope you will protect me against that libidinous rascal, I am a woman of quality and virtue too, for all I am in an undress this morning

Just Why, she has really the air of a sort of a woman a little something out of the common —Madam, If you expect I should be favourable to you, I desire I may know who you are.

Sir John Sir, I am anybody, at your service

Just Lady, I desire to know your name.

Sir John Sir, my name's Mary

Just Av, but your surname, madam?

Sir John Sir, my surname's the very same with my husband's.

Just A strange woman this!—Who is your husband, pray?

Sir John Sir Jolin

Just Sir John who?

Sir John Sir John Brute

Jus' Is it possible, madam, you can be my Lady Brute?

Sir John That happy woman, sir, am I only a little in my meriment to night.

Just I am concerned for Sir John

Sir John Truly so am I

Inst I have heard he's an honest gentleman

Sir John As ever drank.

Just Good lack! Indeed, lady, I'm sorry he has such a wife.

Sir John I am sorry he has any wife at all

Just And so, perhaps, may he.—I doubt you have not given him a very good taste of matrimony

Sir John Taste, sir l Sir, I have scorned to stint him to a taste, I have given him a full meal of it

Just Indeed I believe so! But pray, fair lady, may he have given you any occasion for this extraordinary conduct?—does he not use you well?

Sir John A little upon the rough sometimes

Inst Ay, any man may be out of humour now and then

Sir John Sir, I love peace and quiet, and when a woman don't find that at home, she's apt sometimes to comfort herself with a few innocent diversions abroad

Just I doubt he uses you but too well Pray how does he as to that weighty thing, money? Does he allow you what is proper of that?

Sir John Sir, I have generally enough to pay the reekoning, if this son of a whore of a drawer would but bring his bill

Just A strunge woman this!—Does he spend a reasonable portion of his time at home, to the comfort of his wife and children?

Sir John He never gave his wife cause to repine at his being abroad in his life

Just 'Tis a great pity he should have been thus disposed of —Pray, madam (and then I've done), what may be your ladyship's common method of life? If I may presume so far

Str John Why, sir, much that of a woman of quality Just Pray how may you generally pass your time, madam? your morning for example.

Sir John Sir, like a woman of quality. I wake about two o'clock in the afternoon—I stretch—and make a sign for my chocolate. When I have drank three cups I slide down again upon my back, with my arms over my head, while my two maids put on my stockings. Then, hanging upon their shoulders, I am trailed to my great chair, where I sit—and yawn—for my breakfast. If it don't come presently, I he down upon my couch to say my prayers, while my maid reads me the play bills

Just Very well, madam

Sir John When the tea is brought in, I drink twelve regular dishes, with eight slices of bread and butter And half an hour after, I send to the cook to know if the dinner is almost ready

Just So, madam !

Sir John By that time my head is half dressed, I hear my husband swearing himself into a state of perdition that the meat's all cold upon the table, to amend which I come down in an hour more, and have it sent back to the kitchen to be all dressed over again

Just Poor man!

Sir John When I have dired, and my idle servants are presumptuously set down at their case, to do so too, I call for my coach, to go visit fifty dear friends, of whom I hope I shall never find one at home while I shall live

Just So, there's the morning and afternoon pretts well disposed of ' Pray, madam, how do you passyour evenings?

Sir John Like a woman of spirit, sir, a great spirit Give me a box and dice Seven's the main! Oons! Sir, I set you a hundred pound! Why, do you think women are married now a days to sit at home and mend napkins? Sir, we have nobler ways of passing time

Just Mercy upon us, Mr Constable, what will this age come to 2

Con What will it come to, indeed, if such women as these are not set in the stocks?

Sir John Sir, I have a little urgent business calls upon me, and therefore I desire the favour of you to bring matters to a conclusion

Just Madam, if I were sure that business were not to commit more disorders, I would release you

Sir John None

Just Then, Mr Constable, you may discharge her Sir John Sir, your very humble servant. If you please to accept of a bottle——

Just I thank you kindly, madam, but I never drink in a morning Good by t'ye, madam, good by t'ye

There are editions of Vanbrugh by W A Ward (1893) and A. E. H. Swaen (1896).

William Congreve wrote a series of comedies which, more than any others in the English language, abound in witty dialogue and lively incident, though their licentiousness has banished them from the stage. Born at Bardsey near Leeds, and baptised 10th February 1670, he was of a good family, and his father held a military employment in Ireland, where the poet was educated-first at Kilkenny School, and then at Trinity College, He studied law in the Middle Temple, but finding, as Leigh Hunt says, that, having family as well as wit and scholarship, he could make way in life without a profession, he early began to write His first publication was a novel of cross purposes and disguises, Incognita, full of ornate Gongorism and silly mock-sentiment, not without resemblances to Shakespeare's funcy plays, and closely akm to the prose comedy invented by Etherege and strengthened by Wycherles translated the seventh satire of Juvenal (1692), and next appeared as a writer for the stage His Old Bachelor was produced, under Dryden's auspices, in January 1693, and acted with great applause. Other plays soon appeared The Double Dealer in 1693, Love for Love in 1695, Mourning Bride, a tragedy, in 1697, and The Way of the World in 1700 In 1710 he published a collection of miscellaneous poems, of which one little piece, Dorrs, is worthy of his fame. position was assured as one of the foremost wits He was eminently popular in society, and good fortune faithfully followed him He received a succession of lucrative offices—a commissionership of wine licenses (1705-14), the secretaryship for Jamaica (from the first year of George I's reign, and worth £700 a year), and an appointment in the Customs He was flattered and praised, was treated as a literary genius of the first rank, but was singularly free of literary jealous; in the sunshine of opulence and courtly society, Congreve wished to forget that he was an author, he maintained the affectation of insisting that his plays were dashed off quite carelessly for his own amusement, and when Voltaire waited upon him. he said he would rather be considered a gentleman than a poet 'If you had been merely a gentle man,' said the witty Trenchman, 'I should not have come to visit you? He lived a luxurious and apparently happy life, though latterly afflicted with gout and an affection of the eyes which termi nated in total blindness. He died at his house in London on 19th January 1730 Congreve had contracted a close intimacy with the Duchess of Marlborough (daughter of the great Duke), sat at her table drily, and assisted in her household management On his death he left the bulk of his fortune, amounting to about £10,000, to this eccentric lady The Duchess spent seven of the ten thousand pounds in the purchase of a diamond necklace. 'How much better would it have been to have given it to Mrs Bricegirdle!' said Young the poet and clergyman, indeed it was commonly believed-wrongly-that the famous actress had been married to Congreve Johnson thought it should have gone to the Congreve family, then in distress and poverty The Duchess honoured the poet's remains with a splendid funeral. The corpse lay in state under the ancient roof of the Jerusalem Chamber, and was interred in Westminster Abber The pall was borne by the Duke of Bridgewater, Lord Cobham, the Earl of Wilmington (who lind been Speaker, and was afterwards first Lord of the Treasury), and other men of high consideration The Duchess of Marlborough, if report is to be believed, further manifested her regard for the de ceased poet in a manner that spoke more for her devotion than her taste. It is said that she had a figure of him in nory or was, which moved by clockwork, and was placed daily at her table, and that the feet of this doll were regularly blistered and anointed by the doctors, as poor Congreve's feet had been for the gout.

Congreve remains the greatest master of the English comedy of repartee. Dryden complimented him as adorned by every muse and grace, and, extravagant in panegyric, declared of him

Heaven, that but once was produgal before, To Shakespeare gave as much, he could not gave him more

Pope dedicated to him his translation of the Iliad What higher honours could have been paid to a writer whose laurels were won by the age of thirty? Yet his plays are generally without the higher gifts of poetry or imagination, and his comic genius was devoted to illustrating a scheme of life almost wholly given up to sensuality and intrigue, with out a trace of higher or nobler aims, or the barest sense of responsibility. He is the most perfect master of polished dramatic dialogue in English, and had no equal as a painter of con temporary life and manners, such as they were He is not so grossly indecent as Etherege or Wycherley. We admire his brilliant dialogue and repartee, and his wealth of incident and variety of character, but the absence of the higher virtues which ennoble life-the beauty and gracefulness of woman's virtue, the feelings of generosity, truth, honour, affection, modesty, and tenderness-leaves his pages barren and lacking in any permanent interest. His glittering, artificial life palls on the lovers of nature or of poetry His second comedy, the Double Dealer, was in every way stronger than the Old Bachelor, but either the satire on the heartless sexual morals of the time was too serious to please the people satirised, or even Congreve's complaisant public were shocked by the outrageous immorality of Maskwell and Lady Touchwood The play was a failure at first, but its merits were soon fully recognised The Mourning Muse of Alexis, a poetic dialogue on Queen Mary's death. was as full of artificial conceits as Incognita Love for Love is, no doubt, the finest prose comedy in the English language So late as 1842 Macready revived it (modified, of course) at Drury Lane, and there have been still later revivals (as in Mr Watts-Dunton has said of it that, abundant and brilliant as is the wit, the coruscations do not, as in Congreve's other plays, outdazzle the sweeter and softer light of the humour, and the characterisation is true, some of it beautiful the character of Ben, Congreve gave here the first really humorous and effective presentation of the rollicking English tar, afterwards so frequent and fertile a subject in the hands of Smollett and other novelists and dramatists The Mourning Bride, Congreve's only tragedy, possesses higher merit than most of the serious plays of that day Vincaulay said, it is poor compared with Shakespeare and with the best plays of Ford or Massinger, but stands high amongst the tragedies of the age in which it was written To find anything so good one must go back to Otwav's Venuce Preserved or forward to Rowe's Fair Penitent It has the stiffness of the French school, with no small affectation of fine writing, without passion, yet it possesses poetical scenes and admirable passages, nobly The opening lines have often been worded quoted

Music has charms to soothe a savage breast,
To soften rocks, or bend a knotted oak
I've read that things manimate have moved,
And, as with living souls, have been informed
By magic numbers and persuasive sound
What then am I? Am I more senseless grown Than tree, or flint? O force of constant woe!

Congreve was next busily occupied in the famous Jeremy Collier controversy, defending the morality of the new stage (see page 35). It would have been wiser had he, like Dryden, remained silent, his answer to Collier's trenchant polemic was voted dull even by his own party. Collier produced a powerful repartee, and the public were mainly on the side of the Nonjuring High Churchman. Congreve's last play, The Way of the World (1700), though quite as full of intellectual brilliance as

Love for Love, and evidently written with more care, not to say labour, licks the humorous impulse seen in Congreve's masterpiece. The wit of the dialogue is not sufficiently held in hand to work out the characters and the plot. It comes more completely than does any other of Congreve's plays within the scope of the Duke of Buckingham's strictures (see Vol. I. p. 788) upon the comedy of repartee.

Another fault, which often does befal, Is when the wit of some great poet shall So overflow, that is, be none at all, That ev'n his fools speak sense, as if possest, And each by inspiration breaks his jest, If once the justness of each part be lost, Well may we laugh, but at the poet's cost

The Way of the World was received with comparative coldness, and Congreve wrote no more for the stage, for the next twenty-eight years he did not add to his literary reputation

Dr Johnson thought the following extract from the Mourning Bride, describing a cathedral, the most poetical paragraph in the whole range of the drama—finer than any in Shakespeare—and by such extravagant eulogy injured the piece Had he said it was better than anything in the tragedies of Dryden, Lee, Otway, Rowe, Southerne, or Addison, he would not, in Viacaulay's judgment and ours, have been far wrong

Almeria It was a fancied noise, for all is hushed Leonora It bore the accent of a human voice.

How reverend is the face of this tall pile, Whose ancient pillars rear their marble heads To bear aloft its arched and ponderous roof, By its own weight made steadfast and immovable, Looking tranquillity—It strikes an awe And terror on my aching sight, the tombs And monumental caves of death look cold, And shoot a chillness to my trembling heart. Give me thy hand, and let me hear thy voice, Nay, quickly speak to me, and let me hear Thy voice—my own affrights me with its echoes Leon—Let us return, the horror of this place

Or wind me in the shroud of some pale corpse

Yet green in earth, rather than be the bride

Are lost in dread of greater ill. Then shew me,

Where I may kneel and pay my yows again

To him, to Heaven and my Alphonso's soul

In Congreve's comedies there is a constant stream of wit and liveliness, and quick interchange of dialogue and incident. He was a master of dramatic rules and art, but was often careless and sometimes too complicated in his plots. From the sparkling, highly wrought love-scenes of Congreve it would be perilous to quote. I have read two or three of Congreve's plays over before speaking of him,' said. Thackeray in one of his famous lectures, 'and my feelings were rather like those which I dare say most of us here live had at Pompeu, looking at Sallust's house and the relics of an orgy—

a dried wine-iar or two, a charred supper-table, the breast of a dancing-girl pressed against the ashes. the laughing skull of a jester, a perfect stillness round about, as the cicerone twangs his moral, and the blue sky shines calmly over the The Con greve muse is dead, and her song choked in Time's ashes We gaze at the skeleton, and wonder at the life which once revelled in its mad veins We take the skull up, and muse over the frolic and daring, the wit, scorn, passion, hope, desire, with which that empty bowl once fermented We think of the glances that allured, the tears that melted, of the bright eyes that shone in those vicant sockets, and of hips whispering love and cheeks dimpling with smiles that once covered you ghastly framework. They used to call those teeth pearls once. See I there's the cup she drank from, the gold chain she wore on her neck, the vase which held the rouge for her cheeks, her looking-glass, and the harp she used to dance to Instead of a feast we find a grave stone, and in place of a mistress a few bones!'

Sharper Ay, sir, my name 's Sharper

Str Jos Pray, Mr Sharper, embrace my back—very well By the Lord Harry, Mr Sharper, he is as brave a fellow as Cannibal, are you not, bully back?

Sharper Hannibal, I believe you mean, Sir Joseph? Bluffe Undoubtedly he did, sir Faith, Hannibal was a very pretty fellow, but, Sir Joseph, comparisons are odious. Hannibal was a very pretty fellow in those days, it must be granted, but alas, sir, were he alive now, he would be nothing, nothing in the earth

Sharper How, sir? I make a doubt if there be at this day a greater general breathing

Bluffe Oh, excuse me, sir, liave you served abroad,

Sharper Not I, really, slr

Bluffe Oh, I thought so —Why, then, you can know nothing, sir I am afraid you scarce know the history of the late war in Flanders with all its particulars

Sharper Not I, sir, no more than public papers or greettes tell us.

Bluffe Gazette! Why, there again now—why, sir, there are not three words of truth, the year round, put into the Gazette.—I'll tell you a strange thing now as to that. You must know, sir, I was resident in Flanders the last campaign, had a small post there, but no matter for that. Perhaps, sir, there was scarce any thing of inoment done but a humble servant of yours that shall be nameless was an eye witness of—I won't say had the greatest share in 't, though I might say that too, since I name nobody, you know Well, Mr Sharper, would you think it? In all this time, as I hope for a truncheon, that rascally gazette writer never so much as once mentioned me—not once, by the wars! Took no more notice than as if Nol Bluffe had not been in the laud of the living

Sharfer Strange 1

Sir Jos Yet, by the Lord Harry, its true Mr Sharper, for I went every day to coffee houses to read the Gazette myself

Bluffe Ay, ay, no matter You see, Mr Sharper, after all, I am content to retire—live a private person. Scipio and others have done it

Sharper Impudent rogue! [Aside

Sir for Ay this damned modests of yours—egad, if he would put in for 't, he might be made general himself yet.

Bluffe Oh, fi, no, Sir Joseph, you know I hate this

Sir Jos Let me but tell Mr Sharper a little, how you ate fire once out of the mouth of a cannon, egad, he did, those impenetrable whiskers of his have confronted flames.

Bluffe Death' What do you mean, Sir Joseph?
Sir Jos Look you now, I tell you he's so modest, he'll own nothing

Bluff: Pish, you have put me out, I have forgot what I was about. Pray, hold your tongue, and give me leave——————————————————[Angrily

Str Jos I am dumb

Bluffe This sword I think I was telling you of, Mr Sharper,—this sword I'll muntain to be the best divine, anatomist, lawyer, or casuist in Europe, it shall decide a controversy, or split a cause

Sir Jos Nay, now, I must speak, it will split a liair, by the Lord Harry, I have seen it.

Bluffe Zounds, sir, it's a lie' you have not seen it, nor shan't see it sir, I say you can't see What d'ye say to that, now?

Sir Jos I am blind

Bluffe Death ' had any other man interrupted me— Sir Jos Good Mr Sharper, speak to him, I dare not look that way

Sharfer Captain, Sir Joseph's penitent

Bluffe Oh, I am calm, sir, calm as a discharged culverin—bit 'twas indiscreet, when you know what will provoke me. Nay, come, Sir Joseph, you know my heat's soon over

Sir Jos Well, I am a fool sometimes, but I'm sorry Bluffe Enough

Sir Jos Come, we'll go take a glass to drown ani mosities - Mr Sharper, will you partake?

Sharper I wait on you, sir, nay, pray Captain, --- you are Sir Josephi's back (From Act 11 se. 1)

From 'The Double Dealer'

Lady Frolli Then you think that episode between Susan the dairy maid and our coachman is not amiss? You know I may suppose the dairy in town, as well as in the country

Brisk Incomparable, let me perish! But, then, being an heroic poem, had you not better call him a charioteer? Charioteer sounds great. Besides, your ladyship's coachman having a red face, and you comparing him to the sun—and you know the sin is called Heaven's charioteer

Lady F Oh! infinitely better, I am extremely be a holden to you for the lint Stay we'll read over those half a-score lines again. [Pulls out a paper] Let me see here, you know what goes before—the comparison you know [Reads]

For as the sun shines every day, So of our coachman I may say—

Brisk I nm afraid that simile won't do in wet weather, because you say the sun shines every day

Lady F No for the sun it won't, but it will do for the conchinan, for you know there's most occasion for a coach in wet weather

Brisk. Right, right that saves all

Lady F Then I don't say the sun shines all the day, but that he peeps now and then, yet he does shine all the day, too, you know, though we don't see him.

Brisk Right, but the vulgar will never comprehend that.

Lady F Well you shall hear Let me see [Reads]

For as the sun shines every day, So of our coachman I may say, He shews his drunken fiery face Just as the sun does, more or less

Brisi That's right, all's well, all's well More or

Lady [ [keads]

And when at night his labour's done, Then, too, like heaven's charioteer, the sun—

Av charioteer does better-

Into the dairy he descends, And there his whipping and his driving ends There he's secure from danger of a bilk, His fare is paid him, and he sets in milk

For Susan, you know, is Thetis, and so-

Brisk Incomparable well and proper, egad! But I have one exception to make don't you think 'bilk'—I know it sig good rhyme—but don't you think 'bilk' and 'fare' too like a hackney coachman?

Lady T I swear and vow I'm afraid so And yet our Jeliu was a hackney coachman when my lord took Brisk Was he? I'm answered, if Jehn was a hackney coachman \ \ \text{\text{ou may put that in the marginal notes}} \text{though, to prevent criticism, only mark it with a small asterisk, and say, 'Jehn was formerly a hackney coachman'

Lady F I will, vou'd oblige me extremely to write notes to the whole poem

Brisk With all my heart and soul, and proud of the vast honour, let me pensh!

Lord Froth Hee, hee, hee my dear, have you done? Won t you join with us? We were laughing at my Lady Whister and Mr Sneer

Lady F Ay, my dear, were you? Oh! filthy Mr Snecr, he's a nauscous figure, 1 most fulsamie [fulsome] fop, fol! He spent two days together in going about Covent Garden to suit the lining of his coach with his complexion

I end I O silly! Let his aunt is as fond of him as if she had brought the ape into the world herself

Brisk Who? my Lady Toothless? Oh, she's a mor tifving spectacle, she's always chewing the cud like an old ewe

Conthia Ty, Mr Brisk I eringos for her cough

Let  $d\Gamma$  I have seen her take 'em half chewed out of her mouth, and then put them in again—foli'

Iatj I Foli!

Lerd  $\Gamma$  Then she's always ready to laugh when Sneer offers to speak, and sits in expectation of his no jest, with her guins bare, and her mouth open——

Erisk Iske an ovster at low ebb, egad! Ha, ha, ha lead of the last and last and lead of the last and l

I.a.f. F. Then that t'other great strapping lady, I can't hit of her name, the old fat fool that puints so exorbitantly

Bri k I know whom you mean But, dence take me, I can't list of her name either Paints, d'ye say? Why she lays it on with a trovel i Then she has a treat board that bristles through it and makes her look as if she were plastered with lime and hur, let me perish!

Ladi f Oh' you made a song upon her, Mr Brisk

Brisk He? egad, so I did—my lord can sing it.

Cynthia O good my lord, let's hear it

Brisk 'Tis not a song neither—it's a sort of epigram or rather an epigrammatic sonnet, I don't know what to call it, but it's satire Sing it, my lord

Lord F [Sings]

Ancient Phylhs has young graces,
'Is a strange thing, but a true one,
Shall I tell you how?
She herself makes her own faces,
And each morning wears a new one,
Where's the wonder now?

Brisk Short, but there's salt in't, my way of writing, egad! (From Act in. sc. 3.)

From 'Love for Love'

Ben Legend Where's father?
Servant There, sir, his back's towards you

Sir Sampson My son, Ben! Bless thee, my dear boy, body o' me, thou art heartily welcome.

Ben Thank you, father, and I'm glad to see you Sir S Odsbud, and I'm glad to see thee Kiss me, boy, kiss me again and again, dear Ben. [Kisses him Ben So, so, enough, father Mess, I'd rather kiss these gentlewomen

Sir S And so thou shalt. Mrs Angelica, my son Ben Ben Forsooth, if you please. [Salutes her] Nay, Mistress, I'm not for dropping anchor here, about ship i' faith. [Kisses Mrs Frail] Nay, and you too, my little cock boat—so [Kisses Miss Prue]

Tattle Sir, you're welcome ashore

Ben Thank you, thank you, friend
Sir S Thou hast been many a weary league, Ben, since I say thee.

Ben Ly, ey, been! been far enough, an that be all Well, father, and how do all at home? How does brother Diek and brother Val?

Sir S Dick! body o me, Dick has been dead these two years, I writ you word when you were at Leghorn

Ben Mess, that's true marry, I had forgot Dick's dead, as you say Well, and how? I have a many questions to ask you Well, you ben't married again, father, be you?'

Sir S No, I intend you shall marry, Ben, I would not marry for thy sake

Ben Nay, what does that signify?—an you marry again, why, then, I'll go to sea again, so there's one for t'other, an that be all Pray, don't let me be your hindrance, e'en inarry a God's name, an the wind sit that way As for my part, mayhap I have no mind to marry

Mrs Frail That would be a pity, such a handsome young gentleman

Ben Handsome! he, he, he, nay, forsooth, an you be for joking, I'll joke with you, for I love my jest, an the ship were sinking, as we say not sea. But I'll tell you why I don't much stand towards matrimony. I love to roam about from port to port, and from land to land I could never abide to be port bound, as we call it Now, a man that is married has as it were, d'ye see, his feet in the hilboes, and mayhap mayn't get 'em out again when he would.

Sir S Ben's a wag

Ben A man that is married, d'ye see, is no more like another man than a galley slave is like one of us free sailors. He is chained to an oar all his life, and may hap forced to tug a leaky vessel into the bargain

Sir S Avery wag! Ben's a very wag! only a little rough, he vants a little polishing

Mrs F Not at all, I like his humour mightily, it's plain and honest, I should like such a humour in a liusband extremely Ben Say'n you so, forsooth? Marry, and I should like such a handsome gentlewoman hugely. How say you, mistress! would you like going to sea? Mess, you're a tight vessel, and well rigged. But I'll tell you one thing, an you come to sea in a high wind, or that, lady, you mayn't carry so much sail o' your head. Top and topgallant, by the mess

Miss I No? why so?

Ben Why, an you do, you may run the risk to be overset, and then you'll carry your keels above water, he, he, he.

Angelica I swear Mr Benjamin is the veriest wag in nature-an absolute sea wit

Sir S Nay, Ben has parts, but, as I told you before, they want a little polishing. You must not take any thing ill, madam

Hen No, I hope the gentlewoman is not angry, I mean all in good part, for if I give a jest, I take a jest, and so, forsooth, you may be as free with me.

Ang I thank you, sir, I am not at all offended But methinls, Sir Sampson, you should leave him alone with his mistress Mr Tattle, we must not hinder lovers

Tattle Well, Miss, I liave your promise. [Aside Sir S Body o' me, madam, you say true. Look you,

Ben, this is your mistress Come, Miss, you must not be shame faced, we'll leave you together

Miss Prue I can't abide to be left alone, mayn't my cousin stay with me?

Sir S No, no, come, let's away

Ben Look you, father, may hap the young woman mayn't take a liking to me.

Sir S I warrant thee, boy, come, come, ve'll be gone, I ll venture that [They leave Ben and Miss Prue alone

Ben Come, mistress, will you please to sit down? for an you stand astern a that'n, we shall never grapple together Come, I'll haul a chair, there, an you please to sit, I'll sit beside you

Miss Prue You need not sit so near one, if you have anything to say, I can hear you farther off, I an't deaf

Ben Why, that's true as you say, nor I ant dumb, I can be heard as far as another I II heave off to please you [Sits further off] An we were a league asunder, I'd undertake to hold discourse with you, an 'twere not a main high wind indeed, and full in my teeth. Look you, forsooth, I am as it were bound for the land of matrimony, 'tis a voyage, d ye see, that was mone of my seeking, I was commanded by father, and if you like of it, may hap I may steer into your harbour. How say you, mistress? The short of the thing is, that if you like me, and I like yon, we may chance to swing in a hammool together.

Miss P I don't know what to say to you, nor I don't care to speak with you at all

Ben No? I'm sorry for that. But pray, why are you so scornful?

Miss P As long as one must not speal one's nund, one had better not speak at all, I think, and truly I won't tell a he for the matter

Ben Nay, you say true in that, it s but a folly to lie, for to speak one thing, and to think just the contrary way, is, as it were, to look one way and to row another Nov, for my part, d'ye see, I'm for carrying things above loard, I'm not for keeping anything under hatchies, so that if you ben't as willing as I, say so a God's name, there's no harm done. Mayhap you may be shaine faced, some mudens, thof they love a man well enough, yet they don't care to tell'n so to's face. If that's the ease, why, silence gives consent.

Miss P But I'm sure it is not so, for I'll speak sooner than you should believe that, and I'll speak truth, though one should always tell a lie to a man, and I don't care, let my father do what he will, I'm too big to be whipt, so I'll tell you plainly I don't like you, nor love you at all, nor never will, that's more. So there's your answer for you, and don't trouble me no more, you ugly thing!

Ben Look you, young woman, you may learn to give good words, however I spoke you fair, d'ye see, and civil As for your love or your liking, I don't value it of a rope's end, and mayhap I like you as little as you do me. What I said was in obedience to father I fear a whipping no more than you do But I tell you one thing, if you should give such language at sea, you'd have a cat o' nine tails laid across your shoulders. I lesh! who are you? You heard t'other handsome young woman speak civilly to me of her own accord. Whatever you think of yourself, I don't think you are any more to compare to her than a can of small beer to a bowl of punch.

Miss P Well, and there's a handsome gentleman, and a fine gentleman, and a sweet gentleman, that was here, that loves me, and I love him, and if he sees you speak to me any more, he'll thrash your jacket for you, he will, you great sea calf!

Ben What ' do you mean that fair weather spark that was here just now? Will lie thrush my jacket? Let 'n, let 'n—but an he comes near me, mayhap I may give him a salt eel for 's supper, for all that What does father mean, to leave me alone, as soon as I come home, with such a dirty dowdy? Sea calf! I an't calf enough to liek your chalked face, you cheese curd you Marry thee! oons, I'll marry a Lapland witch as soon, and live upon selling contrary winds and wrecked vessels

Miss P I won't be called names, nor I won't be abused thus, so I won't If I were a man [Cries] you durst not talk at this rate, no, you durst not, you stinking tar barrel!

(From Act ul. sc. 3.)

A good edition of Congreses comedies is that by Mr Henley (1895) all the plays were edited for the Mermaid Series by A. C. Ewald (1883) and there is a short I ife by Mr Gosse (1890)

Nathaniel Lee (1653?-92) was possessed of no small share of the fire of genius, though in him genius was near allied to madness. The son of a Hertfordshire clergyman, a Presbiterian and a pluralist, who conformed at the Restoration, Lee received a classical education at Westminster School and at Trinity College, Cambridge. He tried the stage both as an actor and author, was patronised by Rochester, lived a dissipated and vicious life, and was five years in Bedlam from wild insanity. Recovering his reason, he lived on precarious gifts or charity; and falling into intemperance again, died from the effects of a fall when he was drunk. He was the author of about a dozen tragedies, mainly on classical themes. The best of the tragedies are The Rival Queens, or Alexander the Great, Mithridates, Theodosius, and Lucius Junius Brutus His comedy, The Princess of Cleve, was founded on Madame La Fayette's romance. Several of the plays were long popular, Alexander (as The Rival Queens came to be called) held the stage for a hundred and fifty years The earlier (and least successful) plays were in rhyme, from Alexander on they were mostly in blank verse. Lee had the honour of being invited to collaborate with Dryden in two pieces In praising Alexander and his friend's power to move the passions, Dryden counsels him to despise those critics who condemn 'the too much vigour of his youthful muse' Here is indicated the source both of Lee's strength and of his weakness. In tenderness and genuine passion he excels Dryden, but his style often degenerates into bombast and extravagant frenzy -defects heightened in his late productions by his Poor Nat was aware of his weak-'It has often been observed against me,' ness he says in his dedication of Theodosius, 'that I abound in ungoverned fancy, but I hope the world will pardon the sallies of youth despondency, and dulness come too fast of themselves. I discommend no man for keeping the beaten road, but I am sure the noble hunters that follow the game must leap hedges and ditches sometimes, and run at all, or never come into the fill of a quarry' Colley Cibber denounces Lee's 'furious fustian and turgid rant,' Addison says his thoughts are 'frequently lost in such a cloud of words that it is hard to see the beauty of them There is an infinite fire in his works, but so involved in smoke that it does not appear in half its lustre.' Steele finds in Alexander 'passion in its purity drawn by a mad poet.' Lee wanted discretion to temper his too luxuriant genius and reduce his poetical conceptions to consistency and order, yet among his wild ardout and rhapsodical enthusiasm are very powerful and graceful lines and passages The following is an unusually pregnant comparison Speech is morning to the mind, It spreads the beauteous images atroad, Which else lie furled and clouded in the soul

This is a fragment from Lee's Sophenisba

Love, that brightest jewel of a crown, That fires ambition and adorns renown, That with sweet liopes does our harsh pains beguile, And midst of javelins makes the soldier smile

And here is a declaration of love from Theodosius

No more of this, no more, for I disdain All pomp when thou art by far be the noise Of kings and courts from us, whose gentle souls Our kinder stars have steered another way kree as the forest birds we'll pair together, Fly to the arbours, grots, and flowery meads, And in soft murmnrs interchange our souls Together drink the crystal of the stream, Or taste the yellow fruit which autumn yields, And when the golden evening calls us home; Wing to our downy nest, and sleep till morn.

From the same play comes this on self-murder

What torments are allotted those sad spirits,
Who, groaning with the burden of despair,
No longer will endure the cares of life,
But boldly set themselves at liberty,
Through the dark caves of death to wander on,
Like wildered travellers, without a guide,
Eternal rovers in the gloomy maze
Where scarce the twilight of an infant morn,
By a faint glimmer checkering through the trees,
Reflects to dismal view the walking ghosts,
That never hope to reach the blessed fields

Lee's heroic style—verging upon rodomontade—may be seen in lines such as those on Brutus throwing off his disguise of idiocy after the rape of Lucrece by Tarquin

As from night's womb the glorious day breaks forth, And seems to kindle from the setting stars, So, from the blackness of young Tarquin's crime And furnace of his lust, the virtuous soul Of Jinnius Brutus catches bright occasion.

I see the pillars of his kingdom totter The rape of Lucrece is the midnight lantern That lights my genius down to the foundation.

Leave me to work, my Titus, O my son I For from this spark a lightning shall arise, That must ere night purge all the Roman air, And then the thunder of his ruin follows.

For Warburton the following speech of Alexander's contained 'not only the most sublime but the most judicious imagery that poetry could conceive or paint,' for Joseph Warton, on the other hand, there was not in the language 'a more striking example of true turgid expression and genuine fustian and bombast'

When Glory, like the dazzling eagle, stood Perched on my bearer in the Granic flood, When Fortune's self my standard trembling bore, And the pale Fates stood frighted on the shore, When the Immortals on the billows rode, And I myself appeared the leading god

Warton was surely the truer critic.

"Tis hard to be in love and to be wise' is a sen tentious saying from The Princess of Cleve "Tis beauty calls and glory leads the way' is found in Alexander the Great, and thence, too, comes the so variously worded stock quotation about Greek meeting Greek, which is almost never correctly given, and whose authorship and contextual meaning are utterly ignored. It occurs in the heated dispute between Alexander and Kleitos (Lee's Clytus) which goaded Alexander to murdering the old friend who had saved his life. Lee embellishes the standard story with 'an entertainment of Indian singers and dancers the music flourishes' [in Sogdiana, or, say, Bokhara]. When they had well drunken, Alexander asks the leading question

Who, think you, was the bravest general That ever led an army to the field?

Hephestion, Lysimachus, and the rest with one consent exalt Alexander above all generals dead or alive. Clytus alone, jealous for his old master's fame and the glory of the older military school, is silent for a space. Alexander, delighted with the general chorus of adulation, replies

O, you flatter me!

Clytus They do indeed, and yet ye love them for it,
But hate old Clytus for his hardy virtue.
Come, shall I speak a man more brave than you,
A better general and more expert soldier?

Alexander I should be glad to learn, instruct me, sir

Cly Your father Philip I have seen him march, And fought beneath his dreadful banner, where The stoutest at the table would ha' trembled Nay, frown not, sir, you cannot look me dead When Greeks joyned Greeks, then was the tug of war, The laboured battle sweat, and conquest bled. Why should I fear to speak a truth more noble Than e'er your father Jupiter Ammon told you? Philip fought men, but Alexander women [envy!

Alex Spite! by the gods, proud spite and burning Is then my glory come to this at list, To vanquish women?

And so the debate waxes hot and personal, and after swift exchange of a few stinging speeches, Alexander strikes Clytus through with a javelin. The harsh line with the strained personification of battle and conquest is characteristic of Lee, 'sweat' is of course the old past tense.

John Crowne was the son of 'Colonel' William Crowne, who before 1656 migrated from England to Nova Scotia, and received a grant of land from Cromwell After the Restoration these lands were taken possession of by the French, and John Crowne, coming to England, was for some time gentleman-usher to an old He afterwards became an author by pro fession, and died in obscurity about 1703 He had for a while the doubtful honour of being patronised by Rochester, in opposition to Dryden, as a dramatic poet. His first work was a romance, Pandion and Amphigenera (1665) Between 1671 and 1698 he wrote a dozen plays, including Calisto, a court masque, tragedies, comedies, and a tragi-comedy, besides Timon, a satire, and a heroic poem on the destruction of Jerusalem, a burlesque, &c. Several of the tragedies were on classical subjects, and some The Thyestes tragedy were on English history (1681), founded on Seneca, was well received, and contains not a few fine and powerful The comedy City Politiques takes off many of the conspicuous personages of the day, but the most popular of all Crowne's works was the comedy Sir Courtly Nice (1685)

From 'Thyestes'

Thyestes O wondrous pleasure to a banished man, I feel my loved, long looked-for native soil! And oh! my weary eyes, that all the day Had from some mountain travelled toward this place, Now rest themselves upon the royal towers Of that great palace where I had my birth O sacred towers, sacred in your height, Mingling with clouds, the villas of the gods, Whither for sacred pleasures they retire Sacred, because you are the work of gods. Your lofty looks boast your divine descent. And the proud city which lies at your feet, And would give place to nothing but to you. (From Act IV sc. 1)

Wishes for Obscurity

How miserable a thing is a great man! Take noisy vexing greatness they that please, Give me obscure and safe and silent case. Acquaintance and commerce let me have none With any powerful thing but Time alone My rest let Time be fearful to offend, And creep by me as by a slumbering friend, Till, with ease glutted, to my bed I steal, As men to sleep after a plenteous meal Oh, wretched he who, called abroad by power, To know himself can never find an hour! Strange to himself, but to all others known, Lends every one his life, but uses none, So, ere he tasted life, to death he goes, And himself loses ere himself he knows.

(From Threstes, Act L)

Passions

We oft by lightning read in darkest nights, And by your passions I read all your natures, Though you at other times can keep them dark

Love in Women

These are great maxims, sir, it is confessed, Too stately for a woman's narrow breast Poor love is lost in men's capacious minds, In ours, it fills up all the room it finds

Inconstancy of the Multitude

I'll not such favour to rebellion show,
To wear a crown the people do bestow,
Who, when their giddy violence is past,
Shall from the king, the adored, revolt at last
And then the throne they gave they shall invade,
And scorn the idol which themselves have made

Warriors

I hate these potent madmen, who keep all Mankind awake, while they, by their great deeds, Are drumming hard upon this hollow world, Only to make a sound to last for ages.

Crownes works were edited in 1873-74 by Maidment and Logan (4 vols. 6vo).

George Farquhar (1678-1707) was a better artist, in stage effect and happy combinations of incident and adventure, than most of this rice of comic writers He had an uncontrollable vivacity and love of sport, which still render his comedies attractive both on the stage and in the closet. Farquhar was an Irishman, born in Londonderry After some months at Tranity College, Dublin, he took to the stage, but happening dangerously to wound a fellow-actor in a fencing-scene, he left the boards at the age of eighteen, and procured a commission in the army from the Earl of Orrery first play, Love and a Bottle, came out at Drury Lane in 1698, The Constant Couple in 1700, Sir Harry Wildair in 1701, The Inconstant in 1703, The Stage-coach in 1704, The Twin Rivals in 1705, The Recruiting Officer in 1706, and The Beaux' Stratagem in 1707 Farquhar was early married to a lady who had deceived him by pretending to be possessed of a fortune, and he sank a victim to ill-health and over-evertion in his thirtieth year A letter written shortly before his death to Wilkes the actor possesses a touching brevity of expression 'Dear Bob, I have not any thing to leave to thee to perpeluate my memory but two helpless girls Look upon them sometimes, and think of him that was to the last moment of his life thine—George Farqu'Har.' One of these daughters, it appears, married a 'low tradesman,' and the other became a servant, while their mother died in utter poverty

The Beaux' Stratagem is Farquhar's best comedy. The plot is admirably managed, and the disguises of Archer and Aimwell form a ludicrous yet natural series of incidents. Boniface, the landlord, is still a favourite on the stage, and hence the name (originally Boniface, as if to express genial looks, and not a derivative from the Litin Bonifacius) has become in ordinary name for any innkeeper as such. Scrub, the servant, is equally true and amusing, and the women characters, as free spoken though not as frail as the fine-bred ladies of Congreve and Vanbrugh, are sufficiently discriminated. Sergeant Kite, in the Recruiting Officer, is an original picture of low life and humour rarely surpassed. Furquiar had not the ripe wit of Congreve, he was the Smollett, not the Fielding, of the stage.

'Tarquhar,' says Leigh Hunt, 'was a goodnatured, sensitive, reflecting man, of so high an order of what may be called the town class of genius as to sympathise with mankind at large upon the strength of what he saw of them in little, and to extract from a quintessence of good sensu an inspiration just short of the romantic and imaginative, that is to say, he could turn what he had experienced in common life to the best He felt the little world too much, and the universal too little. He saw into all false pretensions, but not into all true ones, and if he had had a larger sphere of nature to fall back upon in his adversity, would probably not have The wings of his fancy were too died of it common, and grown in too artificial an air, to support him in the sudden gulfs and aching voids of that new region, and enable him to beat his way to their green islands He was becoming gayer and gaver, when death, in the shape of a sore anxiety, called him away as if from a pleasant party, and left the house ringing with his jest?

From 'The Beaux' Stratagem'

Boniface This way, this way, gentlemen Aimvell You're my landlord, I suppose?

Bon Yes, sir, I'm old Will Bonifice, pretty well known upon this road, as the saying is.

Bon As punctual, sir, as I am in the age of my chil dren I'll shew you such ale Here, tapster, broach number 1706, as the saying is. Sir, you shall taste my anno domini I have lived in Lichfield, man and box,

Aim At a meal, you mean, if one may guess by your bulk?

Bon Strong! it must be so, or how would we be strong that drink it?

Aim And have you lived so long upon this ale, land lord?

Bon Eight and fifty years, upon my credit, sir, but it I illed my wife, poor voman, as the saying is Aim How came that to pass?

Bon I don't know how, sir, she would not let the alc take its natural course, sir, she was for qualifying it every now and then with a dram, as the saying is, and an honest gentleman, that came this way from Ireland, made her a present of a dozen bottles of nsquebaugh—but the poor woman v as never well after, but however, I was obliged to the gentleman, you know

Aim Why, was it the usquebaugh that killed her?

Bon My Lady Bountiful said so She, good lady, did what could be done she cured her of three tympanies but the fourth carried her off but she's happy, and I'm contented, as the saving is Aim Who's that Lady Bountiful you mentioned?

Bon Odds my life, sir, we'll drink her health [Drinks] My Lady Bountiful is one of the best of women. Her last husband, Sir Charles Bountiful, left her worth a thousand pounds a year, and I believe she lays out one half on't in charitable uses for the good of her neighbours.

11m Has the lady any children?

Bon Yes, sir, she has a daughter by Sir Charles, the finest woman in all our county, and the greatest fortune. She has a son, too, by her first husband, Squire Sullen, who married a fine lady from I ondon t' other day, if you please, sir we'll drink his health [Drinks]

Aim What sort of a man is he?

Bon Why, sir, the man's well enough says little, thinks less, and does—nothing at all, faith, but he's a man of great estate, and values nobody

Aim Oh, that's right, you have a good many of those gentlemen Pray, how do you like their company?

Bon So well, as the saying is, that I could wish we had as many more of 'em. They're full of money, and pay double for everything they have. They I now, sir, that we paid good round taxes for the taking of 'em., and so they are willing to reimburse us a little, one of 'em lodges in my house. [Bell rings.] I beg your worships partled. I il wait on you in half a minute.

Plume. What's the matter, sergeant? I'm afrud vou are too rough with these gentlemen

Kite I'm too mild, sir, they disobey command, sir, and one of them should be shot for an example to the other. They deny their being listed

Cost Shot, Tummas 1

Paume Come, gentlemen, what's the matter?

Cost We don't know, the noble sergeant is pleased to be in a passion, sir—but——

Kite. They disobey command they deny being listed Tho Nay, sergeant, we don't downight deny it neither, that we dare not do, for fear of being shot, but we himbly conceive, in a civil way, and begging your worship's pardon, that we may go home.

Plume. That's easily known. Have either of you received any of the queen's money?

Cost Not a brass farthing, sir

Kite. They have each of them received three and twenty shillings and sixpence, and 'tis now in their pockets

Cost Wanns, if I have a penny in my pocket but a bent sixpence, I'll be content to be listed, and shot into the bargain.

The And I look ve here, sir

Cost Nothing but the queen's picture, that the sergeant gave me just now

Kite See there, a broad piece, three and twenty shillings and sixpence, t' other has the fellow on 't

Plume. The case is plain, gentlemen the goods are found upon you. Those pieces of gold are worth three and twenty shillings and sixpence each

Cost So it seems that Carolus is three and twenty shillings and suspence in Latin?

Tho 'Tis the same thing in Greek, for we are listed Cost Flesh, but we an't, Tummas I desire to be carried before the mayor, captain

Plume [Ande to Kite] 'Twill never do, kite, your damned tricks will ruin me at last. I won't lose the fellow's though, if I can help it.—Well, gentlemen, there must be some trick in this, my sergeant offers to take his oath that you are fairly listed

The Why, captain, we know that you soldiers have more liberty of conscience than other folks, but for me or neighbour Costar here to take such an eath, 'twould be downright perjuration.

Plume [to Kite]. Look ye, rascal, you villain! if I find that you have imposed upon these two honest fellows, I'll trample you to death, you dog! Come, how was't?

The Nay, then, we'll speak. Your sergeant, as you say, is a rogue, an't like your worship, begging your vorship's pardon, and—

Cost Nay, Tummas, let me speak, you know I can read. And so, sir, he gave us those two pieces of money for pictures of the queen, by way of a present

Plume How? by way of a present? the ruscal! I'll teach him to abuse honest fellows like you Scoundrel, rogue, villain! [Beats off the Sergeant, and follows

Both O brave noble captain! huzza' A brave captain, faith!

Cost Now, Tummas, Carolus is Latin for a beating This is the bravest captain I ever saw Wauns, I've a month's mind to go with him

The 'broad piece' a name given to the 20s. piece (Jacobus or Carolus) to distinguish it from the guinea (which was not so broad and thin), had in 1706, when this play was produced, risen in value to 23s. 6d. Broad pieces were called in 11732 and recoined into guineas. Ewald edited Farquhars works in 1893. Nicholas Rowe (1674-1718), who was bred to the law, but early forsook it for the tragic drama, was born at Little Barford in Bedfordshire, and from Westminster School and Dr Busby passed to the Middle Temple. His father had an estate at Lamerton in Devonshire, and was a serjeant at-law in the Temple, by his death in 1692 Nicholas came into  $f_{300}$  a year, and cultivated the muses in chambers in the Temple. His blank-verse tragedy, The Ambitious Stepmother, was acted in 1700 with great success, and it was followed by Tamerlane (1702), The Fair Penitent (1703), Ulysses. The Royal Convert (1705), Jane Shore (1714), and Lady Jane Grey (1715) On rising into fame as an author, Rowe was munifi The Duke of Queensberry cently patronised. made him his secretary for public affairs in 1709he was, of course, a Whig On the accession of George I he was made poet-laureate and a survevor of customs, the Prince of Wales appointed him clerk of his council, and the Lord Chancellor gave him the office of clerk of the presentations The fortunate playwright was a favourite in society, his voice was singularly sweet, his conversation lively, and his manner engaging Pope, Swift, and Addison were amongst bis intimates Spence reports that there was a certain levity and carelessness about him which made Pope declare him to have no heart. Rowe was the first editor of Shakespeare entitled to the name, and the first -of a long series-to collect biographical facts about him His edition, published in 1709 and based on the Fourth Folio, was the earliest octavo one, and the first to contain regular lists of the dramatis personae Rowe was twice married. His widow, who erected a handsome monument over his grave in Westminster Abbey, received a pension from the Crown in consideration not of his dramatic genius, but 'of the translation of Lucan's Pharsalia made by her late husband'

The translation is a spirited enough paraphrase, but little in Rowe's two volumes of miscellaneous poetry rises above dull and respectable mediocrity His tragedies are passionate and tender, in smooth and equable verse His Jane Shore, still performed from time to time, is effective in the pathetic scenes descriptive of the sufferings of the heroine. The Fair Penitent, adapted from Massinger's Fatal Dowry, was long a popular play, and the 'gallant gay Lothario' was the prototype of many stage seducers and romance heroes Richardson elevated the character in his Lovelace, and gave a sanctity to Clarissa's sorrows which leaves Rowe's Calista immeasurably behind. Johnson praised the play heartily both for plot and language, Scott pronounced it greatly inferior to its original incidents of Rowe's dramas, well arranged as they are for stage effect, were studied and prepared in the manner of the French school, and were adapted to the taste of the age As the study of Shakespeare and the romantic drama advanced, Rowedeclined in credit, and is now but seldom acted or read His popularity in his own day is best seen in the epitaph by Pope—an effusion of friendship presumably not irreconcilable with the anecdote preserved by Spence

Thy relies, Rowe, to this sad shrine we trust, And near thy Shrkespeare place the honoured bust, Oh next him skilled to draw the tender tear, For never heart felt passion more sincere, To nobler sentiment to hire the brive, For never Briton more disdained a slave. Peace to thy gentle shade, and endless rest! Blest in thy genius, in thy love, too, blest! And blest that, timely from our scene removed, Thy soul enjoys the liberty it loved.

Six editions of Rowe's works appeared between 1727 and 1792

Susannah Centlivre (c. 1667-1723), dramatist, is said to have been born in Ireland, her surname either Freeman or Rawkins, her father according to one account having fled to Ireland after the Restoration, when his religious or political opinions made him obnovious to the authorities already been the wife or mistress of two or three gentlemen, when in 1700 she produced a tragedy, The Persured Husband, and not long after she appeared on the stage at Bath In 1706 she married Joseph Centlivre, head-cook to Queen Anne, with whom she lived happily till the end Her nineteen plays (with Life, 3 vols 1761, new ed 1872) include The Perjured Husband (1700), The Gamester (1705), The Platonick Lady (1707), The Busybody ('Marplot' its leading character, 1709), A Bickerstaff's Burial, ultimately called The Custom of the Country (1710), The Wonder! A Woman Keeps a Secret (1714), and A Bola Stroke for a Wife (1717), her most original playfor many of them are adaptations of French and other plays or stories Some of her plays, on the other hand, were translated into French and into German She was a strong Whig In the Wender, the scene of which is laid in Lisbon, the principal characters, except Spanish Dons and Donnas, are Colonel Briton, 'a Scotchman,' who has for three years held a command in Spain, and Gibby, his footman, who wears full Highland costume and speaks a dialect absolutely unknown to Highlanders, compounded of Aberdeenshire and south-country Scots, and English or disguised English, with a large element of a sort of Volapuk concocted on hypothetical analogies Much is genuine Scotch (as in Tatham's plays, vol 1 p 786), often very oddly spelt, and, as in the former case, one wonders how many persons in a London audience in 1714—the year the play was produced-would understand that carrich (1 e. carritch) meant catechism, speer ask, kenspeckle conspicuous and recognisable, and sculdudrie what Allan Ramsay referred to by that name. The institution, if not the word, figures largely in Mrs Centlivre's plays When Gibby in full fig enters to Colonel Briton and a Spanish gentleman, the latter not unnaturally exclaims, 'What have we here?' and Colonel Briton explains 'My footman, this is our country dress, you must know, which for the honour of Scotland I make all my servants wear' But to the London auditory, who must have been at least as much nonplussed by Gibby's 'Doric,' no such explanation is vouchsafed of an utterance of the footman so esoteric as the following

Ay, this is bonny work indeed! to run three hundred mile to this wicked town, and before I can weel fill my weam, to be sent hunting after this black she-devil What gate sall I gang to speer for this wutch, now? Ah for a ruling elder—or the kirk's treasurer—or his mon—I'd gar my master mak twa o' this. But I am sure there's na sick honest people here, or there wud na be sa mickle sculdudrie.

Mary de la Riviere Manley (1672?-1724). novelist, dramatist, and political writer, enjoyed some celebrity among the wits of the Queen Anne period, though neither her life nor writings will bear a close scrutiny She was the daughter of a respected royalist officer, Sir Roger Manley, who, an exile in 1646-60, became in 1667 commander-in chief (not governor) in Jersey (He is wrongly credited by his daughter with being part-author of the famous Letters writ by a Turkish Spy, the first notable example of a description of European things by a feigned Oriental The Letters are largely based on L'Espion Turc of the Genoese G P Marana, and are probably his work, translated and edited) Sir Roger died while his daughter was young, and she fell to the charge of a Mr Manley, her cousin, who drew her into a mock marriage-he had a wife living-and in about three years basely deserted her henceforward was that of an author by profession and a woman of intrigue. The next notable woman after Mrs Aphra Behn to make a liveli hood by literature, she wrote three plays, the Royal Mischief, the Lost Lover, and Lucius—the last being honoured by a prologue from the pen of Steele and an epilogue by Prior Her most famous work appeared in 1709-Secret Memoirs and Manners of several Persons of Quality, of both Sexes From the New Atalantis-a political romance or satire, full of court and party scandal, directed against the Whig statesmen and public characters connected with the Revolution of 1688 This work was honoured with a State prosecution, author, printer, and publisher were arrested, but released in a few days. She met with some favour from a succeeding Tory Ministry, and Memoirs of Europe (1710) and Court Intrigues (1711) were reprinted as third and fourth volumes of the New Atalantis Swift, in his Journal to Stella (January 28, 1711-12), says of Mrs Manley 'She has very generous principles for one of her sort, and a great deal of good sense and invention she is about forty, very homely, and very fat.' She found favour, moreover, with Svift's friend, Alderman Barbour, in vhose house she lived for many years, and there she died. When Swift relinquished the Examiner, Mrs Manley conducted it for some time, the Dean supplying hints, and she appears to have been a ready and effective political writer. All her works, however, have sunk into oblivion. Her novels are worthless, extravagant productions, and the Atalantis is chiefly remembered from a line in Pope. The Baron, in the Rape of the Lock, says

As long as Atalantis shall be read So long my honour, name, and praise shall live!

Atalantis for Atlantis does no undue dishonour to Mrs Manley's scholarship Spite of her cleverness and reading, she had a fatal incapacity to apprehend classical names aright, and refers familiarly to Paulus Diaconius, Cataline, and Isaac Commenus, and quotes 'Baron Annal' apparently without knowing that she was citing the Annales of Baronius Even such spellings as strick (for strict), comparitively, and hipperboly (hyperbole') occur Swift said of Mrs Manley's writing that it 'seemed as if she had about two thousand epithets and fine words packed up in a bag, and that she pulled them out by handfuls. and streved them on her paper, where once in five hundred times they happen to be right' Yet he and his Tory allies willingly co-operated or collaborated with Mrs Manley, he was not above accepting hints from the New Atalantis, as Smollett also did, and in the unfortunate woman's last dark days Swift supported a petition from her to the Government for some reward for her services to the Tory cause, the writing of the Atalantis and lier prosecution for it being accounted amongst her claims

The Memoirs of Europe towards the Close of the Eighth Century she described on the title-page as 'vritten by Eginardus, secretary and favourite to Charlemagne, and done into English by the translator of the New Atalantis' Though in some library catalogues it appears under the head of Eginhard, after his Life of Charlemagne (1), this miscellary was sufficiently like the New Atalantis to appear subsequently as a continuation of that work—contemporary persons being freely dealt with under eighth-century names. It was ironically dedicated to Isaac Bickerstaff in the following characteristic dedication, here reproduced with hier own spelling and punctuation, italics, and long I's

To Isaac Lickerstaff, Esq,

SIR, Your most Oblig'd Most humble Servant,

The letter from Steele is a true letter, and acknowledged a real service rendered D M stands, of course for De la Riviere Manley. The attack referred to is in Tailer No. 92. Sheer Lane (spelt also Shear Lane) was Shire Lane near Temple Bar-after wards called I ower Serles Place—in which stood a public house called the 'Trumpet, where the Tailer was said to meet his club. The lane has many other literary associations—with Sir Charles Sedley, Finas Aslimole, the Kit Cat. Club. Theodore. Hook, and Dr. Maguin.

Walter Pope, born at Fawsley in Northamp tonshire, was a half brother of Bishop Wilkins He entered Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1645, but graduated from Wadham College, Oxford, in which college he became dean. Having succeeded Sir Christopher Wren as professor of Astronomy in Gresham College, he died in London a very old man in 1714. Besides scientific papers, he wrote ironical Memoires of M Du Vall and an ode on Claude Duval, translated Select Novels from Ceruntes and Petrurch, wrote Moral and Political Fablis, and was author of The Old Wan's Wish, 'sung a thousand times' by Benjamin Franklin in his youth, and done into Latin by Incent Bourne It is curiously irregular in rhythm, with inany extra syllables The chorus is repeated after each of the twenty verses

From 'The Old Man's Wish.'

If I here to be old, for I find I go down,
Let this be my fate. In a country town
May I have a warm house, with a stone at my gate,
And a cleanly young girl to rub my bald pate.

May I govern my passions with an absolute sway, And grow wiser and better as my strength wears Without gout or stone, by a gentle decay [away,

May my little house stand on the side of a hill With an easy descent to a mead and a mill, That when I've a mind I may hear my boy read In the mill if it rains, if it's dry in the mead

Near a shady grove, and a murmuring brook, With the ocean at distance whereon I may look, With a spacious plain without hedge or stile, And an easy pad mag to ride out a mile.

With Horace and Petrareh, and two or three more Of the best wits that reigned in the ages before, With roast mutton rather than ven'son or teal, And clean though coarse linen at every meal.

With a pudding on Sunday, with stout humming liquor, And remnants of Latin to welcome the vicar, With Monte Fiascone or Burgundy wine To drink the king's health as oft as I dine.

With a courage undaunted may I face my last day,
And when I am dead may the better sort say,
In the morning when sober, in the evening when mellow,
'He's gone and left not behind him his fellow'
May I govern, &c.

Thomas Wharton (1648–1715), first Marquis of Wharton, escaped from the Presbyterian and Puritan régime of his father, the third Baron Wharton, to become the greatest rake in England Famous at Newmarket before he became a keen Whig partisan, he made himself highly ob noxious to the Duke of York, and finally boasted that by his ballad of Lillibulero (1688)—so the word is usually now spelt—set to music by Purcell, he had sung a king out of three kingdoms. He joined the Prince of Orange, but though made Privy Councillor and Master of the Household, did not realise his ambitions under William III was, without doubt, the astutest of the Whig managers He was abhorred by Tories and Churchmen, and described by Lady Mary Wortley Montagu as the 'most profligate, impious, and shameless of men' Swift reviled him as 'an atheist grafted on a dissenter,' Queen Anne dis liked him, but in 1710 he was made Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, when he had Joseph Addison as his secretary As a great Whig leader he naturally attained to a marquisate and other honours, which he enjoyed but for a few months That very little ingenuity, the most rudimentary wit, and a plentiful lack of poetry sufficed to produce an epoch-making rhyme will be plain from a verse or two of his early and poor prophetic counter blast to 'The Wearing of the Green' (which oddly enough begins with a precisely similar question)

Ho! broder Teague, dost hear de decree?

Lilli burlero, bullen a la

Dat we shall have a new deputie?

Lilli burlero, bullen a la.

Lero lero, lilli burlero, lero lero, bullen a la,

Lero lero, lilli burlero, lero lero, bullen a la

Ho! by Shaint Tyburn, it is de Talbote Lilli, &c And he vill cut de Englishmen's troate Lilli, &c.

Dough by my shoul de English do praat De laws on dare side and Creist knows what

But if dispence do come from de Pope, We'll hang Magna Charta and dem in a rope.

Now, now de hereticks all go down By Christ and Shaint Patrick the nation's our own.

Dare was an old prophecy found in a bog, Ireland shall be ruled by an ass and a dog

And now dis prophecy is come to pass, For Talbot's de dog and Ja**s is de ass—

the ridiculous-looking refrain being repeated to satiety with each verse as with the first. Lilli burlero and bullen a la were understood to have been Irish watchwords in the rising against the English and Protestants in 1641

Samuel Johnson (1649-1703), Whig divine, was humbly born in Staffordshire or Warwickshire, was educated at St Paul's School and Trinity College, Cambridge, became chaplain to Lord William Russell, and was soon noted for his polemical tracts and sermons In Julian the Apostate (1682) he gave an unflattering portrait of the Duke of York, and continued the controversy in Julian's Atts, which led to arrest, prosecution, and imprisonment. He continued to write pamphlets against popery and for the Revolution cause, was stripped of his robes and pilloned, received three hundred and seventeen lashes and was imprisoned again in 1686, and was said by Calamy, who called him that truly glorious person, to have done more than any man in England besides towards paving the way for King William's revolution He scornfully rejected the usual pretexts by which the Whigs salved their consciences, insisting that William's title was solely the free gift of the Soured by lack of gratitude on the part of the court (for he expected much), he wrote bitterly against Burnet and other favourites, but Dryden reviled him was ultimately pensioned. as Ben-Jochanan in Absalom and Achitophel, and Swift sneered at 'Julian Johnson' Coleridge ranked him high amongst controversial writers His works were published in a folio in 1710, and reprinted in 1713 - Another Samuel Johnson (1691-1773), a Manchester dancing-master and fiddler, produced in 1729 an absurd burlesque called Hurlothrumbo, followed by a series of poor comedies and comic operas

In the Julian pamphlet the Whig Samuel Johnson makes no secret of his design to institute a practical parallel between the Roman Emperor and the heirapparent to the British crown (as Strauss afterwards did with Frederick William IV of Prussia), and to promote the policy of the exclusion bill by insisting on Christian ill-will to Julian. Of the Roman Catholics he says 'No doubt they would bestow more good words on us if we would all be Passive Protestants, for then the fewer Active Papists would serve to despatch us,' and of passive obedience in Charles I's time says

And yet the arbitrary doctrine of those times did not bring any great terror along with it it was then but a rake, and serv'd only to scrape up a little paltry passive mony from the subject, but now it is become a murdering piece, loaden with no body knows how many bullets. And that the patrons of it may not complain that it is an exploded doctrine, as if men only hooted at it, but con'd not answer it, I shall stay to speak a little more to it.

From 'Julian the Apostate'

In reading many of the late addresses [against the exclusion of the Duke of York from succeeding to the crown], I cou'd not forbear thinking of those angels which Mahomet saw, whose horns were half fire and half snow those contrarietys which they wore on the outside of their heads, methought, many of our addressers had got on the inside of theirs For with a brave and warm zeal for the Protestant religion and a Protestant prince, they generously offer'd their lives and fortunes, and the last drop of blood, in defence of his Majesty and the religion now establish'd by law, and by and by the same lives and fortunes, and last drop of blood, are promis'd over again to a popish successor. What is this but clapping cold snow upon the head of all their Protestant zeal? For he that offers his service to Loth of these together, lifts himself under two the most adverse partys in the world, and is Guelph and Gibeline at once. What benefit a popish successor can reap from lives and fortunes spent in defence of the Protestant religion, he may put in his eye and what the Protestant religion gets by lives and fortunes spent in the service of a popish successor, will be over the left shoulder

But this contradictious zeal was nothing near so sur prizing as that of our friends of Rippon, who beseech his Majesty, and are very sollicitous, lest he shou'd agree to a bill of exclusion (for plain English is as well under stood on this side the Trent as on the other), and seem to be very much afraid of losing the great blessing of a popish successor. All the sober men that I have met with, who remain unsatisfy'd as to a bill of exclusion, do nevertheless acknowledg, that a popish successor will be a heavy judgment of God to this nation, to which we must patiently submit, as we do to all other calamitys But did ever men pray for a judgment, and make it their humble request, that they might be sure of it? Do they not, on the other hand, when it begins to threaten them, heartily deprecate the evil, and are they not earnest with God to avert it? Nay, do they not more over use all lawful human means to prevent it? There is no judgment represented in scripture to be so immediately the stroke of God as the plague. David, in his great strut, made choice of it under that notion, when he desir d rather to fall into the hands of God than into the hands of men and yet men do constantly make use of all lawful means to prevent it. For, besides their using Hippocrates's receipt of Citò, longe, tarde, and running away from it, they make no scruple of antidoting and fortifying themselves against it. They strive with an infected; air, and with fires, and fames of pitch and far, &c., they endeavour to correct it Nay, they

John Asgill (1659-1738) was in his own time thought by many to be crazy, and is now seldom even named, yet Coleridge 'knew no genume Savon English superior to Asgill's, and 'thought his and Defoe's irony often finer than Swift's. Hanley Castle in Worcestershire, he qualified for the Bar at the Middle Temple. As executor and heir of Nicholas Barbon (believed to have been son of Pruse God Barbon or Barebones), he bought life interests in forfeited estates in Ireland, and so secured a succession of lawsuits and entangle ments that led to his spending his last years within the rules of King's Bench He wrote on banking and registration of titles, and sat in Parliament for Bramber in Sussey, but was expelled for the startling doctrines of his most famous book-an argument to prove that (on the fully developed forensic theory of Christ's having paid the penalty of death inflicted on man for Adam's stn) death is not inevitable for any Christian who claims his right to exemption, and desires to be 'translated' to heaven instead It is doubtful how far he was sincere, how far he allowed his humorous propensities to carry him beyond his own convictions, to make simple people gape. He affected curiously short paragraphs of a single sentence or less Southey quotes largely from him in The Doctor The following is the whole of his pamphlet (1712) - called

An Essay for the Press

That there should be a restraint upon the press seems a matter of necessity but the manner of it, a matter of debate.

The use and intent of printing is (the same with that of preaching) for communicating our thoughts to others

And there is equal reason (in it self) for suppressing the one as the other

Put this communication being the natural right of mankind (as sociable creatures, and all embarled in one common salvation), the suppressing of either of these is taking away the children's bread

And in this communication, printing is more diffusive than speaking

In the beginning of the gospel, for calling the Gentiles, the Spirit of God interpreted the first preaching of it to ever auditor in his own language.

And since that mirroulous communication of it hath ceased,

It pleased God in his own time to have dietated to Man the invention of printing, to supply the place of it

By which what is at first published in one language only, is made intelligible to all others by translations.

And though several errors have and will be vented by the occasion of this invention, this is no more an argument against the invention itself, than the growing of lares among wheat is an argument against sowing of com

Nor any more a reason for suppressing it by a law, than it would be for shutting up the church-doors beause hypochies crowd into the church with true workippers.

Whenever the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord, Satan would jostle in among them, and present himself before the Lord also

And yet we don't hear that they quitted their devotion

And as Satan used our Saviour himself so

Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a death

So it will be to the end of the world

Wherefore to me, the elergy of the Church of England, in admitting their auditors to the sacraments vithout any personal examination, seem more orthodox with that standing rule, Let every man examine himself, than the ministers of those dissenting congregations, that first put each communicant to a test of experience, there being no such test necessary in the churches of God

Nor are they thereby secure of what they intend (to have none among them but true believers)

A hypocrite will stand and sit, and kneel and pray, as the people of God

And I am apt to believe, that upon such a test, the Pharisee by giving himself so many distinguishing characters, might have had admission, and the poor publican, that had nothing to say for himself to God or man, but Lord have mercy upon me a sinner might have been excluded

And as by the common rules of justice, 'tis better tengulty escape than one innocent suffer

So in common charity among Christians, it is a le s crior to admit ten inworthy than to exclude one believing communicant

And by the like rules both of justice and charity to mankind, 'tis safer to suffer ten errors to be vented than one necessary truth concealed

For man is not bound to embrace the errors, but 'tis at his peril to come to the knowledg of the truth in matters of salvation

When Virgil (by reflection on his own works) finding some things imperfect, had devised them to the flames, the Roman emperor strained a point of law to preserve them from that sentence.

"I rangatur legum potius veneranda potestas"

'Rather than Maro shall in fire burn, Let laws themselves be east into the urn'

All which is hinted as reasons against restraining the press, by subjecting it to a hience

And the project of a tax upon it seems impracticable

Put the present licentionsness being chiefly occasioned by concealing the names of the authors

The most just and natural remedy seems by prohibiting the prints without the names of the authors to them

As the press is now used, it is a paper inquisition, by which any man may be arranghed, judged, and condemned (ay, and broad limits given for his execution too) without ever knowing his accusers

If the be objected to, as an imperfect remedy, for that, netwithstanding this things may be clande tinely printed and dispersed

So they may under the restraint by heence

No prohibition of human laws can to ally extripate the exils prohibited, but serve only to restrain the frequent commusion of them.

When men have once taugh their was seto refruit trespassing upon their neighbor es lands,

Then may they expect to teach their fellow creatures to cease from sin

In the meantime, they must content them-elves with driving the offenders into corners (as they do their cattel into pounds)

Patrick Walker, the Covenanting largio grapher, was born probably in Lanarkshire, some time about the middle of the seventeenth century In 1682, as one of the wild Westland Whies. he was concerned in the shooting of a dragoon near Lanark, and two years later was captured as a rebel and imprisoned in Edinburgh and Dunnottar Castle, suffering, according to his own story, the torture of the thumbscrew and the He made his escape from Leith tolbooth in 1685, and was active in the ribbling of the curates at the Revolution. After the return of peaceful times he seems to have fixed as a packman or pedlar, and, in the words of an unfriendly authority, 'when his means went from him, he became a vagrant person without a calling, and wandered through the country gathering old stories' about the Cameronian saints of the 'lilling time' Walker's own account is, that in the process of research he travelled upwards of a thousand miles in Scotland and ireland in 1722 and 1723. The results appeared in the 'Remarkable Passages' of the Lives of Alexander Peden, John Semple, Richard Cameron, Daniel Cargill, and others which were published mostly by the author himself at Bristo Port in Edinburgh, between 1724 and 1732 Walker was one of the irreconcilable zealots known as 'Society men, who left their testimony in the Hind Let Loose, and his biographies, in their quaint and picturesque sincerity, give striking illustration of the ferocity, fanaticism, and children superstition of that intractable remnant. They had a great chap book vogue-the Life of the miraculous Peden in especial-among the Scottish persuitry of the eighteenth century, and supplied plentiful materials for such later writers as Howie of Lochgoin, while Sir Walter Scott turned them to good account in another fashion for Old Mertality and The Heart of Midlothian In 1827 appeared a reprint, biographia Presbiteriara, a scholarly net edition by Dr D H Fleming in toot fixed Wilker's death in 1745. # Signs and Wonders

In the year 1686, especially in the months of June and July, many yet nlive can witness, that about the Crosfoord boat, two miles beneath Lanark, especially at the Mains, on the water of Clyde, many people gathered together for several afternoons, where there were showers of bonnets, hats, gans and swords, which covered the trees and ground, companies of men in arms marching in order, upon the water side, companies meeting companies, going all through other, through other, and then all falling to the ground, and disappearing, and other companies immediately appear ing the same way. I went there three afternoons together, and, as I could observe, there were two of the people that were together saw, and a third that saw not and the' I could see nothing, yet there was such a fright and trembling upon these that did sec, that was discernible to all from these that saw not There was a gentleman standing next to me who spake as too many gentlemen and others speak, who said, A pack of damn'd witches and warlocks, that have the second sight, the devil ha't do I see. And immediately there was a discernible change in his countenance, with as much fear and trembling as any woman I say there, who cried out, O all ye that do not see, say nothing, for I persuade you it is matter of fret, and discernible to all that is not stone blind and these who did see, told what works the gans had, and their length and wideness, and what handles the swords had whether small or three barred, or Highland guards and the closing I nots of the bonnets, black or blue, and these who did see them there, altere ever they went abroad, saw a bonnet and a s to d drop in the way. Archibald Pitcairne (1652-1713), the chief physician of his day in Edinburgh, and professor for a while at Leyden, was born in Edinburgh, and educated at Edinburgh and Paris. He was notable also in the Scotland of Queen Anne's time as a Latinist, a Jacobite and Episcopalian, and a satirical opponent of the Kirk. The most memorable of his Latin poems, published by Ruddiman in 1727, is the epitaph on Claverhouse, freely translated by Dryden in these lines

Oh last and best of Scots' who didst maintain Thy country's freedom from a foreign reign, New people fill the land, now thou art gone, New gords the temples, and new kings the throne. Scotland and thou did each in other live, Nor wouldst thou her, nor could she thee survive. Farewell' who dying didst support the State, And couldst not fall but with the country's fate.

Pitcairne is also credited with the authorship of The Assembly, a scurrilous comedy saturising the Presbyterian clergy in general, and the proceedings at the recalcitrant General Assembly of 1692 in particular. It is a dull and coarse production, though with occasional effective hits Thus, when one of the persons in it suggests that the Episcopalian curates shall not be expelled as a class but treated each on his own merits, a high-flying minister is made to ask 'Did Joshua, when he extirpated idolators, cite every man to personal appearance and give him a copy of the libel beforehand? Did Christ, when He whipt the huyers out of the Temple, take every particular huxter's wife by the lug" Pitcairne was naturally detested by Presbyterians like Wodrow, who, while admitting his scholarship, has painted him as a profane drunkard and Deist. 'Pitcarnius Scotus' wrote much (in Latin) on fevers and other medical subjects, had bitter pamphlet feuds with several professional colleagues, and carried on a controversy on fermentation with Astruc, the Belgian physician, who, by calling attention to the varying use of Jehovah and Elohim as the names for God, founded the scientific criticism of the Pentateuch library was sold after his death to the Czar Peter the Great.

William Dampier (1652-1715), navigator, was born near Yeovil, and voyaged to Newfoundland, Bantain, Jamaica, and Campeachy Bay After two years among the lawless logwood cutters of Yucatan, he joined in 1679 a band of huccaneers who crossed the Isthmus of Darien and ravaged the coast as far south as Juan Fernandez. another expedition (1683), after seizing a Danish ship at Sierra Leone, he coasted along the shores of Chili, Peru, and Mexico, sailing thence across the Pacific, and touching at the Philippines, China, Marooned on Nicobar Islands and Australia. (1688), he made his way in a native canoe to Atcheen, and got back to England (1691), where he published his Voyage round the World (1697), emmently interesting in substance, and in style homely but clear and easily read. He conducted (1600-1700) a voyage of discovery to the South Seas, in which he explored the north-west coast of Australia, as also the coasts of New Guinea and New Britain, giving his name to the Dampier Archipelago and Strait. On the return voyage he was wrecked off Ascension, and until relieved some two months later lived with his crew on turtles and goats. The old buccancer was a better pilot than commander, and his cruelty to his lieutenant led to his heing court-martialled 1703 he was reappointed to the command of two privateers (the sailing-master of one of them Alexander Selkirk) to the South Scas, where he was said to have been guilty of drunkenness, brutality, and even cowardice. Dampier returned home at the close of 1707, poor and broken, nor did his angry Vindication re establish his reputation Next year he sailed again as pilot to a privateer, which rescued Selkirk, and returned in 1711 after a prosperous vovage In the portrait of Dampier, 'a rough sailor but a man of exquisite mind,' Coloridge in the Table Talk insisted that he could trace 'that something feminine discoverable in the countenances of all men of genius' Coloridge. who probably knew much less about the buccaneer hydrographer than Dr Laughton, would on no account hear of his being called a pirate. The passage below from the 1683 voyage obviously contributed (as well as the experiences of Selkirk, pub lished 1712) in not a few particulars to Defoe's great picture (1719) of a solitary's life on the island of

Juan Fernandez

Both we and Capt. Eaton being bound for John Fernando's Isle, we kept company, and we spared him bread and beef, and he spared us water, which he took in as he passed thro' the Streights [of Magellan].

March the 22d 1684, we came in sight of the island, and the next day got in and anchored in a bay at the south end of the island, and 25 fathom water, not two cables length from the shore. We presently got out our canoa, and went ashore to seel for a Moskito Indian, whom we left here when we were chased hence by three Spanish ships in the year 1681, a little before we went to Arica, Capt. Wathin being then our commander, after Capt. Sharp was turned out.

This Indian lived here alone above three years, and altho' he was several times sought after by the Spaniards, who knew he was left on the island, yet they could never He was in the woods, hunting for goats, when Captain Watlin drew off his men, and the ship was under sail before he came back to shore. He had with him his gun and a knife, with a small horn of powder, and a few shot, which being spent, he contrived a way by notch ing his knife, to saw the barrel of his gun into small pieces, wherewith he made harpoons, lances, hooks and a long I nife, heating the pieces first in the fire, which he struck with his gun flint, and a piece of the barrel of his gun, which he hardned, having learnt to do that among the English The hot pieces of iron he would hammer out and bend as he pleased with stones, and saw them with his jagged knife, or grind them to an edge by with us saying of themselves they are poor men, and have no name.

This island is in lat 34 d 45 m and about 120 leagues from the main. It is about 12 leagues round, full of high hills and small pleasant valleys, which if manured, would probably produce any thing proper for the climate. The sides of the mountains are part savannalis, part woodland. Savannahs are clear pieces of land without woods, not because more burren than the wood land, for they are frequently spots of as good land as any, and often are intermixt with wood land The grass in these savannahs at John Ternando's is not a long flaggy grass, such as is usually in the savannalis in the West Indies, but a sort of kindly grass, thick and The woods flourishing the biggest part of the year afford divers sorts of trees, some large and good timber for building, but none fit for masts The cabbage trees of this isle are but small and low, yet afford a good head, and the cabbage very sweet. This tree I shall describe in the Appendix, in the Bay of Campeachy The savanushs are stocked with gosts in great herds but those that live on the east-end of the island are not so fat as those on the west end, for though there is much more grass, and plenty of water in every valley, never theless they thrive not so well here as on the west-end, where there is less food, and yet there are found greater That west end flocks, and those too fatter and sweeter of the island is all high champion ground without any valley, and but one place to land, there is neither wood nor any fresh water, and the grass short and dry Goats were first put on the island by John Ternando, who first discovered it on his voyage from Lima to Baldivia (and discovered also another island about the same ligness, 20 leagues to the nestward of this) From those goats these were propagated, and the island hath taken its name from this its first discoverer, who when he returned to Lima, desired a patent for it, designing to settle here, and it was in his second voyage hither that he set ashore three or four goats, which have since by their increase so well stock'd the whole island. But he could never get a patent for it, therefore it lies still desti tute of inhabitants, tho' doubtless capable of maintain ing 4 or 500 families, by what may be produced off the land only I speak much within compass, for the savannahs would at present feed 1000 head of cattle, besides goats, and the land being cultivated would proliably hear corn, or wheat, and good pease, yams, or potatoes, for the land in their valleys and sides of the mountains is of a good black fruitful mould about it is likewise very productive of its inhabitants Seals swarm as thick about this island as if they had no other place in the world to live in, for there is not a bay nor rock that one can get ashore on but is full of them Ser hons are here in great companies, and fish, particular larly snappers and rock fish, are so plentiful, that two men in an hours time will take with hook and line as many as will serve 100 men

There are only two bass in the whole island where ships may anchor, these are both at the east end, and in both of them is a rivulct of good fresh water. Either of these bays may be fortified with little charge, to that degree that 50 men in each may be able to keep off 1000, and there is no coming into these bays from the west end, but with prent difficulty, over the mountains, where if 3 men are placed they may keep down as many as come against them on any side. This was partly experienced by 5 Englishmen that Capt Davis left here, who defended themselves against a great body of Spaniards v his landed in the bays, and came here to destroy them, and the the second time one of their consorts deserted and fled to the Spaniards, yet the other four kept their ground, and were afterwards taken in from hence by Capt Strong of London. We remained at John Fernando's sixteen days, our sick men were ashore all the time, and one of Captain Eaton's doctors (for he had four in his ship) tending and feeding them with goat and several herbs, whereof here is plenty growing in the brooks, and their diseases were chiefly scorbutick.

Richard Bentley (1662-1742), born of ycoman parentage at Oulton near Leeds, passed from Wakefield grammar-school to St John's College. Cambridge, in 1676, as subsizar, and in 1682 was appointed by his college head-master of Spalding grammar-school As tutor to the son of Stillingfleet, then Dean of St Paul's, he accompanied his pupil in 1689 to Oxford, where he was twice appointed to deliver the Boyle Lectures on the Evidences of Religion. He had taken orders in 1600, and to Stillingfleet he owed various good ecclesiastical preferments, with the post of royal His Letter to Mill (1691) librarian at St James's on the Greek chronicler John Malelas is itself a masterpiece, but it was the Dissertation upon the Epistles of Phalaris (1699), an expansion of an earlier essay, that established his reputation throughout Europe, and may be said to mark a The origin and course of new era in scholarship this Battle of the Books is sketched in Vol I of this work in connection with Sir William Temple (page 754) The essay is not merely a monument of erudition, a triumph of penetrative insight in the new art of making accurate philosophy elucidate history, but a great literary masterpiece, in which trenchant argument is enlivened by keen and plentiful wit and satire. The style is direct and simple, with many homely phrases. In 1700 Bentley was appointed Master of Trinity College, Cambridge. The lustory of his mastership is an unbrol en series of quarrels and litigations, provoked by his arrogance and rapacity, but when in 1717 he was made regius professor of Divinity, he contrived to pass scathless through all his con-Only death prevented the Bishop of Ely, visitor of Trinity, from depriving him of his mastership (1714), the university senate did deprive him of his degrees (1718), and another bishop pronounced sentence of deposition (1734) But at his death he was in full possession both of degrees and mastership. This stormy life did not impair his literary activity As 'Phileleutherus Lipsiensis' he attacked Anthony Collins's Discourse of Freethinking with a trenchance of argument, ripeness of scholarship, and a brilliance of style such as none of the deistical writers could command was in these Remarks that he incidentally endorsed the hypothesis that the Homeric poems were put i together from many separate ballads or lays long after their first date of composition, thus partly He edited a number anticipating Wolf's theory of classical authors-among others, Horace (1711) and Terence (1726)—upon which he bestowed vast Emendations were at once his forte and foible—the latter conspicuously in his edition of Paradise Lost (1732) His theory was that Milton's blindness had necessitated the help of an amanuensis who made stupid mistakes, and of an editor who made mistakes as well as wilful alterations and interpolations. These by internal criticism he set himself to correct, with much superfluous acute-The proposal (1720) to print an edition of the Greek New Testament, in which the received text should be corrected by a careful comparison with the Vulgate and all the oldest existing Greek MSS, was then singularly bold, and evoked violent opposition, in the settling of the New Testament text, his principles were triumphantly carried out by Lachmann The founder of the school of classical criticism of which Porson illustrated the excellences and the defects. he wielded with equal effect the weapons of textual and of higher criticism By uncomplimentary remarks on Pope's Homer he incurred the enmity of the translator and a place in the Dunciad, which reflected more ridicule on the jealous poet than on the great critic Bentley's daughters was the mother of Richard Cumberland the dramatist.

From the 'Phalaris'

That sophist, whoever he was, that wrote a small book of letters in the name and character of Phalans (give me leave to say this now, which I shall prove by and by) had not so bad a hand at humouring and personating, but that several believed it was the tyrant himself that talked so big, and could not discover the ass under the skin of that lion, for we find Stobeus quoting the 38, and 67, and 72 of those Lpistles, under the title of Phalaris, and Suidas, in the account he gives of him, says he has wrote 'very admirable letters,' erie-edus Sauparias zare, meaning those that we are speaking of And Johannes Tzetzes, a man of much rambling learning, has many and large extracts out of them in his Chiliads, ascribing them all to the tyrant whose livery they wear These three, I think, are the only men among the antients that make any mention of them, but since they give not the least hint of any doubts concerning their author, we may conclude that most of the scholars of those ages received them as true originals, so that they have the general warrant and certificate for this last thousand years before the restoration of learning. As for the modernbesides the approbation of those smaller critics, that have been concerned in the editions of them, and era them np of course, some very learned men have espoused and maintained them, such as Thomas Fazellus and Jacobus Cappellus. I ven Mr Selden himself draws an argument in chronology from them, without discovering any suspicion or jealousy of a cheat, to whom I may dd their latest and greatest advocate, who has honoured them with that most high character, prefixed to the on the heroic couplet, seems to have suggested Pope's Essay on Criticism. It is in the style of Roscommon, plain, perspicuous, and sensible, but a contains little or no true poetry—less than many of Dryden's prose essays—and is much of it incredibly commonplace in thought and in word Out of Shalespeare's Julius Cæsar he manufactured, with the help of some new love scenes and other tags, two model dramas according to his own—and his contemporaries'—notions of good taste.

From the 'Essay on Poetry' Of all those arts in which the wise excel, Nature's chief master piece is writing well, No writing lifts evalted man so high As sacred and soul moving Poesy No kind of work requires so nice a touch, And, if well finished, nothing shines so much But Heaven forbid we should be so profane To grace the vulgar with that noble name. 'Tis not a flash of fancy, which, sometimes Dazzling our minds, sets off the slightest rhymes, Bright as a blaze, but in a moment done True wit is everlasting like the sun, Which, though sometimes behind a cloud retired, Breaks out aguin, and is by all admired Number and rhyme, and that harmonious sound Which not the nicest ear vith harshness vound, Are necessary, yet but vulgar arts, And all in vain these superficial parts Contribute to the structure of the whole, Without a genius, too, for that's the soul A spirit which inspires the work throughout, As that of nature moves the v orld about, A flame that glows amidst conceptions fit, Even something of divine, and more than wit, Itself unseen, yet all things by it shewn, Describing all men, but described by none

First, then, of songs, which now so much abound, Without his song no fop is to be found A most offensive weapon which he draws Ou all lie meets, against Apollo's laws Though nothing seems more easy, yet no part Of poetry requires a nicer art, For as in rows of richest pearl there hes Many a blemish that escapes our eyes, The least of which defects is plainly shewn In one small ring, and brings the value down So songs should be to just perfection wrought, Yet when can one be seen without a fault? Exact propriety of words and thought, Expression casy, and the fancy high Yet that not seem to creep nor this to fly, No words transposed, but in such order all, As wrought with care, yet seem by chance to fall.

Of all the ways that wisest men could find To mend the age and mortify mankind, Satire well writ has most successful proved, And cures, because the remedy is loved 'Tis hard to write on such a subject more, Without repeating things oft said before. Some vulgar errors only we'll remove. That stain a beauty which we so much love Of chosen words some take not care enough, And think they should be, as the subject, rough,

This poem must be more exactly made,
And sharpest thoughts in smoothest words conveyed
Some think, if sharp enough, they cannot fail,
As if their only business was to rail,
But human frailty, nicely to infold,
Distinguishes a satire from a scold
Rage you must hide, and prejudice lay down,
A satyr's smile is sharper than his frown,
So, while you seem to slight some rival youth,
Malice itself may pass sometimes for truth

By painful steps at last we labour up Parnassus' hill, on whose bright airy top The epic pocts so divinely shew, And with just pride behold the rest below Heroic poems have a just pretence To be the utmost stretch of human sense. A work of such mestimable worth, There are but two the world has yet brought forth-Homer and Virgil, with what sacred awe Do those mere sounds the world's attentiou draw! Just as a changeling seems below the rest Of men, or rather as a two legged beast, So these gigantic souls, amazed, we find As much above the rest of human kind ! Nature's whole strength united 'endless fame And universal shouts attend their name! Read Homer once, and you can read no more, For all books clse appear so mean, so poor, Verse will seem prose, but still persist to read, And Homer will be all the books you need.

Sir Richard Blackmore (birth year unknown, died 1729) was one of the most fortunate physicians and most severely handled pocts of the age. Born of a good family at Corsham in Wiltshire, and educated at Westminster and St Edmund Hall, Oxford, he took his BA in 1674. He was in extensive medical practice, was knighted in 1697 by William III, and afterwards made censor of the College of Physicians In 1695 he published Prince Arthur, an epic poem, which he says he wrote amidst the duties of his profession, 'for the greatest part in coffee houses, or in passing up and down the Dryden, whom he had attacked for licentiousness, satirised him for writing 'to the rumbling of his chariot-wheels' In Prince Arthur Blackmore flattered himself that he had imitated Virgil's manner, angels taking the place of heathen gods in the management of sublunary affairs King Arthur (1697) he seems to think he had followed rather the Homeric model The twelve dreary books of this preposterous epic are devoted wholly to one of the most fabulous of Arthur's exploits as reported by Geoffrey of Monmouth—an expedition to support the Christian people of Gaul against certain heathen Franks, in which history, ethnology, and commonsense are alike defied The principal enemy is the Frankish king Clotar, assumed to be a heathen-though the Franks were converted to Christianity before the end of the fifth century, and Arthur or his prototype seems to have belonged to the sixth The prince of darkness and his cluding with a hymn to the Creator of the world. The old fishioned orthodox piety of Blackmore is everywhere apparent in his writings, but the genius of poetry evaporates amidst tedious argumentations, commonplace illustrations, prosing de clamation, and general dullness From the opening of Creation it would appear that he deliberately designed to outsoar Milton 'to heights unknown'to anybody but himself, presumably

No more of courts, of triumplis, or of arms, No more of valour's force, or beauty's charms, The themes of vulgar lays, with just disdain, I leave unsung, the flocks, the amorous swain, The pleasures of the land, and terrors of the main How abject, how inglorious 'tis to lie Grovelling in dust and darkness, when on high Impires immense, and rolling worlds of light, To range their heavenly seenes, the muse invite! I meditate to soar above the skies, To helphts unknown, through ways untry'd to rise I would the Eternal from his works assert, And sing the wonders of creating art While I this unexampled task essay, Pass awful gulfs, and beat my punful way, Celestral Dove ! divine assistance bring, Sustain me on thy strong extended wing,

Lnown

That I may reach the Almighty's sacred throne, And make his causeless power, the cause of all things Thou dost the full extent of nature see, And the wide realms of vast immensity Eternal Wisdom thou dost comprehend, Rise to her heights, and to her depths descend The Inther's sacred counsels thou canst tell, Who in his bosom didst for ever dwell Thou on the deep's dark face, immortal dove ! Thou with Almighty energy didst move On the wild waves, incumbent didst display Thy genial wings, and liatch primaval day Order from thee, from thee distinction came, And all the beauties of the wond'rous frame. Hence stampt on nature we perfection find, Fair as th' idea in the Eternal Mind,

Garth in The Dispensary unkindly makes Black more citc four scraps of his own verse (quite accurately reproduced) from Prince Arthur and King Arthur as sufficiently sonorous to summon the Sibyl from the shades

These lines the pale Divinity shall raise, Such is the power of sound and force of lays,

Blackmore is made to say, and then cites his own

Arms meet with arms, fauchions with fauchions clash, And sparks of fire struck out from armour flash Thick clouds of dust contending warriors raise, And ludeous war o'er all the region brays

Some raying run with huge Hereulean clubs, Some massy balls of brass, some niighty tubs Of cinders bore

Naked and half burnt hills with Indeous wrick Affright the skies and fry the ocean's lack

High rocks of snow and sailing hills of ice, Ap it terch o her with a mighty crush Driven by the win is in rude rencounter dash. Blood, brains, and limbs the highest walls disdain, And all around lay squalid heaps of slain.

In the following singular and original theodicy from Book in of Creation, it is noticeable that Blackmore quite admits the Creator might (but for sufficient reasons) have made a much finer world, and he justifies the ways of God to men in the matter of having wasted so much space on mountains not from the majesty or beauty of the everlasting hills, but from their utilitarian 'convenience' for practical purposes

You ask us why the soil the thistle breeds, Why its spontaneous birth are thorns and weeds, Why for the harvest it the harrow needs?

The Author might a nobler world have made,
In brighter dress the hills and vales arrayed,
And all its face in flowery scenes displayed
The glube untilled might plenteous crops have borne,
And brought forth spicy groves instead of thorn
Rich fruit and flowers, without the gardener's pains, Mightevery hill have crowned, have honoured all the plains
This Nature might have boasted, had the Mind
Who formed the spacious inniverse designed
That man, from labour free, as well as grief,
Should pass in lazy luxury his life.
But He his creature gave a fertile soil,
Fertile, but not without the owner's toil,
That some reward his industry should crown,
And that his food in part might be his own.

But while insulting you arraign the land,
Ask why it wants the plough or hibourer's hand,
Aind to the marble rocks, you ne'er complain,
That they, without the sculptor's skill and pain,
No perfect statue yield, no basse relieve,
Or finished column for the palace give Yet if from hills unlaboured figures came,
Man might have case enjoyed, though never fame.

You may the world of more defect upbraid,
That other works by Nature are unmade
That she did never, at her own expense,
A palace rear, and in magnificence
Out rival art, to grace the stately rooms,
That she no castle builds, no lofty domes.
Had Nature's hand these various works prepared,
What thoughtful care, what labour had been spared!
But then no realm would one great master shew,
No Phidias Greece, and Rome no Angelo
With equal reason too you might demand
Why boats and ships require the artist's hand, Why generous Nature did not these provide,
To pass the standing lake or flowing tide

You say the hills, which high in air arise, Harbour in clouds, and mingle with the skies, That earth's dishonour and encumbering load, Of many spacious regions man defraud, For beasts and birds of prey a desolate abode. But can the objector no convenience find In mountains, hills, and rocks, which gird and bind The mighty frame, that else would be disjoined? Do not those heaps the raging tide restrain, And for the dome afford the mountains flow, And bring down riches to the vale below? See how the torrent rolls the golden sand From the high ridges to the flatter land!

The lofty lines abound with endless store
Of mineral treasure and metallic ore,
With precious veins of silver, copper, tin,
Without how barren, yet how rich within!
They bear the pine, the oak and cedar yield,
To form the palace and the navy build

Basse relieve was one of many ways (bas relieve, bass relief, base relief) in which bas relief used to be spelt in English.

Sir Samuel Garth, an eminent London physician, was born in 1661 at Bowland Forest in the West Riding of Yorkshire, and educated at Ingleton, Peterhouse (Cambridge), and Leyden, taking his MD in 1691, and being elected a Fellow of the College of Physicians in 1693 1699 he published his poem of The Dispensary, to aid the College in a war they were then waging with the apothecaries. The latter, supported by some of the physicians, had ventured to prescribe as well as compound medicines, and the physicians advertised that they would give advice gratis to the poor, and establish a dispensary of their own for the sale of cheap 'The original of this difference,' medicines Garth said in the preface, 'has been of some standing, though it did not break out into fury and excess until the time of the erecting of the dispensary, a room in the college set up for the relief of the sick poor' The College triumphed, but in 1703 the House of Lords decided that apothecaries were entitled to exercise the privilege Garth and his brother-physicians resisted was a popular and kindly man, a firm Whig, yet the early encourager of Pope, and when Dryden died he pronounced a Latin oration With Addison he was, politiover his remains cally and personally, on terms of the closest in-On the accession of George 1 he was knighted with Marlborough's sword, and received the double appointment of Physician-in Ordinary to the King and Physician-General to the Army He edited Ovid's Metamorphoses, 'translated by the most eminent hands,' in 1717, and wrote a good many prologues and occasional poems and verses, such as those inscribed on the toastglasses of the Kit-Cat Club, of which he was a member He died 18th January 1719, and was buried in the chancel of the church at Harrowon the Hill. Pope praised him as 'the best good Christian he, although he knows it not,' and Bolingbroke, in oddly similar terms, called him the best natured ingenious wild man I ever knew? The Dispensary is a mock-heroic poem in six cantos, designed, Garth said, 'to rally some of our disaffected members into a sense of their duty,' it culminates in a grand combat between physicians and apothecaries Envy and Disease play a large part, and a delegate is finally sent to the shades to consult Harvey on the matter in dispute. In the management of the plot Garth took hints both from Boileau's Lutrin and from Dryden's MacFlecknoe Some of the leading apothecaries of the day are happily ridiculed, but the interest of the satire It opens thus has largely passed away

Speak, goddess! since tis thou that best canst tell How ancient leagues to modern discord fell, Ind why physicians were so cautious grown Of others' lives, and lavish of their own, How by a journey to the Elysian plain, Peace triumphed, and old time returned again

Not far from that most celebrated place The Old Barley Where angry Instice shews her awful face, Where little villains must submit to fate. That great ones may enjoy the world in state, There stands a dome, majestic to the sight, The College of Physicians And sumptaous arches bear its oval height, A golden globe, placed high with artful skill, Seems to the distant sight a gilded pill, This pile was, by the pious patron's aim, Raised for a use as noble as its frame, Nor did the learn'd society decline The propagation of that great design, In all her mazes, Nature's face they viewed, And, as she disappeared, their search pursued Wrapt in the shade of night the goddess lies, Yet to the learn'd unveils her dark disguise, But shans the gross access of vulgar eyes

Now she unfolds the faint and dawning strife Of infant atoms kindling into life, How ductile matter new meanders takes. And slender trains of twisting fibres makes, And how the viscous seeks a closer tone, By just degrees to harden into bone, While the more loose flow from the vital urn, And in full tides of purple streams return, How lambent flames from life's bright lamps arise. And dart in emanations through the eyes, How from each sluice a gentle torrent pours, To slake a feverish heat with ambient showers, Whence their mechanic powers the spirits claim. How great their force, how delicate their frame. How the same nerves are fashioned to sustain The greatest pleasure and the greatest pain. Why bilious juice a golden light puts on. And floods of chyle in silver currents run, How the dim speck of entity began To extend its recent form, and stretch to man, Why Envy oft transforms with wan disguise, Ind why gay Mirth sits smiling in the eyes . Whence Milo's vigour at the Olympic's shewn, Whence tropes to Finch, or impudence to Sloane, How matter, by the varied shape of pores Or idiots frames or solemn senators

Hence 'tis we wait the wondrous cause to find How body acts upon impassive mind, How fames of wine the thinking part can fire. Past hopes revive, and present joys inspire, Why our complexions oft our soul declare, And how the passions in the feature are, How touch and harmony arise between Corpored figure and a form unseen, How quick their faculties the limbs fulfil, And act at every summons of the will, With mighty truths, mysterious to descry, Which in the womb of distant causes lie. But now no grand inquiries are descried. Mean faction reigns where knowledge should preside,

Feuds are increased, and learning laid aside. Thus synods oft concern for faith conceal. And for important nothings shew a zeal The drooping sciences neglected pine. And Pean's beams with fiding lustre shine. Amilias No renders here with hectic looks are found, Nor eyes in rheum, through midnight watching, drowned The lonely edifice in sweats complains That nothing there but sullen silence reigns

This place, so fit for undisturbed repose. The god of Sloth for his asylum chose. Upon a couch of down in these abodes, Supine with folded arms, he thoughtless nods, Indulging dreams his godhead full to ease, With murmurs of soft rills, and whispering trees The poppy and each numbing plant dispense Their drowsy virtue and dull indolence, No passions interrupt his easy reign, No problems puzzle his lethargic brain But dark oblivion guards his peaceful bed, And lazy fogs hang lingering o'er his head

The poem proceeds to show how the slumbers of the god are effectively and finally disturbed. The Sloane named so disrespect fully is the famous Sir Hans, who was one of the first subscribers to the Dispensary

On Death.

'Tis to the yulgar death too harsh appears, The ill we feel is only in our fears To die is landing on some silent shore, Where billows never break, nor tempests roar Ere well we feel the friendly stroke, 'tis o'er The wise through thought the insults of death defy, The fools through blest insensibility 'Tis what the guilty fear, the pious crave, Songht by the wretch, and vanquished by the brave. It eases lovers, sets the captive free, And, though a tyrant, offers liberty

(From Canto III )

Often-quoted fragments of the Dispensary are Dissensions like small streams are first begun, Scarce seen they rise, but gather as they run

Harsh words, though pertinent, uncouth appear, None please the fancy who offend the ear

Though possession be the undoubted view, To seize is far less pleasure than pursue.

Garth wrote the epilogue to Addison's tragedy of Cato, which ends with the following aspiration

Oh, may once more the happy age appear, When words were artless, and the thoughts sincere, When gold and grandeur were menued things, And courts less coveted than groves and springs! Love then shall only mourn when Truth complains, And Constancy feel transport in its chains, Sighs with success their own soft language tell, And eyes shall utter what the lips conceal Virtue again to its bright station climb, And Beauty fear no enemy but Time, The fair shall listen to desert alone, And every Lucin find a Cato's son

In the same poem occurs the couplet The woes of wedlock with the joys we mix, 'Tis best repenting in a coach and six

Richard Duke (16592-1711), the son of a substantial London citizen, studied at Trinity College, Cambridge, lived for a time a dissolute life with the courtiers, wits, playwrights and actors, and wrote a good many poems which Dr Johnson found 'not below mediocrity' There are trunslations from Ovid, Virgil, Horace, Juvenal, and Theocritus, epistles or addresses to Waller, Dryden, Oty ay, Creech, and others, The Remere, an unfinished political satire, poems on the birth, death, marriage, or accession of princes and private persons, and a number of songs Duke was one of the wits when Swift was a child, as Swift said, but took orders before 1685, held with credit several cures, published sermons, and was by-and-by chaplain to the Queen's Most Gracious Majesty as well as to the Bishop of Winchester, with the rich living of Witney in Oxfordshire

To Mr Waller

When shame for all my foolish youth had writ Advised 'twas time the rhyming trade to quit, Time to grow wise, and be no more a wit-The noble fire that animates thy age Once more inflam'd me with poetic rige Kings, beroes, nymphs, the brave, the fair, the young, Have been the theme of thy immortal song A nobler argument at last thy Muse, Two things divine, Thee and Herself, does choose. Age, whose dull weight males vulgar spints hend, Gives wings to thine, and bids it upward tend No more confined, above the starry skies, Out from the body's broken cage it flies But oh, vouchsafe not wholly to retire, To join with and complete th' ethereal choir ! Still here remain, still on the threshold stand, Still at this distance view the promised land, Though thou may'st seem, so heavenly is thy sense. Not going thither, but new come from thence,

An Epistle to Mr Otway

Dear Tom, how melancholy I am grown Since thou hast left this learned dirty town, To thee by this dull letter be it known Whilst all my comfort, under all this care, Are duns, and puns, and logic, and small beer Thou seest I'm dull as Shadwell's men of wit, Or the top scene that Settle ever writ The sprightly Court that wander up and down From gudgeons to a race, from town to town, All, all are fled, but them I well can spare, For I'm so dull I have no business there I have forgot whatever there I I nev, Why men one stocking tye with ribbon blue Why others medals wear, a fine gilt thing, That at their breasts hang dangling by a string, I know no officer of court, nay more, No dog of court, their favourite before. Unpolish'd thus, an errant scholar grown, What should I do but sit and coo alone, And thee, my absent mate, for ever moan

William Walsh (1663-1708) was the son of the lord of the manor of Abberley in Worcestershire, left Wadham College without a degree, and in 1698 was sent to Parliament for his native county Throughout life he supported the Whig and the Honoverian interest Johnson honoured him with a place among the poets, though in his judgment he had 'more elegance than vigour,' and seldom rises higher than to be pretty He was for a while Master of the Horse, and was a man of fashion, 'ostentatiously splendid in his dress' He is known chiefly through his connection with Pope, whom, when still a young man, he helped with encouragement, advice, and criticism, for which Pope was very grateful It was he who gave Pope the famous advice to try and be a correct poet, as this was now the only way of excellency poems comprise pastorals, eclogues, imitations of Virgil and Horace, and a variety of love poems and occasional verses, some of them sprightly enou@h

The Unrewarded Lover

Let the dull merchant curse his angry fate, And from the winds and waves his fortune wait Let the loud lawver break his brains, and be A slave to wrangling coxcombs, for a fee Let the rough soldier fight his prince's foes. And for a livelihood his life expose I wage no war, I plead no cause but Love's. I fear no storms but what Celinda moves And what grave censor can my choice despise? But here, fur charmer, here the difference hes The merchant, after all his hazard's past, Enjoys the fruit of his long toils at last . The soldier high in his king's favour stands, And, after having long obey'd, commands. The lawyer, to reward his tedious care. Roars on the bench, that babbled at the bar While I take pains to meet a fate more hard. And resp no fruit, no favour, no reward

Written in a Lady's Table-book.

With what strange raptures would my soul be blest, Were but her book an emblem of her breast! As I from that all former marks efface, And, uncontrolled, put new ones in their place, So might I chace all others from her heart, And my own image in the stead impart. But ah, how short the bliss would prove, if he Who seized it next might do the same by me!

Death

What has this hughear Death that 's worth our care?
After a life in pain and sorrow past,
After deluding hope and dire despair,
Death only gives us quiet at the last.

How strangely are our love and hate misplaced!
Freedom we seek, and yet from freedom flee,
Courting those tyrant sins that chain us fast,
And shunning Death, that only sets us free

'Tis not a foolish fear of future pains,
(Why should they fear who keep their souls from stains?)
That makes me dread thy terrors, Death, to see
'Tis not the loss of riches, or of fame,
Or the vain toys the vulgar pleasures name,
'Tis nothing, Calia, but the losing thee.

Phyllis's Resolution.

When slaves their liberty require,
They hope no more to gain,
But you not only that desire,
But ask the power to reign

Think how unjust a suit you make,
Then you will soon decline,
Your freedom when you please pray take,
But trespass not on mine

No more in vain, Alcander, crave,
I ne'er will grant the thing,
That he who once has been my slave
Should ever be my king

John Dunton (1659-1733), son of the rector of Graffham, Hunts, was apprenticed to a London bookseller, and acquired much varied knowledge, in spite of love, politics, and other distractions He took a shop, married happily, made some lucky ventures, but was involved in financial troubles as security for relatives He visited America, Holland, and Cologne, settled with his creditors, and kept shop for ten years with fair prosperity, his Athenian Gazette (afterwards Athenian Mercury, 1691-97) being specially successful as one of the earliest journals devoted to answering correspon-He wrote political pamphlets on the Whig side, satires, &c, to the number of forty, published six hundred books, and carried out a few of the 'six hundred projects' he cherished He marned a second time unhappily, and under the real and imaginary troubles of his later years his mind seems to have crossed the line between crackbrained flightiness and sheer lunacy, as may be gathered from his extraordinary Life and Errois of John Dunton (1705)

An abridgment of the Athenian Oracle, Dunton's own four-volume selection of articles from the Athenian Mercury, was edited by John Underhill in 1802

George Stepney (1663-1707) was one of Johnson's poets, reported in youth to have made grey authors blush,' but adjudged by Johnson to have 'little either of the grace of wit or the vigour And time has confirmed this judg-Stepney's poems figure in collections like ment Chalmers's British Poets, but nobody reads them, and his name is all but forgotten. Of Pembrokeshire stock, he was the son of a groom of the chamber to Charles II, became famous at Cambridge as a writer of Latin verse, and chose a diplomatic career Than this envoy to the Emperor, to the Elector Palatine, the Electors of Brandenburg, Saxony, Mainz, Treves, and Cologne, and the Landgrave of Hesse, 'no Englishman knew the affairs of Germany so well and few Germans better' His work is but small in volume He made some free translations or imitations from Juvenal, Horace, and Ovid, praised William III and Mary in neat and commonplace verses as he had done James II, and wrote 'occasional poems,' like so many of his contemporaries

Dreams

At dead of night imperial Reason sleeps, And Fancy with her train loose revels I ceps, Then airy pliantoms a mix'd scene display, Of what we heard, or saw, or wish'd by day, For memory those images retains Which passion form'd, and still the strongest reigns Huntsmen renew the chace they lately run, And generals fight again their battles won Spectres and furies haunt the murderer's dreams, Grants or disgraces are the courtler's themes. The miser spies a thief, or a new hoard, The cit's a knight, the sycophant a lord Thus fancy 's in the wild distraction lost, With what we most abhor or covet most But of all passions that our dreams control, Love prints the deepest image in the soul

John Pomfret (1667-1702) was the son of the rector of Luton, Bedfordshire, and himself a clergyman In 1695 he became rector of Maulden, also in Bedfordshire, and had the prospect of preferment, but the Bisliop of London, absurdly regarding as immoral in the mouth of a married clergy man the gently cynical wish to have no wife, expressed in The Choice, considered and rejected the poetical candidate Detained in London by this unsuccessful negotiation, Pomfret caught smallpox and died His works comprise occasional poems and some 'Pindaric Essays' in Cowley's manner, Cruelty and Lust, on Colonel Kirke's proceedings, and Reason a Poem upon the Divine Attributes The only piece of Pomfret's now remembered—we Dr Johnson can hardly say read—is The Choice said that perhaps no poem in our language had been oftener perused, and Southey still as why Pomfret was the most popular among the English It is difficult nowadays to conceive that The Choice could ever have been a truly popular It is a graceful but tame and monotonous celebration, in neat verse, of the mild joys of a country retirement, a modest dwelling, with wood, garden, and stream, a clear and competent estate, and the enjoyment of lettered case and happiness -a subject sufficiently often liandled by Pomfret's contemporaries, and Thomson and Cowper, one might have thought, would long ere Southey's. time have obliterated all but the dim memory of Pomfret's commonplaces

From 'The Choice'

If Heaven the grateful liberty would give
That I might choose my method how to live,
And all those hours propitious fate should lend,
In blissful ease and satisfaction spend,
Near some fair town I'd have a private seat,
Built uniform, not little nor too great,
Better if on a rising ground it stood,
On this side fields, on that a neighbouring wood.
It should within no other things contain
But what are useful, necessary, plain,
Methinks 'tis nauscous, and I'd ne'er endure
The needless pomp of gaudy furniture.
A little garden grateful to the eye
And a cool rivulet run murmuring by,

On whose delicious banks a stately row Of shady limes or sycamores should grow At th' end of which a silent study placed, Should be with all the noblest authors graced Horace and Virgil, in v hose mighty lines Immortal wit and solid learning shines, Sharp Juvenal, and amorous Ovid too Who all the turns of love's soft passion knew He that with judgmen reads his charming lines, In which strong art with stronger nature joins, Must grant his fancy does the best excel-His thoughts so tender, and expressed so well With all those moderns, men of steady sense, Esteemed for learning and for eloquence. In some of these, as fancy should advise I'd always tal e my morning exercise, For sure no minntes bring us more content Than those in pleasing useful studies spent.

I'd have a clear and competent estate, That I might live genteelly, but not great. As much as I could moderately spend, A little more, sometimes to oblige a friend Nor should the sons of poverty repine Too much at fortune, they should taste of mine, And all that objects of true pity were SLould be relieved with what my wants could spare, For that our Maker has too largely given Should be returned in gratitude to Heaven A frugal plenty should my table spread, With healthy, not luxurious, dishes spread, Enough to satisfy, and something more, To feed the stranger, and the neighbouring poor Strong meat indulges vice, and pampering food Creates diseases and inflames the blood But what's sufficient to make nature strong, And the bright lamp of life continue long, I'd freel, take, and as I did possess, The bounteons Author of my plenty bless

Matthew Prior.

Matthew Prior vas born 21st July 1664, probably at Wimborne-Minster in East Dorsetshire, but was brought up at Westminster, and sent to the school there. His father, a Nonconformist joiner, died, and Matthew was adopted by an uncle, Samuel Prior, who kept the Rhenish Wine House in Channel (now Cannon) Row, Westminster Earl of Dorset here found him once reading Horace, and got his uncle to send the lad back to Westminster, in 1681 he became a king's scholar, and in 1683 was elected to a scholarship at St John's College, Cambridge. Here he distinguished himself, and amongst other verses, produced (1687), in conjunction with Charles Montagu (afterwards Earl of Halifax), a no-popery slit entitled the City Mouse and Country Mouse, burlesquing Dryden's Hind and Panther, in which Bayes figures somewhat as in the Rehearsal Earl of Dorset subsequently obtained for him an appointment as secretary to Lord Dursley, afterwards Earl of Berkeley, ambassador to the Hague. In this post Prior showed gifts unusual in successful poets, and secured the approbation of King William, who made him one of the gentlemen of the bedchamber In 1697 he was appointed secretary to the embassy on the treaty of Ryswick, and next year he was secretary of embassy at Johnson relates that, viewing at Versailles Le Brun's pictures of the victories of Louis, Prior, on being asked whether the King of England's palace had any such decorations, happily replied 'The monuments of my master's actions are to be seen everywhere but in his own house.' After his return to England Prior was appointed a Commissioner of Trade and Plantations In 1701 he entered the House of Commons for the borough of East Grinstead, and abandoning his former friends, the Whigs, joined the Tories in impeaching Lord This came with a bad grace from Prior, for the charge against Somers was that he had advised that partition treaty in which the poet himself had had a share He showed his patriotism by afterwards celebrating in verse the battles of Blenheim (1704) and Ramillies (1706) When the Whig Government was overturned, Prior became attached to Harley's administration, and went with Bolingbroke to France in 1711 to negotiate a treaty of peace. He lived in splendour in Paris, was a favourite of the French monarch, and enjoyed all the honours of ambassador was recalled, sore against his will, to London in Queen Anne being dead, and the Whigs again in office, Prior was committed to custody on a charge of high treason. The charge vas that he had held clandestine conferences with the French plenipotentiary—though, as he justly replied, no treaty was ever made without private interviews and preliminaries, it was suggested, too, that Bolingbrol e and he were intriguing for the Pretender The Whigs were indignant at what they regarded as the disgraceful treaty of Utrecht, Prior only shared in the blame of the Government and the unpopularity of Bolingbroke. After two vears' confinement, the poet was released without a tnal He had in the interval written his poem of Alma, and being now left without any other support than his fellowship of St John's, and very improvident to boot, he produced Solomon, the most elaborate of his works He further issued a collected edition of his poems (1718), which was sold to subscribers for two guineas a copy and realised four thousand guineas. An equal sum was presented to Prior by Lord Oxford's son, Lord Harley, now Earl of Oxford, and thus he had laid up a provision for old age. He was now ambitious only of comfort and private enjoyment-or said so Even these he did not long possess, he died on the 18th of September 1721, at Lord Harley's seat at Wimpole, in the fifty-eighth year of his age. The Duchess of Portland, Lord Harley's daughter, said Prior 'made himself beloved by every living thing in the house-master, child, and servant, human creature or animal' To this lady as a child he had addressed his well-known verses beginning

My noble lovely little Peggy, Let this, my first epistle, beg ye, At dawn of morn and close of even To lift your heart and hands to heaven In double beanty say your prayer, 'Our Father' first, then 'Notre Père.'

He was said to have been fond of toping and of low company, and at the time of his death was, according to Arbuthnot, on the point of marrying a certain Bessy Cox, who kept an alehouse in Long Acre To this person and to his secretary, Prior left his estate. Arbuthnot, writing to a friend the month after Prior's death, says 'We are to have a bowl of punch at Bessy Cox's She would fain have put it upon Lewis that she was his (Prior's) Emma she owned Flanders Jane was his Chloe.' To this doubtful Chloe some of his happiest verses were devoted, even high born ladies might well have envied such compliments as these

What I speak, my fair Chloe, and what I write, shows
The difference there is betwixt Nature and Art,
I court others in verse, but I love thee in prose,
And they have my whimsies, but thou hast my heart
The god of us verse men—you know, Child—the Sun,

How after his journeys he set up his rest,
If at morning o'er earth 'tis his fancy to run,
At night he reclines on his Thetis's breast,

So when I am wearied with wandering all day,
To thee, my delight, in the evening I come,
No matter what beauties I saw in my way,
They were but my visits but thou art my home.

To Chloe was inscribed his Henry and Emira, a poem upon the model of the Nut-brown Maia, but in discarding the simplicity of the original, Prior sacrificed much of its charm and subjects-odes, songs, epistles, epigrams, and tales, he was unquestionably versatile, though not always equal to himself in grace. His longest poem, Solomon on the Vanity of the World, was by its author thought his best, and so too thought It is free, of course, from the objections that can be raised against some of the others, and is perhaps the most carefully written, but the tales and lighter pieces of Prior are undoubtedly his happiest efforts. In these he displays that 'charming ease' Cowper commends, together with the lively illustration and colloquial humour of his master, Horace. Few poets have possessed in greater perfection the art of graceful and fluent versification. His narratives flow on like a clear stream, without break or fall, and interest us by their perpetual good humour and vivacity, even when they wander into metaphysics, as in Alma, or into coarseness, as in his tales-though Johnson called Prior's works 'a lady's book' Alma is still read by those who like its model, Hudibras, but Henry and Emma, also very popular at first, is forgotten The Secretary, The Female Phaton, and the lines To a Child of Quality, all famous in his lifetime, were not included in the poems of 1718 Pope and Beattie praised four (unprinted) prose Dialogues of the Dead by him, an interesting 'History of his own Time,' printed amongst his works, is of doubtful authenticity Prior, who was tall and lank in person, and in manner usually somewhat solemn, was vain of his gifts, though he constantly professed that his poetry was but the accident of a busy life. Thackeray thought 'Prior's seem to me, he highly of his work says, 'amongst the easiest, the richest, the most charmingly humorous of English lyrical poems' His classical allusions and images—in the fashion of the day-seem not to carry with them the air of pedantry or restraint. Like Swift he liked to versify the common occurrences of life and relate personal feelings and adventures, but he had none of the Dean's bitterness or misanthropy, and employed no stronger weapons of satire than raillery and arch allusion. He contrived to combine playfulness with grace and even a measure of dignity His verses to children-a department in which he was a pioneer—are delightful. He sported on the surface of existence, noting its foibles, its pleasures, and eccentricities, but without the power of penetrating into its recesses or evoking the nobler passions of our nature. He was the most natural of artificial poets-a seeming paradox, yet as true as the old maxim that the perfection of art is the art of concealing it.

For My Own Monument

As doctors give physic by way of prevention, Matt, alive and in health, of his tombstone took care, For delays are unsafe, and his pious intention May haply be never fulfilled by his heir

Then take Matt's word for it, the sculptor is paid That the figure is fine, pray believe your own eye, Yet credit but lightly what more may be said, For we flatter ourselves, and teach marble to lie.

Yet counting as far as to fifty his years, His virtues and vices were as other men's are, High hopes he conceived, and he smothered great fears, In a life party-coloured, half pleasure, half care.

Nor to business a drudge, nor to faction a slave, He strove to make int'rest and freedom agree, In public employments industrious and grave, And alone with his friends, Lord! how merry was he.

Now in equipage stately, now humbly on foot, Both fortunes he tried, but to neither would trust, And whirled in the round as the wheel turned abont, He found riches had wings, and knew man was but dust

This verse, little polished, though mighty sincere, Sets neither his titles nor ment to view, It says that his relies collected he here, And no mortal yet knows too if this may be true.

Fierce robbers there are that infest the highway, So Matt may be killed and his bones never found, False witness at court, and fierce tempests at sea, So Matt may yet chance to be hanged or be drowned

If his bones he in earth, roll in sea, fly in air, To Fate we must yield, and the thing is the same, And if passing thon giv'st him a smile or a tear, He cares not—yet, prithee, be kind to his fame.

Epitaph Extempore

Nobles and Heralds, by your leave,
Here hes what once was Matthew Prior,
The son of Adam and of Eve,
Can Bonrbon or Nassau claim higher?

Instead of being extempore, this is more probably a recollection like Goldsmith's Ned Purdon. There is an old epitaph—

'Johnnie Carnegie lais heer Descendit of Adam and Eve, Gif ony can gang hieher Ise willing gie him leave.

An Epitaph

Interred beneath this marble stone, Lie sanntering Jack and idle Joan While rolling threescore years and one Did round this globe their courses run, If human things went ill or well, If changing empires rose or fell, The morning past, the evening came, And found this couple still the same They walked and ate, good folks What then? Why, then they walked and ate again, They soundly slept the night away, They did just nothing all the day Nor sister either had nor brother, They seemed just tallied for each other Their moral and economy Most perfectly they made agree, Each virtue kept its proper bound, Nor trespassed on the other's ground. Nor fame nor censure they regarded, They neither punished nor rewarded He cared not what the footman did Her maids she neither praised nor chid,

So every servant took his course. And, bad at first, they all grew worse Slothful disorder filled his stable. And sluttish plenty decked her table. Their beer was strong, their wine was port. Their meal was large, their grace was short. They gave the poor the remnant meat. Just when it grew not fit to eat. They paid the church and parish rate, And took, but read not the receipt, For which they claimed their Sunday's due. Of slumbering in an upper new No man's defects sought they to know. So never made themselves a foe. No man's good deeds did they commend. So never raised themselves a friend Nor cherished they relations poor, That might decrease their present store. Nor barn nor house did they repair. That might oblige their future heir They neither added nor confounded. They neither wanted nor abounded Nor tear nor smile did they employ At news of public grief or joy When bells were rung and bonfires made, If asked, they ne'er denied their aid, Their jug was to the ringers carried. Whoever either died or married Their billet at the fire was found. Whoever was deposed or crowned Nor good, nor bad, nor fools, nor wise, They would not learn, nor could advise, Without love, hatred, joy, or fear, They led-a kind of-as it were, Nor wished, nor cared, nor laughed, nor cried, And so they lived, and so they died

To a Child of Quality (one of the Dorset House), Five Years Old, the Author Forty 1704

Lords, knights, and squires, the numerous band That wear the fair Miss Mary's fetters, Were summoned by her high command To shew their passion by their letters.

My pen amongst the rest I took,
Lest those bright eyes that cannot read
Should dart their kindling fires, and look
The power they have to be obeyed

Nor quality nor reputation

Forbid me yet my flame to tell

Dear five years-old befriends my passion,

And I may write till she can spell

For, while she makes her silkworms beds With all the tender things I swear, Whilst all the house my passion reads, In papers round her baby's hair,

She may receive and own my flame,
For though the strictest prudes should know it,
She'll pass for a most virtneus dame,
And I for an inhappy poet.

Then, too, alas when she shall tear
The lines some younger rival sends;
She'll give me leave to write, I fear,
And we shall still continue friends.

For, as our different ages move,

'Tis so ordained (would Fate but mend it ')

That I shall be past making love,

When she begins to comprehend it

Abra's Love for Solomon.

Another nymph, amongst the many fur That made my softer hours their solemn care. Refore the rest affected still to stand, And natched my eye, preventing my command Abra-she so was called-didst soonest haste To grace my presence. Abra y ent the last, Abra was ready ere I called her name . And, though I called another, Abra came. Her equals first observed her growing zeal, And laughing, glossed that Abra served so well To me her actions did unheeded die. Or were remarked but with a common eye, fill, more apprised of what the rumonr said. More I observed peculiar in the maid The sun declined had shot his western ray. When tired with business of the solemn day, I purposed to unbend the evening hours. And banquet private in the women's howers I called before I sat to wash my hands-For so the precent of the law commands-Love had ordained that it was Abra's turn Fo mix the sweets and minister the um With awful homage, and submissive dread, The maid approached, on my declining head To pour the oils, she trembled as she poured. With an unguarded look she now devoured My nearer face and now recalled her eye. And herved, and strove to hide, a sudden sigh "And whence," said I, "canst thou have dread or כ מוזים

What can the imagery of sorrow mean? Seeluded from the world and all its care, Hast thou to grieve or joe, to hope or fear? For sure,' I added, 'sure they little heart Ne'er felt love's anger, or received his dart'

Abashed she blushed, and with disorder spoke Her rising shame adorned the words it broke

'If the great master will descend to hear
The humble series of his handmaid's care,
O! while she tells it, let him not put on The look that awes the nations from the throne!
O' let not death severe in glory he
In the king's frown and terror of his eye!
Mine to obey, the part is to ordain,
And, though to mention be to suffer pain,
If the ling smile whilst I my woe recite,
If weeping I find favour in his sight,
Flor fast my tears, full rising his delight,
O' witness earth beneath, and heaven above!
For can I hide it? I am sick of love,
If madness may the name of passion bear,
Or love be called what is indeed despair

'Thou Sovereign Power, whose secret will controls
The inward bent and motion of our souls!
Why hast thou placed such infinite degrees
Between the cause and cure of my disease?
The mighty object of that riging fire,
In which unputied, Abra must expire.

Had he been born some simple shepherd's heir. The lowing herd or fleecy slieed his care. At morn with him I o'er the hills had run. Scornful of winter's frost and summer's sun. Still asking where he made his flock to rest at noon. For him at night, the dear expected guest. I had with hasty joy prepared the feast, And from the cottage, o'er the distant plain, Sent forth my longing eye to meet the swain. Wavering, impatient, tossed by hope and fear, Till he and joy together should appear, And the loved dog declare his master near On my declining neck and open breast I should have Julled the lovely youth to rest. And from beneath his head, at dawning day, With softest care have stol'n my arm away. To use and from the fold release his sheep, Fond of his flock, indulgent to his sleep Or if kind heaven, propitious to my flame-For sure from heaven the faithful ardour came-Had blest my life, and decked my natal hour With height of title, and extent of power Without a crime my passion had aspired. Found the loved prince, and told what I desired. Then I had come, preventing Sheba's queen, To see the comcliest of the sons of men. To hear the charming poet's amorous song. And gather honey falling from his tongue, To take the frigrant kisses of his mouth, Sweeter than breezes of her native South, Likening his grace, his person, and his mien, To all that great or beauteous I had seen '

Here o'er her speech her flowing eyes prevail. O foolish maid! and O, unhappy tale! I saw her, 'twas humanity, it gave Some respite to the sorrows of my slave Her fond excess proclaimed her passion true, And generous pity to that truth was due Well I entreated her, who well deserved, I called her often, for she always served Use made her person easy to my sight, And ease insensibly produced delight Whene'er I revelled in the women's bowers-For first I sought her but at looser hours-The apples she had gathered smelt most sweet, The cake she kneaded was the sayour, meat But fruits their odour lost, and ments their taste, If gentle Abra had not decked the feast Dishonoured did the sparkling goblet stand, Unless received from gentle Abra's hand, And, when the virgins formed the evening choir, RaisiOn their voices to the master lyre, Too fla I thought this voice, and that too shrill, One sheved too much, and one too little skill, Nor could my soul approve the music's tone, Till all was hushed, and Abra sung alone Fairer she seemed distinguished from the rest, And better mien disclosed, as better drest A bright tiara round her forehead tied, To juster bounds confined its rising pride The blushing ruby on her snowy breast Rendered its panting whiteness more confessed, Brieelets of pearl give roundness to her arm, And every gem augmented every charm Her senses pleased, her beauty still improved, And she more lovely grew, as more beloved.

Written in Mezeray's History of France

Whate'er thy countrymen have done By law and wit, by sword and gun, In thee is faithfully recited, And all the living vorld that view. Thy work give thee the praises due, At once instructed and delighted

Yet for the fame of all these deeds,
What beggar in the Invalides,
With lameness broke, vith blindness smitten,
Wished ever decently to die,
To ha e been either Mezeray
Or any monarch he has written?

It's strange, dear author, yet it true is, That down from Pharamond to Louis, All covet life, yet call it pain, All feel the ill, yet shun the cure. Can sense this paradox endure? Resolve me, Cambray or Fontaine.

The man in graver tragic known (Though his best part long since was done) Still on the stable desires to tarry, And he who played the Harlequin, After the jest still loads the scene, Unvilling to retire, though weary Cambray is, of course, Fenelon, who was Archbishop of Cambrar, François de Eudes Mezeray (1610-83) wrote what was long the standard Histoire de France Sir Walter Scott, about a year before his death, repeated these verses when on a Border tour with Mr Lock hart. They me two beggars old soldiers, one of whom recognised Scot, and bade God bless him. The mendicants went on their way, and we stood breathing on the Looll. Sir Walter followed them with his eye, and plan ing his such firmly on the sod repeated without break or hesitation Priors verses to the historian Mezeray That he applied them to himself was touchingly obvious.

Ode to a Lady

She refusing to continue a Dispute with me, and leaving me in the Argument.

Spare, generous victor, spare the slave, Who did unequal v ar pursue, That more than triumph he might have In being overcome by you'

In the dispute whate er I said,

My heart was by my tongue belied,

And in my looks you might have read

How much I argued on your side

Yon, far from danger as from fear,

Might have sustained an open fight
For seldom your opinions err,

Your eyes are always in the right.

Why, fair one, would you not rely On reason's force vith beauty's joined?
Could I their prevalence deny,
I must at once be deaf and blind

Alas! not hoping to subdue,
I only to the fight aspired,
To keep the beauteous foe in view,
Was all the glory I desired

But she, howe'er of victory sure,

Contemns the wreath too long delayed,
And, armed with more immediate power,

Calls cruel silence to her aid.

Deeper to wound she shuns the fight,
She drops her arms to gam the field
Secures her conquest by her flight,
And triumphs when she seems to yield.

So when the Parthian turned his steed, And from the hostile camp withdrew, With cruel skill the backward reed He sent, and as he fled he slew

THE AGE OF QUEEN ANNE

and the appearance of Thomson's Winter in 1726 make the best boundary-marks for the so-called Augustan age of English literature, which is likewise styled the age of

Oueen Anne, although it really includes also the reign of George I It is true that the activity and influence of the greatest poet of the period extended far beyond the latter limit. for Pope lived on till near the middle of the century, and his Dunciad, Essay on Man, and Satires were all produced during the reign of George II The same is true in a measure of Swift, who died a month after the hattle of Prestonpans, as well as of some minor men like Gay, whose Fables and Beggar's Opera in their dates of publication just overpass the line here Yet that line seems on the whole as little arbitrary as possible, since the appearance of Thomson marks the beginning of the slow return to nature in poetry, which, despite its lingering conventionalism, shows a nascent reaction against the limited ideals of correctness associated with the name of Pope. Moreover, the great bulk of the definitely Augustan literature had been produced before the end of 1726 All the work of Addison and Steele, and all the greatest work of Swift from the Tale of a Tub down to Gulliver's Travels, as well as Pope's Essay on Criticism, Rape of the Lock, and Homer, were given to the world within what is roughly the first quarter of the eighteenth century, and the same holds good of the novels of Defoe It is perhaps not insignificant that the dividing line thus drawn in literature may be traced also in the sphere of public affairs, for in the few years before 1726 the generation of statesmen which had flourished under Queen Anne made way for their successors hope, Sunderland, Marlborough, and Cowper had died between 1720 and 1723 in that latter year Atterbury was exiled, and Bolingbroke extinguished by pardon and return from banishment, while Oxford ended his days in 1724. The close of the first twenty-six years of the eighteenth century may be said, indeed, to coin cide with the critical point of the transition from Pope and Swift to Thomson and Richardson and Fielding, and also from the contemporaries of Harley and St John to those of Walpole and the Pelhams

The epithet Augustan, so often applied to the period of Queen Anne, suggests a parallel with the age of Virgil and Horace which can only partially be justified. Assuredly there was no Virgil among the poets of eighteenth-century England, and if Pope may be accepted as all we have for an English Horace, he must be taken as but a maimed one at the best. With a sharper sating genius than the Roman, and almost as shrewd a knowledge of human life and character, he has none of the geniality that delights us in the Epistles, and as little of the lyric charm that gives immortality to the Odes The Horatian quality in the age of Queen Anne is to be sought rather in the work of Addison, and not in Addison's verse but in his prose. The papers of the Spectator, in their delightful and always genial mingling of humour, satire, and observation, show all the best of Horace's traits, except of course the purely poetical, while at the same time they are absolutely unstained by the characteristically Horatian blots As for the sinister and solitary genius of Swift, there is no parallel to that in any literary age whatever creator of the Struldbrugs and the Yahoos there was certainly little of that urbanity which is reckoned as a specially Augustan trait, and indeed the literary urbanity of the age of Anne is to be found less in the gracious tone of a polished civilisation than in an absorption in the artificial life of what had come to be called 'the town' Virgil and Horace are always at home—and even most at home—in the country, but it is not so with Swift or Pope, or even, despite his Shepherd's IVal of pastorals, with Here again, however, an exception must be made for Addison, who is as much at his ease in Worcestershire as in the Strand, and whose portrait of Sir Roger de Coverley recalls Horace's pictures of the farmers among the Samnite hills particulars in which the age of Queen Anne on the literary side did really resemble that of Augustus. It was an age of comparative repose and contentment and prosperity after civil disquiet, and an age too in which letters were splendidly encouraged by the great. peculiar development of literary patronage due to the Revolution has been considered on a former page, and here it will suffice to say that in no other period has English literature owed so much to the imitators of Mæcenas, so that even Pope, who thanked Homer alone for his pecuniary independence, was indebted to Harley and St John for his social position, while Addison's essays procured him a Secretaryship of State It has to be added, however, that the end of the period saw the decline of the political patronage of letters under Walpole's unromantic That shrewd opportunist was quick to perceive that the consolidation of the Whig oligarchy had made literary aid superfluous to the administration Not clever satire or pamphleteering but crafty political management was needed to sustain the Minister's majority, and so under Walpole English literature passed into those gloomy decades through which Fielding and Johnson struggled.

On the other hand, there are one or two

The statement that the age of Queen Anne was one of comparative repose and content may seem paradoxical in face of the fact that it was occupied by a long foreign war, by constant Incobite intrigue, and by the conflict of fierce political factions. Yet the wai, illustrated by the victories of Marlborough was brilliantly successful, and served to Jovershadow the Jacobite intriguing, while strife of Whigs and Tories, with all its billerness, was far less violent than the civil brois of the later Stuart reigns or even of the time of William III great majority of the per ple were undoubtedly more contented with their political lot than they had been since the years immediately succeeding the Restoration The were ruled now not by a real or suspected Papist, or a Dutch intruder, but by a native so dereign of the old line, ferrently attached to the attonal Church The constitution and the succe. sion had been settled, the danger from Scotland was peacefully avoided by the Union of 1707, and every year the Tower guns were sounding the news of glorious victorics over the French It would seem that the nation was really very little troubled by fears of Jacobitism and it is significant at least that, so far as its abiding literature gives evidence, there might almost have been no such thing as Jacobitism at all Of the Tory revival promoted largely perhaps by the publication of Lord Clarendon's great History in 1704-7there are traces in plenty, especially in the jeur d'esprit of Arbuthnot and the voluminous pamphleteering of Swift, though even this reyival has left no such mark on our literature as the terrible factions of Charles II's time have done in the satires of Dryden Jacobitism one must turn to the subterranean literature of the time-to secret memoirs and libellous broadsheets and clandestine correspondence, or at the best to such unread tracts of Defoe as And what if the Pretender should come? or Hannibal at the Gate England in truth was almost as hopeful and as well satisfied with herself in the reign of Queen Anne as in the reign of Queen Victoria, and although her self-consciousness did not issue, as in the case of Augustan Rome, in a great national epic or history, it is sufficiently evident in the optimism of Pope, the easy good-humour of Addison, and even the mordant activity of Swift

Passing from these general aspects to some of the particular features of the age, one may note that in poetry it consummated the effort after orderliness and correctness which had followed as a natural reaction upon the licentious degeneracy of Elizabethan vigour that consummation Pope of course was the grand agent, and his influence is seen in all the minor poets (some of them little more than his satellites) from Gay and Parnell down to Fenton and Broome A fresh reaction against the excess of convention and correctness was of course mevitable, and the return to nature, which at first and for long was made with reverent loyalty to the authority of Pope, has been discerned by some in the poems of the Countess of Winchilsea, who would thus be a very small and early herald of Thomson the drama the Restoration comic model lingered on in the work of Farquhar till 1707, but was gradually supplanted by the sentimental comedy, wherein Steele, the first effective moraliser of the stage, was succeeded by Colley Tragedy was continued mainly by Nicholas Rowe, a very much weaker and purer Otway; but the entire lack of aptitude for the poetic drama was most signally shown in Addi son's Cato, the production of which, in the year of the Treaty of Utrecht, was one of its conspicuous literary events Rowe and Addison are far more notable in other regards—the one as the first critical editor of Shakespeare (followed ere long by Pope himself and Theobald), and the other as the earliest popular and sympathetic critic of Milton English literary criticism may almost be said to begin with the Spectator, which led the way in its attempt to sho and explain to intelligent men and women at large the methods and merits of a classic English writer. The age, indeed, was essentially though crudely critical, as beseemed a generation that made correctness the main poetic virtue, and its bent in this direction is to be seen in the sallies of the Scriblerus Club, the bitter war of Pope against the dunces, and the frenzies of Mr John Dennis

Swift is the greatest name of the period in prose, and infinitely the greatest master of satire in the language. His style shows the highest reach of that essentially pamphleteering manner which in its plain directness of appeal to the multitude had always maintained a contrast to the academic manner as developed in different varieties by Bacon, Hooker, and Browne an influence on English prose, however, he has been second to Addison, who simplified and perfected what one may call the gentlemanly style affected by Sir Wilham Temple Hardly any development in English literature has been so momentous as that which vas begun by the Tatler in 1709, and continued by the more famous Spectator (1711) and the Guardian Not only did these papers mark the rise of periodical writing, and give a fresh start and a new form to the English essay, but they also did more than anything else to spread a knowledge and love of literature among the middle classes, to diffuse an atmosphere of politeness and culture, and offer a model of easy and unaffected expression At the same time the art of epistolary writing made a great advance in the hands of Pope and Swift, and above all of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, the first of whose charming letters from the East was written in 1717 Soon afterwards, between 1719 and 1724, came the tales of Daniel Defoe, beginning with Robinson Crusoe, and marking a preliminary stage in the evolution of the English novel.

A few other prose writers in different fields deserve a word of notice. The works of Lord Bolingbroke, one of the great political figures of the age, were mostly written and published long afterwards, but his Letter to Sir William Wyndham, composed in 1717, shows his essentially oratorical style almost at its best. In

1711 the third Lord Shaftesbury had published the Characteristics, a collection of philosophical essays in stately and somewhat too rhetorical Shaftesbury has often been ranked as one of the Deists, an active and notable band of controversialists in their day, though now Their leaders were such men half-forgotten as Toland, Tindal, Woolston, and Anthony Collins, and their attacks on revelation raised a fierce controversy, which was begun by the Nonjuror Leslie so early as 1697, and culminated perhaps in the encounter of Anthony Collins and Bentley in 1713 The polemical monuments of Deism are not of great literary interest, but the movement is noteworthy as showing the change of the ecclesiastical battleground from the old question of Papal supremacy which had occupied the attention of combatants in the century before important also because of the effect it had on French speculation through the agency of Voltaire, whose memorable sojourn in England began just at the end of this period, in 1726 1 loftier and rarer spirit than most of those engaged in the Deistical controversy was Bishop Berkeley, famous in metaphysics as the exponent of an extreme idealism, but mentionable here mainly for the hterary grace of dialogues like Hylas and Philonous, which are the most successful adaptations in our language of the manner and method of Plato Externally the Church was strong, prosperous, and even aggressive in the reign of Oucci Anne, while among its ministers were some of the most brilliant intellects of the age-notably Atterbury and Swift It was already, however, very largely affected by a practical if not a dogmatic rationalism, which was to prevail for more than a century, until the romantic and Tractarian movements had ended the reign of common-sense An eccentric but not an insignificant phenomenon vas the career of the wayward Whiston, who managed to combine Arianism with supernaturalism, and was in consequence deprived of the Cambridge professorship, in which he had succeeded Newton Outside the bounds of the Establishment the same rationalising tendency is apparent, and it was in the reign of Queen Anne that the Unitarian sect in England (not then consciously rationalist) had its beginning out of the isolated congregations-many of them Presbyterianwhich in the preceding half-century had left the Anglican Church the other-as morally decisive. But as it was not published, it was of no help to Swift in the complications with Vanessa, who followed him to Ireland and established herself at a house of hers not far from Dublin-complications which, also in some of their details resting on evidence probable only, are certain, and must have been great. unhappy lady, a figure not so attractive as her rival, but to be pitied quia multum amavit, died in 1723. In the interval Swift-v hether out of genuine Irish patriotism, or to revenge himself on the Whigs, is a moot point-had been working un a line of attack against the undoubted misdeeds of the Irish Government, and a year later the best of handles was given to him by the affair called 'Wood's halfpence.' The idlest attempts have been made by his detractors to lessen the scandal It will probably be sufficient even for those who are not prone to listen to 'Iri's grievances,' to mention two simple facts. In the first place. Wood was empowered to coin thirty pence out of twelve-pennyworth of copper, and there are suspicions that he did not always keep even to this comfortable margin of profit. In the second, after his contract had been cut down from the preposterous sum of £,108,000 to £,40,000, its entire withdrawal was supposed to require a solatium of £3000 a year for eight years. At any rate, Swift took up the matter in the famous Drapier's Letters (1724, see infra), and, not without some slight personal risk, beat the Government completely, becoming thereby the idol of Ireland. Not long afterwards, in 1726 and 1727, he made visits to his friends in England, and these visits not merely knit up old friendship anew, but were fruitful in literary work. This was the time when Gulliver's Travels appeared Moreover, Swift's genius had always been remarkable for its suggestive and stimulative power over his friends, and there is no doubt that both the Beggar's Opera and the Dunciad owed something, perhaps much, to him But Stella's health had been breaking for some time, and she died in 1728, shortly after his return from the second visit. Of the world-famous inscription, 'Only a woman's hair,' on a lock of hers in his writing, it is sufficient to say that there have been persons, apparently possessing heads, who have charged Swift with wanting a heart. He outlived her for nearly twenty years, and probably wrotecertainly published-some of his most characteristic and brilliant work the Modest Proposal (see infra), one of the very apices of the irony of the world, the charming Polite Conversation, almost good-natured in its satire on society, the verses, in their peculiar way consummate, 'On the Death of Dr Swift, 'Rhapsody of Poetry,' and 'Legion Club,' with those, virtually though not technically authenticated, on the 'Last Judgment.' But the mysterious disease which had afflicted his whole life, which he himself set down to some ailment of the stomach, but which is now held to have been a local affection close to but not necessarily affecting the brain, was increasing, and, aided by disappointment, bereavement, and the 'fierce indignation' which in the happiest circumstances and highest health would probably have still been fated to him, made his life more and more of a misery At last its ravages gained the brain itself, and after some five years, sometimes of hideous torture, sometimes of apathetic vacancy, a series of epileptic fits ended in his death on October 19, 1745 He lies buried, with Stella, in his cathedral, and the Latin inscription written by himself still records that sava indignatio which is an undoubted psychological and historical fact, and which perhaps wisdom will join with charity in bidding us not too hastily to condemn as a moral fault. An intelligent passerby, like him who has secured immortality for himself in the case of Ben Jonson, might have added Addison's verdict forty years before-'The greatest genius of the nation

Of his character no adequate discussion, or even summary, is possible in a small space. To those who would reduce all human nature to a set of probable types, acting consciously in accordance with or deliberately against certain accepted moral rules and intellectual principles, it must always be an insoluble enigma or a shocking deformity and abnormality To those who like cheap and glaring antitheses it is an easy prey But those who are content to admit infinite diversity, plus in at least many cases not a little mystery, in human character, will find Swift not at all astounding except in his genius, and only incomprehensible as great things and persons usually are. It may, however, bepermitted to dissent from some high authorities who assert his entire sanity before the last breakdown In the discernment of right from wrong. and in the co-ordination of action to consequence, he was no doubt as sane as the sanest But the too famous 'coarseness' (for which coarseness itself is a word too fine) of his ideas and language has rather horribly suggestive analogies in some symptoms of insanity itself, and the suggestion is repeated in other traits of his character rate, one famous saying would not here be out, for of the greatness of the wits allied to this madness no one himself possessing wit however small can doubt

These wits were shown both in prose and in verse, but admirable as are some of Swift's verses, it cannot be said that those are wholly wrong who maintain that even the widest form of Dryden's alleged sentence, 'You will never be a poet,' Pindaric or other, was justified Not only does Swift never attain the finest, rarest, most charming strokes of poetry, but it can hardly be said that his very best things (with the possible exception of the 'Last Judgment,' where the light style of the medium and the tremendous gravity of the sense create the most mary ellously effective discord) gain very much from their poetic form Swift has made them capital in poetry, he could have made them as capital, though in a slightly different way, in it may be as well to note that during great part of his life he kept up a dropping fire of papers on religious or at least ecclesiastical and clerical By far the greatest result of his Irish campaigns was The Dramer's Letters (1724), which, enhemeral and casual as was their subject, are as pieces of literature almost if not quite the equal of his greatest work, and the Modest Proposal as to the Children of the Irish Poor (1729), which need not fear comparison with anything either of his own or another's In the Letters the protean variety of the attack, the astonishing verisimilitude (so interesting to compare with Defoe's different use of the same device) of the exposition, the cunning appeal (without any ostentatious 'writing down') to the vulgar understanding, combined with prodigies of irony and advocacy only to be appreciated by the keenest wits, are the main things to be noticed The Modest Proposal (to relieve the distress of Ireland doubly by the use of Irish children from twelve to eighteen months old as an article of food) is perhaps the capital example in little of Swift's thought, style, and general method of procedure Those (and there have been not a few) who are simply too much shocked and disgusted by the bare idea of it need hardly hope ever to understand him fully, and there is perhaps something of a counter danger in the possibility of exaggerating his humanity and his indignation at oppression, so as to obscure his artistic delight in the grave and orderly conduct of a monstrous and paradoxical proposition Between the Drapter (which is only 'Draper') and the Modest Proposal came Gulliver's Travels (1726), which is not only his most popular but also his most complete as well as most ambitious book. It is possible that in sheer clear intellectual power this book is not quite the equal of the Tale. but it has as much more variety as it has more art, and the stream flows distinctly from source to sea instead of first meandering in tangled reaches and then sinking in sands In the two earlier divisions -the accounts of Lilliput, where men's height is an inch for our foot, and of Brobdingnag, where it is a foot for our inch-the satire on humanity is comparatively good-humoured, the absurdity rather than the malignity of man is the thing chiefly insisted upon. In the third the attack on the pedants and 'projectors' of Laputa and Balmbarbi grows much more savage, while the appalling description of the Struldbrugs or decrepit immortals of Luggnagg shows us not only what Swift but too truly feared for himself, but one of his reasons for detesting humanity. Then in the fourth part, the description of the Houyhnhnms and Yahoos, the batteries are shifted, and it is no longer at the folly and feebleness of man but at his brutal and almost devilish corruption that they are levelled. Perhaps the picture, which Swift appears to hold up to contrasted admiration, of the Houyhnlinm character - sensible, orderly, prudent, but utterly without passion or enthusiasm of any kind—is more really depressing than even the baboon-like bestiality of his male and female Yahoos. As a whole, however, the book, with the possible exception of the Struldbrug passage, is much too amusing to depress at all. Dullness (especially German dullness) has picked out this and that reminiscence of or similarity to preceding work, especially that of Cyrano de Bergerac, but this is usual and negligible. There is no more original work of genius in literature than Gulliver's Travels

The only two pieces still requiring mention (of about a hundred credited to him) are Polite Conversation (1738) and the Directions to Servants, the latter not published except posthumously piece, though very amusing in parts, and a wonderful instance of that microscopic observation which had so much to do with Swift's success, is at best a little trivial, and at worst spoilt by the nastiness which is his greatest weakness But the Polite Conversation is perfectly charming Purporting to be the talk of a fashionable set in London during something like the double round of the clock, it not merely abounds with strokes of humour, not merely hits types and ways which exist very little changed to day, but clothes those types with dramatic individualities in a fashion never indulged in by Swift elsewhere. Even Lemuel Gulliver is but an eidolon compared with 'Miss' and Tom Neverout, Lady Smart and the Colonel Everywhere, or almost everywhere, else Swift's comedy turns, or seems constantly on the point of turning, either to the sternest tragedy or it least to acrimonious invective Here, keen as is the rapici and unerring as is the artist's fence, he never exactly takes off the button that keeps it a harmless foil

Yet if not the greatest, the most unique, the most charming, the most pathetic, the most varied in appeal of Swift's works remains to be mentioned, and that is what he never meant for a work at allthe Journal to Stella This consists of the budgets of diary-letters which he sent to his beloved and her companion (for this strange etiquette of the third person was kept up even here) during his momentous stay in London during the last years of the queen (2nd September 1710 to 6th June As vivid as Pepys, shot through and through by the light of an intellect beside which that of the good, or at least agreeable, Clerk of the Acts is a mere farthing candle, dealing with matters of the greatest historical and social interest publicly, and revealing in private one of the strangest tragi comedies in the great theatre of Love, diversified by the extraordinary 'little language' or baby jargon which Swift sprinkles here and there as a sort of caress to his correspondent, this wonderful book even by itself defies the existence of anything like a second to it But standing as it does between the Tale and Gulliver, it completes, as nothing else possibly could, the evidence of the greatness and the strangeness of its author's genius

What planter will attempt to yoke A sapling with a falling oak? As years increase, she brighter shines Cadenus with each dry declines And he must fall a prey to time, While she continues in her prime. Cadenus, common forms apart, In every scene had kept his heart, Had sigh'd and languish'd, you d and writ, For pastime, or to show his wit But books, and time, and state affairs Had spoil d his fashionable airs He now could praise, esteem, approve, But understood not what was love His conduct might have made him styl'd A fither, and the nymph his child That innocent delight he took To see the virgin mind her book, Was but the master's secret jou In school to hear the finest boy Her knowledge with her fancy grew, She hourly press'd for something new,

Ideas came into her mind

So fast, his lessons lagg d behind,

She reason'd, without plodding long, Nor ever gave her judgment wrong But now a sudden change was wronght She minds no longer what he taught. Cadenus was amaz'd to find Such marks of a distracted mind For though she seem'd to listen more To all he spoke than e'er before. He found her thoughts would absent range, Yet guess'd not whence could spring the change. And first he modestly conjectures His pupil might be tird with lectures. Which help'd to mortify his pride. Yet gave him not the heart to chide Bnt in a mild dejected strain. At last he ventur d to complain Said she should be no longer teaz'd. Might have her freedom when she pleas'd Was now convine'd he acted wrong To hide her from the world so long, And in dull studies to engage One of her tender sex and age That every nymph with envy own'd, How she might sline in the grande monde, And every shepherd was undone To see her closster d like a nun. This was a visionary scheme He wak'd, and found it but a dream, A project far above his skill. For nature must be nature still If he were bolder than became A scholar to a courtly dame, She might excuse a man of letters Thus tutors often treat their betters And, since his talk offensive grew, He came to take his last adieu.

Vanessa, fill'd with just disdain, Would still her dignity maintain, Instructed from her early years To scorn the art of female tears.

Had he employ'd his time so long To teach her what was right and wrong. Let could such notions entertain That all his lectures were in vain? She own'd the wandering of her thoughts, But he must answer for her faults. She well remember'd to her cost That all his lessons were not lost. Two maxims she could still produce, And sad experience taught their use, That virtue, pleas d by being shown, Knows nothing which it dares not own, Can make us without fear disclose Our inmost secrets to our foes That common forms were not design'd Directors to a noble mind Now, said the nymph, to let you see My actions with your rules agree, That I can vulgar forms despise, And have no secrets to disguise, I I new, by what you said and writ, How dangerous things were men of wit, You caution'd me against their charms, But never gave me equal arms, Your lessons found the weakest part, Aim'd at the head, but reach'd the heart. 61

Cadenus felt within him rise Shame, disappointment, guilt, surprise. He kney not how to reconcile Such language with her usual style And yet her words were so exprest, He could not hope she spoke in jest His thought had wholly been confin'd To form and cultivate her mind He hardly knew, till he was told. Whether the nymph were young or old. Had met her in a public place, Without distinguishing her face Much less could his declining age Vanessa's earliest thoughts engage, And, if her youth indifference met, His person must contempt beget Or grant her passion be sincere, How shall his innocence be clear? Appearances were all so strong. The world must think him in the wrong Would say he made a treacherous use Of wit to flatter and seduce The town would swear lie had betray'd By magic spells the harmless maid And every bean would have his jokes, That scholars were like other folks. And when Platonic flights were over, The tutor turn'd a mortal lover ' So tender of the young and fair! It show'd a true paternal care-Five thousand guineas in her purse l The doctor might have fancy'd worse -

Hardly at length he silence broke, And falter'd every word he spoke. Interpreting her complaisance, Just as a man sans consequence. She rallied well, he always knew Her manner now was something new, And what she spoke was in an air As serious as a tragic player But those who aim at ridicule Should fix upon some certain rule, Which fairly hints they are in jest, Else he must enter his protest For, let a man be ne er so wise. He may be caught with sober lies, A science which lie never taught, And, to be free, was dearly bought, For, take it in its proper light, 'Tis just what eoxcombs call a bite.

But, not to dwell on things minute, Vanessa finish'd the dispute, Brought weighty arguments to prove That reason was her guide in love. She thought he had himself describ'd. His doctrines when she first imbih d, What he had planted, now was grown. His virtues she might call her own, As he approves, as he dislikes, Love or contempt her fancy strikes Self tove in nature rooted fast Attends us first and leaves us last Why she likes him, admire not at her, She loves herself, and that's the matter How was her tutor wont to praise The geniuses of ancient days!

(Those authors he so oft had nam'd, For learning, wit, and wisdom fam'd,) Was struck with love, esteem, and awe, For persons whom he never saw Suppose Cadenus flourish'd then. He must adore such godlike men If one short volume could comprise All that was witty, learn d, and wise, How would it be esteem'd and read, Although the writer long were dead ! If such an author were alive, How all would for his friendship strive, And come in crowds to see his face ! And this she takes to be her case Cadenus answers every end, The book, the author, and the friend. The utmost her desires will reach, Is but to learn what he can teach His converse is a system fit Alone to fill up all her wit While every passion of her mind In him is cent'red and confin'd Love can with speech inspire a mute. And trught Vanessa to dispute This topic, never touch'd before, Display'd her eloquence the more Her knowledge, with such pains acquir'd, By this new passion grew inspired, Through this she made all objects pass, Which gave a tincture o'er the mass. As rivers, though they bend and twine, Still to the sea their course incline. Or, as philosophers who find Some favourite system to their mind, In every point to make it fit, Will force all nature to submit. Cadenus, who could ne'er suspect IIIs lessons would have such effect, Or be so artfully apply'd. Insensibly came on her side It was an unforeseen event. Things took a turn he never meant. Whoe'er excels in what we prize, Appears a hero in our eyes Each girl, when pleas'd with what is taught. Will have the teacher in her thought. When miss delights in her spinnet, A fiddler may a fortune get . A blockhead, with melodious voice, In boarding schools may have his choice, And oft the dancing master's art Climbs from the toe to touch the heart.

Could scarce oppose Vanessa's flame,

And, though her argaments were strong,

At least could hardly wish them wrong

Howe'er it came, he could not tell,

Preferr'd before a crowd of beaux !

So bright a nymph to come unsought!

Such wonder by his ment wrought!

'Tis ment must with her prevail!

He never knew her judgment fail

But sure she never talk'd so well

His pride began to interpose,

In learning let a nymph delight,

The pedant gets a mistress by 't

Cadenus, to his grief and shame,

She noted all she ever read! And had a most discerning head!

'Tis an old ninxim in the schools,
That flattery's the food of fools,
Yet now and then your men of wit
Will condescend to take a bit

So, when Cadenus could not hide, He chose to justify his pride, Construing the passion he had shown, Much to her praise, more to his own. Nature in him had ment plac'd, In her a most judicious taste. Love, lutherto a transient guest, Ne'er held possession of his breast. So long attending at the gate, Disdain'd to enter in so lite. Love why do we one passion call, When 'tis a compound of them all? Where hot and cold, where sharp and sweet, In all their emipages meet . Where pleasures mix'd with pains appear, Sorrow with joy, and hope with fear, Wherein his dignity and age Forbid Cadenus to engage But friendship, in its greatest height, A constant, rational delight, On virtue's basis fix'd to last, When love allurements long are past, Which gently warms, but cannot burn, He gladly offers in return, His want of passion will redeem With gratitude, respect, esteem With that devotion we bestow, When goddesses appear below

While thus Cadenus entertains Vanessa in exalted strains. The nymph in sober words entreats A truce with all sublime conceits For why such raptures, flights, and fancies, To her who durst not read romances? In lofty style to make replies, Which he had taught her to despise? But when her tutor will affect Devotion, duty, and respect, He fairly abdicates the throne The government is now her own, He has a forfeiture incurr'd, She vows to take him at his word, And hopes he will not think it strange, If both should now their stations change, The nymph will have her turn to be The tutor, und the papil, he Though she already can discern Her scholar is not apt to learn, Or wants capacity to reach The science she designs to teach, Wherein his genius was below The skill of every common beau, Who, though he cannot spell, is wise Enough to read a lady's eyes, And will each accidental glance Interpret for a kind advance But what success Vanessa met

But what success Vanessa met Is to the world a secret yet, Whether the nymph, to please her swain, Talks in a high romantic strain, Or whether he at last descends
To act with less seraphic ends,
Or, to compound the business, whether They temper love and books together,
Must never to mankind be told,
Nor shall the conscious Muse unfold

From 'Verses on the Death of Dr Swift'

As Rochefoucault his Maxius drew From nature, I believe them true They argue no corrupted mind In him, the fault is in mankind

This maxim more than all the rest
Is thought too base for human breast
'In all distresses of our friends
We first consult our private ends,
While nature kindly bent to ease us,
Points out some circumstance to please us 'If this perhaps your patience move, Let reason and experience prove.

We all behold with envious eyes Our equal raised above our size. Who would not at a crowded show Stand high himself, I eep others low? I love my friend as well as you. But why should he obstruct my view? Theu let me have the higher post. Suppose it but an inch at most If in a battle you should find One whom you love of all mankind, Had some heroic action done, A champion killed, or trophy won. Rather than thus be overtoon d. Would you not wish his laurels eropp'd? Dear lionest Ned is in the gout. Lies racked with pain, and you without How patiently you hear him groan! How glad the case is not your own!

What poet would not grieve to see His brother write as well as he? But, rather than they should excel, Would wish his rivals all in hell?

Her end when Emulation misses, She turns to Envy, stings, and hisses The strongest friendship yields to Pride, Unless the odds be on our side

Vain human kind I fantastie race I Thy various follies who can trace? Self love, ambition, envy, pride, Their empire in our liearts divide. Give others riches, power, and station, Tis all on me an usurpation. I have no title to aspire, I et, when you sink, I seem the higher In Pope I cannot read a line, But with a sigh I wish it mine When he can in one couplet fix More sense than I can do in six, It gives me such a jealous fit, I cry 'Pox take him and his wit' I greeve to be outdone by Gay In my own humorous biting way Arbuthnot is no more my friend, Who dares to irony pretend, Which I was born to introduce, Refined it first, and shewed its usc.

St Johu, as well as Pulteney, knows
That I had some repute for prose,
And, till they drove me out of date,
Could maul a minister of state
If they have mortified my pride,
And made me throw my pen aside.

Have I not reason to detest 'em'
To all my foes, dear Fortune, send Thy gifts, but never to my friend
I tamely can endure the first,
But this with envy makes me burst.

Thus much may serve by way of proem, Proceed we therefore to our poem.

If with such talents heaven hath blest 'em.

The time is not remote, when I Must by the course of nature die . When, I foresee, my special friends Will try to find their private ends Aud, though 'tis hardly understood, Which way my death can do them good, Yet thus, methinks, I hear them speak 'See, how the dean begins to break! Poor gentleman! he droops apace! You plainly find it in his face That old vertigo in his head Will never leave him till he's dead. Besides his memory decays He recollects not what he says. He cannot call his friends to mind, Forgets the place where last he dined. Plies you with stories o'er and o'er-He told them fifty times before How does he fancy we can sit To hear his out of fashion wit? But he takes up with younger folks. Who for his wine will bear his jokes. Faith, he must make his stories shorter, Or change his comrades once a quarter In half the time he talks them round. There must another set be found

'For poetry he's past his prime, He takes an hour to find a rhyme His fire is out, his wit decayed, His fancy sunk, his Muse a jade I'd have him throw away his pen—But there's no talking to some men'

And then their teuderness appears
By adding largely to my years
'He's older than he would be reekoned,
And well remembers Charles the Second
He hardly drinks a pint of wine,
And that, I doubt, is no good sign
His stomach, too, begins to ful,
Last year we thought him strong and hale,
But now he's quite another thing,
I wish he may hold out till spring'
They hug themselves and reason thus 'It is not yet so bad with us.'

In such a case they talk in tropes,
And by their fears express their hopes
Some great misfortune to portend
No enemy can match a friend
With all the lindness they profess,
The ment of a lucky guess (When daily How d've's come of course, And servants answer 'Worse and worse')

Would please them better than to tell,
That, 'God be prused' the dean is well'
Then he who prophesied the best,
Approves his foresight to the rest
'Yon know I always feared the worst,
And often told you so at first'
He'd ruther choose that I should die,
Than his prediction prove a lie.
Not one foretells I shall recover,
But all agree to give me over

Yet should some neighbour feel a pain Just in the parts where I complain, How many a message would he send! What hearty prayers that I should mend! Inquire what regimen I kept? What give me ease, and how I slept? And more lament when I was dead, Than all the snivellers round my bed.

My good companions, never fear, For, though you may mistake a year, Though your prognostics run too fast, they must be verified at last.

Behold the fatal day arrive!

How is the dean? 'He's just alive'

Now the departing prayer is read,

'He hardly breathes' 'The dean is dead'

Before the passing bell begun,
The news through half the town is run,
'Oh! may we all for death prepare!
What has he left? and who's his heir?'
'I know no more thin what the news is,
'Tis all bequeathed to public uses'
'To public uses! there's a whim!
What had the public done for him?
Mere envy, avariee, and pride
He gave it all—but first he died
And had the dean in all the nation
No worthy friend, no poor relation?
So ready to do strangers good,
Forgetting his own flesh and blood!'

Now Curll his shop from rubbish drains. Three genuine tomes of Swift's Remains! And then to make them pass the glibber, Revised by Tibbalds, Moore, and Cibber He'll treat me as he does my betters, Publish my will, my life, my letters, Revive the libels born to die, Which Pope must bear, as well as I

Here shift the scene, to represent
How those I love my death lament
Poor Pope will grieve a month, and Gay
A week, and Arbuthnot a day
St John himself will scarce forbear
To bite his pen, and drop a tear
The rest will give a shrug, and cry
'I'm sorry—but we all must die !

One year is past, a different scene!
As further mention of the dean,
Who now, alas! no more is missed,
Than if he never did exist.
Where's now this favourite of Apollo?
Departed and his works must follow,
Must undergo the common fate,
His kind of wit is out of date.

Some country squire to Lintot goes, A bookseller Inquires for Swift in verse and prose

Says Lintot 'I have heard the name, He died a year ago ' 'The same ' He searches all the shop in vain 'Sir, you may find them in Duck lane I sent them, with a load of books, Last Monday to the pastry cooks To fancy they could live a year! I find you're but a strunger here. The dean was famous in his time, And had a kind of kniek at rhyme His way of writing now is past, The town has got a better taste I keep no antiquated stuff, But spiek and span I have enough Pray, do but give me leave to shew 'em Here's Colley Cibber's birthdi poem, This ode you never yet have seen By Stephen Duck upon the quren Then here's a letter finely penned Against the Crastsman and his friend, It clearly shows that all reflection On ministers is disaffection Next, here's Sir Robert's vindication, And Mr Henley's last orition The hawkers have not got them yet, Your honour please to buy a set?'

Suppose me dead, and then suppose A club assembled at the Rose, Where, from discourse of this and that, I grow the subject of their chat. And while they toss my name about, With favour some, and some without, One, quite indifferent in the cause, My character impartial draws 'The dean, if we believe report, Was never ill received at conrt As for his works in verse and prose, I own myself no judge of those Nor can I tell what critics thought 'em, But this I know, all people bought 'em, As with a moral view designed To cure the vices of mankind, His vein, ironically grave, He shamed the fool, and lashed the knave. To steal a hint was never known, But what he writ was all his own

"He never thought an honour done him, Because a duke was proud to own him, Would rather slip aside, and choose To talk with wits in dirty shoes, Despis'd the fools with stars and garters, So often seen caressing Chartres He never courted men in station, Nor persons held in admiration, Of no man's greatness was afraid, Because he sought for no man's aid Though trusted long in great affairs, He gave himself no haughty airs Without regarding private ends, Spent all his credit for his friends And only chose the wise and good, No flatterers, no allies in blood But succour'd virtue in distress, And seldom fail'd of good success. As numbers in their hearts must own, Who, but for him, had been unknown

'With princes kept a due decorum. But never stood in twe before 'em He follow'd David's lesson just . In princes never put thy trust And would you make hmi truly sonr. Provoke him with a slave in power The Irish senate if you nam'd. With what impatience he declaim'd i Fair I iberty was all his cry. For her he stood prepar'd to die, For her he boldly stood alone. For her he oft expos'd his own Two kingdoms, just as faction led, Had set a price upon his head. But not a traitor could be found. To sell him for six hundred pound

'Had he but spar'd his tongue and pen, He might have rose like other men But power was never in his thought, And wealth he valu'd not a great Ingratitude he often found. And pitied those who meant the wound But kept the tenor of his mind. To ment well of human kind Nor made a sacrifice of those Who still were true, to please his foes He labour'd many a fruitless honr, To reconcile his friends in power, Saw mischief by a faction brewing. While they pursu d each other's ruin But finding your was all his care, He left the court in mere despair

By innocence and resolution, He bore continual persecution, While numbers to preferment rose, Whose merits were to be his foes, With even his own familiar friends, Intent upon their private ends, I ike renegadoes now he feels, Against hlm lifting up their heels

'The dean did by his pen defeat
An infamous destructive cheat,
Taught fools their interest how to know,
And gave them arms to ward the blow
Liny has own'd it was his doing,
To save that hapless land from ruin,
While they who at the steerage stood,
And reap'd the profit, sought his blood.

'In exile, with a steady heart, He spent his life's declining part, Where folly, pride, and faction sy ay, Remote from St John, Pope, and Gay His friendships there, to few confin d, Were always of the middling lind No fools of rank, a mongrel breed, Who fain would pass for lords indeed Where titles give no right, or power, And peerige is a wither d flower. He would have held it a disgrace, If such a wretch had I nown his face.

'Perhaps I may allow the dean Had too much satire in his vein, And seem'd determind not to starve it, Because no age could more deserve it Yet make never was his aim He hash d the vice, but spar d the name No individual could resent,
Where thousan is equally were meant,
His satire points at no defect,
But what all mortals may correct,
For he abhorr'd that senseless tribe
Who call it humour when they gibe
He spard a hump, or crooked nose,
Whose owners set not up for beaux
True genuine dulness mov'd his pity,
Unless it offer'd to be witty
Those who their ignorance confest,
He ne'er offended with a jest,
But laughed to hear an idiot quote
A verse from Horace learn'd by rote.

'He knew a hundred pleasing stories, With all the turns of Whigs and Tories Was cheerful to his dying day, And friends would let him have his way

'He gave the little wealth he had To build a house for fools and mad,
And show'd by one sature touch,
No nation wanted it so much.
That kingdom lie hath left his debtor,
I wish it soon may have a better'

Mrs Frances Harris's Petition, 1700

To their excellencies the Lords Justices of Ireland,
The humble petition of Frances Harris,
Who must starve and die a mind if it miscarries,
Humbly sheweth, that I went to warm myself in Lady Betty's chamber because I was cold,

And I had in a purse seven pounds, four shilling, and sixpence, besides farthings, in money and gold

So because I had been buying things for my lady last

I was resolv'd to tell my money, to see if it was right Now, you must know, because my trunk has a very bad lock.

Therefore all the money I have, which, God knows, is a very small stock.

I keep in my pocket, tied about my middle, next my smock.

So when I went to put up my purse, as God would have it, my smock was intripped

And instead of putting it into my pocket, down it slipp'd, Then the bell rung, and I went down to put my lady to bed.

And, God knows, I thought my money was as safe as my maidenhead

So, when I came up again, I found my pocket feel very light,

But when I searchd, and must d my purse, Lord' I thought I should have sunt outright.

'Lord' mindiam,' says Mart, 'how d ye do?'--'Indeed,' says I, 'never worse Hut pray Mary, can you tell what I have done with my purse?"

'Lord help me '' says Mary, 'I never stirr d ont of this place 1'

'Nay,' said I, 'I had it in Lady Betty's chamber, that's a plain case.'

So Mary got me to bed, and cover'd me up warm However, she stole away my garters, that I might do myself no harm

So I tumbled and toss'd all night, as you may very well think.

But hardly ever set my eyes together, or slept a wink. So I was a dream d, methonght, that I went and search'd the folks round,

And in a corner of Mrs Dukes's box, tied in a rag, the money was found

So next morning we told Whittle, and he fell a swearing Then my dame Wadger came, and she, you know, 15 thick of hearing

'Dame,' said I, as loud I could bawl, 'do von know what a loss I have had?'

'Nay,' said she, 'my Lord Colway's folks are all very

For my Lord Dromedary comes a Tnesday without fail' 'Pngh!' said I, 'but that's not the business that I ail'

Says Cary, says he, 'I have been a servant this five and twenty years, come spring,

And in all the places I liv'd I never heard of such a

'I es,' says the steward, 'I remember when I was at my Lady Shrewsbury's.

Such a thing as this happen'd, just about the time of gooseberries?

So I went to the party suspected, and I found her full of (Now, you must know, of all things in the world, I hate a thief ) However, I was resolv'd to bring the discourse slily about 'Mrs Dukes,' said I, 'here's an ugly accident has happen'd out 'Tis not that I value the money three skips of a louse,

But the thing I stand upon is the credit of the house. 'Tis true, seven pounds, four shillings, and sixpence makes a great hole in my wages Besides, as they say, service is no inheritance in these

Now, Mrs Dukes, you know, and every body understands, That though 'tis hard to judge, yet money can't go with out hands.' 'The devil take me!' said she (blessing herself,) 'if ever

So she roard like a bedlam, as though I had call d her all to naught So you know, what could I say to her any more? I c'en lest her, and came away as wise as I was before. Well, but then they would have had me gone to the cunning man ! 'No,' said I, 'tis the same thing, the Chaplain will be here anon'

So the Chaplun came in Now the servants say he is my sweetheart,

Because he s always in my chamber, and I always take his part

So, as the deval would have it, before I was aware, out I blunder d,

'Parsen' said I, 'can you cast a nativity, when a body's plunder'd?'

(Now you must know, he hates to be call'd Parson, like the deal!) 'Truly,' says he, 'Mrs Nab, it might become you to be more civil.

If your money be gone, as a learned Divine says, d'ye You are no text for my handling, so take that from

I was never taken for a Conjurer before, I'd have you to know?

'Lord' said I, 'don't be angry, I am sure I never thought you so,

You know I honour the cloth, I design to be a Parson's

I never took one in 10ur coat for a conjurer in all my life '

With that he twisted his girdle at me like a rope, as who 'Now you may go hang yourself for me!' and so went away Well I thought I should have swoon'd. 'Lord' said

I, 'what shall I do? I have lost my money, and shall lose my true love too " Then my lord call'd me 'Harry,' said my Lord, 'don't

I'll give you something toward thy loss ' 'And,' says my lady, 'so will I Oh ' but, said I, what if, after all, the Chaplain won't come to?

For that, he said (an't please your Excellencies), I must petition you.

The premises tenderly consider'd, I desire your Excel lencies protection.

And that I may have a share in next Sunday's collection, And, over and above, that I may have your Excellences letter.

With an order for the Chaplain aforesaid, or, instead of him, a better

And then your poor petitioner, both night and day, Or the chaplain (for 'tis his trade), as in duty bound, shall ever pray

Vanbrugh's House, built from the ruins of Whitehall that was burnt, 1703

In times of old, when Time was young, And poets their own verses sung, A verse would draw a stone or beam, That now would overload a team, Lead them a dance of many a mile, Then rear them to a goodly pile. Each number had its different power Heroic strains could build a tower. Sonnets, or elegies to Chloris, Might raise a house about two stories, A lync ode would slate, a catch Would tile, an epigram would thatch. But, to their own or landlord's cost, Now poets feel this art is lost. Not one of all our transful throng Can raise a lodging for a song For Jove consider'd well the case, Observ'd they grew a numerous ruce,

And should they build as fast as write,

Twonld ruin undertakers quite.

He wisely chang'd their element

This evil therefore to prevent,

On earth the God of Wealth was made Sole patron of the building trade, Leaving the wits the spacious air, With licence to build eastles there And 'tis conceiv'd, their old pretence To lodge in garrets comes from thence Premising thus, in modern way, The better half we have to say, Sing, Muse, the house of Poet Van, In higher strains than we began

Van (for 'tis fit the reader know it) Is both a herald and a poet, No wonder then if nicely skill'd In both capacities to build As herald, he can in a day Repair a house gone to decay, Or, by achievements, arms, device, Erect a new one in a trice. And as a poet, he has skill To build in speculation still 'Great Jove "he cry d, 'the art restore To build by verse as heretofore, And make my Muse the architect, What palaces shall we erect ' No longer shall forsaken Thames Lament his old Whitehall in flames, A pile shall from its ashes rise, Fit to invade or prop the skies

Jove smil'd, and like a gentle god, Consenting with the usual nod, Told Van, he knew his talent best, And left the choice to his own breast. So Van resolv'd to write a farce. But, well perceiving wit was scarce, With cunning that defect supplies Takes a French play as lawful prize, Steals thence his plot and every joke, Not once suspecting Jove would smoke, And (like a wag set down to write) Would whisper to himself, 'a bite' Then, from this motler mingled style, Proceeded to erect his pile. So men of old, to gain renown, did Build Babel with their tongues confounded. Jove saw the cheat, but thought it best To turn the matter to a jest Down from Olympus' top he slides, Laughing as if he'd burst his sides Ay, thought the god, are these your tricks? Why then old plays deserve old bricks, And since you're sparing of your stuff, Your building shall be small enough. He spale, and grudging, lent his aid, Th' experienc'd bricks, that knew their trade (As being bricks at second hand), Nov move, and now in order stand

The building, as the poet writ,
Rose in proportion to his wit
And first the prologue built a wall,
So wide as to encompass all.
The scene, a wood, produc'd no more Than a few scrubby trees before.
The plot as yet lay deep, and so
A cellar next was dug below
But this a work so hard was found,
Two acts it cost him under ground.

Two other acts, we may presume, Were spent in building each a room Thus far advanced, he made a shift To ruse a roof with act the fifth. The epilogue behind did frame A place not decent here to name Now poets from all quarters ran, To see the house of brother Van Lool 'd high and low, walk'd often round, But no such house was to be found. One asks the watermen hard by, 'Where may the poet's palace he?' Another of the Thames inquires, If he has seen its gilded spires? At length they in the rubbish spy A thing resembling a goose pye Thither in haste the poets throng, And gaze in silent wonder long Till one in raptures thus began To praise the pile and builder Van 'Thrice happy poet! who mayst trail Thy house about thee like a snail Or, harness d to a nag at ease Take journeys in it like a chaise, Or in a boat whene'er thou wilt, Canst make it serve thee for a tilt! Capacious house! 'tis own'd by all Thou'rt well contriv'd, though thou art small For every wit in Britain's isle May lodge within thy spacious pile Like Bacchus thou, as poets feign, Thy mother burnt, art born again, Born like a phænix from the flame But neither bulk nor sliape the same As animals of largest size Corrupt to maggots, worms, and flies; A type of modern wit and style, The rubbish of an ancient pile So chemists boast they have a power, From the dead ashes of a flower Some faint resemblance to produce, But not the virtue, taste, or juice. So modern rhymers wisely blast The poetry of ages past, Which, after they have overthrown, They from its ruins build their own

The Day of Judgment

With a whirl of thought oppress d, I snnk from reverie to rest A horrid vision seiz'd my bead, I saw the graves give up their dead! Jove, arm'd with terrors, bursts the skies, And thunder roars and lightning flies ! Amaz'd, confus'd, its fate unknown, The world stands trembling at his throne I While each pale sinner hung his head, Jove, nodding, shook the heavens, and said 'Offending race of human kind, By nature, reason, learning, blind, You who, through frailty, stepp'd aside, And you, who never fell from pride You who in different sects were shamm'd, And come to see each other damn'd (So some folk told you, but they knew No more of Jove's designs than you) —The world's mad business now is o'er, And I resent these pranks no more —I to such blockheads set my wit! I damn such fools '—Go, go, you're bit.'

The three extracts that follow are from the Tale of a Tub. The overpowering and overshadowing greatness of this book is believed to have sometimes produced an impression that Swift invented the title-phrase. This is of course quite wrong Ben Jonson had actually used it, as the title of his last play (1633), seventy years before. Nearly a hundred earlier (1538) it occurs in Bale, and is probably much older still, having, like all such alliterative popular sayings, no definitely ascertainable origin

The Epistle Dedicatory to His Royal Highness Prince Posterity

SIR,-I here present your highness with the fruits of a very few lessure hours, stolen from the short intervals of a world of business, and of an employment quite alien from such amusements as this, the poor production of that refuse of time which has lain heavy upon my hands during a long prorogation of parliament, a great dearth of foreign news, and a tedious fit of rainy weather for which and other reasons it cannot choose extremely to deserve such a patronage as that of your highness, whose numberless virtues, in so few years, make the world look upon you as the future example to all princes for although your highness is hardly got clear of infancy, yet has the universal learned world already resolved upon appealing to your future dictates, with the lowest and most resigned submission, fate having decreed you sole arbiter of the productions of human wit, in this polite and most accomplished age Methinks the number of appel lants were enough to shock and startle any judge, of a genius less unlimited than yours but in order to prevent such glorious trials, the person, it seems, to whose care the education of your highness is committed, has resolved (as I am told) to keep you in almost a universal ignorance of our studies, which it is your inherent birth right to inspect

It is amazing to me that this person should have the assurance, in the face of the sun, to go about persuading your highness that our age is almost wholly illiterate, and has hardly produced one writer upon any subject I know very well that when your highness shall come to riper years, and have gone through the learning of antiquity, you will be too curious to neglect inquiring into the authors of the very age before you and to think that this insolent, in the account he is preparing for your view, designs to reduce them to a number so insignificant is I am ashamed to mention, it moves my zeal and my spleen for the honour and interest of our vast flourishing body, as well as of myself, for whom, I know by long experience, he has professed and still continues a peculiar malice

It is not unlikely that, when your highness will one day peruse what I am now writing, you may be ready to expostulate with your governor upon the credit of what I here affirm, and command him to shew you some of our productions. To which he will answer (for I am well informed of his designs) by asking your highness, where they are? and what is become of them? and pretend it a demonstration that there never were any, hecause they

Not to be found! who has are not then to be found mislaid them? are they sunk in the abyss of things? it is certain, that in their own nature, they were light enough to swim upon the surface for all eternity Therefore the fault is in him, who tied weights so heavy to their heels as to depress them to the centre. Is their very essence destroyed? who has annihilated them? were they drowned by purges, or martyred by pipes? who administered them to the posteriors of ---- ? But, that it may no longer be a doubt with your highness who is to be the author of this universal ruin, I beseech you to observe that large and terrible scythe which your governor affects to bear continually about him Be pleased to remark the length and strength, the sharpness and hardness of his nails and tceth consider his baneful, abominable breath, enemy to life and matter, infectious and corrupting and then reflect, whether it be possible for any mortal ink and paper of this generation to make a suitable resistance. O' that your highness would one day resolve to disarm this usurping maitre du palais of his furious engines, and bring your empire hors de page

It were needless to recount the several methods of tyranny and destruction which your governor is pleased to practise upon this occasion. His inveterate malice is such to the writings of our age, that of several thousands produced yearly from this renowned city, before the next revolution of the sun there is not one to be heard of unhappy infants! many of them barbarously destroyed, before they have so much as learnt their mother tongue to beg for pity. Some he stifles in their cradles, others he frights into convulsions, whereof they suddenly die some he flays alive, others he tears limb from limb. Great numbers are offered to Moloch, and the rest, tainted by his breath, die of a languishing consumption

But the concern I have most at heart, is for our corporation of poets, from whom I am preparing a petition to your highness, to be subscribed with the names of one hundred thirty six of the first rate, but whose immortal productions are never likely to reach your eyes, though each of them is now an hamble and an earnest appellant for the laurel, and has large comely volumes ready to shew for a support to his pretensions. The never-dying works of these illustrious persons, your governor, sir, has devoted to unavoidable death, and your highness is to be made believe, that our age has never arrived at the honour to produce one single poet.

We confess Immortality to be a great and powerful goddess, but in vain we offer up to her our devotions and our sacrifices, if your highness's governor, who has usurped the priesthood, must, by an unparalleled ambition and avariee, wholly intercept and devour them

To affirm that our age is altogether unlearned and devoid of writers in any kind, seems to he an assertion so bold and so false that I have been some time thinking the contrary may almost be proved by uncontrollable demonstration. It is true, indeed, that although their numbers be vast, and their productions numerous in proportion, yet are they hurried so hastily off the scene, that they escape our memory and elude our sight. When I first thought of this address, I had prepared a copious list of titles to present your highness, as an undisputed argument for what I affirm. The originals were posted fresh upon all gates and corners of streets, but, returning in a very few hours to take a review, they were all torn down, and fresh ones in their places. I enquired after them among readers and booksellers, but I enquired in vain, the memorial of them was lost among men, their place was no more to be found and I was laughed to scorn for a clown and a pedant, without all taste and refine ment, little versed in the course of present affairs, and that knew nothing of what had passed in the best companies of court and town. So that I can only avow in general to your highness that we do abound in learning and wit, but to fix upon particulars is a task too slippery day to affirm to your highness that there is a large cloud near the horizon, in the form of a bear, another in the zenith, with the head of an ass, a third to the westward. with claws like a dragon, and your highness should in a few minutes think fit to examine the truth, it is certain they would all be changed in figure and position, new ones would arise, and all we could agree upon would be, that clouds there were, but that I was grossly mistaken in the zoography and topography of them

But your governor perhaps may still insist, and put the question, What is then become of these immense bales of paper which must needs have been employed in such numbers of books? can these also be wholly annihilate, and so of a sudden, as I pretend? What shall I say in return of so invidious an objection? It ill befits the distance between your highness and me, to send you for ocular conviction to a jakes, or an oven, to the windows of a bawdy house, or to a sordid lantern. Books, like men their authors, have no more than one way of coming into the world, but there are ten thousand to go out of it, and return no more.

I profess to your highness, in the integrity of my heart. that what I am going to say is literally true this minute I am writing what revolutions may happen before it shall be ready for your perusal, I can by no means warrant however, I beg you to accept it as a specimen of our learning, our politeness, and our wit I do there fore affirm, upon the word of a sincere man, that there is now actually in being a certain poet, called John Dryden, whose translation of Virgil was lately printed in a large folio, well bound, and, if diligent search were made, for aught I know, is yet to be seen There is another, called Nahum Tate, who is ready to make oath that he has caused many reams of verse to be published, whereof both himself and his bookseller (if lawfully required) can still produce authentic copies, and therefore wonders why the world is pleased to make such a secret of it. There is a third, known by the name of Tom Durfey, a poet of a vast comprehension, a universal genius, and most pro-There are also one Mr Rymcr, and one found learning Mr Dennis, most profound critics There is a person styled Dr Bentley, who has written near a thousand pages of immense erudition, giving a full and true account of a certain squabble, of wonderful importance, between him self and a bookseller he is a writer of infinite wit and humour, no man rallies with a better grace, and in more with these eyes I have beheld the person of William Wotton, B.D., who has written a good sizeable volume against a friend of your governor (from whom, alas! he must therefore look for little favour), in a most gentle manly style, adorned with the utmost politeness and civility, replete with discoveries equally valuable for their novelty and use, and embellished with traits of wit so poignant and so apposite that he is a worthy yoke mate to his forementioned friend

fill a volume with the just eulogies of my contemporary brethren? I shall bequeath this piece of justice to a larger work, wherein I intend to write a character of the present set of wits in our nation—their persons I shall describe particularly and at length, their genius and understandings in miniature

In the meantime, I do here make bold to present your highness with a faithful abstract drawn from the universal body of all arts and sciences, intended wholly for your service and instruction nor do I donbt in the least but your highness will peruse it as earefully and make as considerable improvements as other young princes have already done by the many volumes of late years written for a help to their studies

That your highness may advance in wisdom and virtue, as well as years, and at last ontshine all your royal ancestors, shall be the daily prayer of, Sir, your highness's most devoted, &c.

Clothes-religion and Clothes-philosophy

Abont this time it happened a sect arose whose tenets obtained and spread very far, especially in the grand monde, and among everybody of good fashion. They worshipped a sort of idol, who, as their doctrine delivered, did daily create men by a kind of manufactory operation. This idol they placed in the highest part of the house, on an altar erected about three foot, he was shown in the posture of a Persian emperor, sitting on a superficies, with his legs interwoven under him. This god had a goose for his ensign, whence it is that some learned men preteud to deduce his original from Jupiter Capitolinus.

The worshippers of this deity had also a system of their belief, which seemed to turn upon the following fundamentals They held the universe to be a large suit of clothes, which invests everything, that the earth is invested by the air, the air is invested by the stars, and the stars are invested by the primum mobile. Look on this globe of earth, you will find it to be a very complete and fashionable dress. What is that which some call land but a fine coat faced with green? or the sea, but a waistcoat of water tabby? Proceed to the particular works of the creation, you will find how curious a jonrneyman Nature has been to trim up the vegetable beaux, observe how sparkish a periwig adorns the head of a beech, and what a fine doublet of white satin is worn To conclude from all, what is man himself by the birch but a micro coat, or rather a complete suit of clothes with all its trimmings? As to his body there can be no dispute, but examine even the acquirements of his mind, you will find them all contribute in their order towards furnishing out an exact dress. To instance no more, is not religion a cloak, honesty a pair of shoes worn out in the dirt, self love a surtout, vanity a shirt, and conscience a pair of breeches?

Characteristics of Modern Critics

I shall conclude with three maxims, which may serve both as characteristics to distinguish a true modern critic from a pretender, and will be also of admirable use to those worthy spirits who engage in so useful and honour able an art. The first is, that criticism, contrary to all other faculties of the intellect, is ever held the truest and best when it is the very first result of the critic's mind, as fowlers reckon the first aim for the surest, and seldom fail of missing the mark if they stay for a second Secondly, the true critics are known by their talent of swarming about the noblest writers, to which they are carried merely by instinct, as a rat to the best choese, or as a wasp to the fairest fruit. So when the king is on horseback, he is sure to be the dirtiest person of the company, and they that make their coart best are such as bespatter him most. Lastly, a true critic, in the perusal of a book, is like a dog at a feast, whose thoughts and stomach are wholly set upon what the guests fling away, and consequently is apt to snarl most when there are the fewest bones.

A Meditation upon a Broomstick.

This single stick, which you now behold ingloriously lying in that neglected corner, I once knew in a flourish iag state in a forest, it was full of sap, full of leaves, and full of boughs, bat now in vain does the busy art of man pretend to vie with nature, by tying that withered hundle of twigs to its sapless trunk, it is now at best but the reverse of what it was, a tree turned upside down, the brunches on the earth, and the root in the air, it is now handled by every dirty wench, condemned to do her drudgery, and, hy a capricious kind of fate, destined to make her things clean, and be nasty itself, at length, worn out to the stumps in the service of the maids, it is either thrown out of doors, or condemned to the last use of kindling a When I beheld this I sighed, and said within Surely man is a broomstick! nature sent him into the world strong and lusty, in a thriving condition, wearing his own hair on his head, the proper branches of this reasoning vegetable, until the axe of intemperance has lopped off his green boughs, and left him a withered trunk, he then flies to art, and puts on a periwig, valuing himself upon an unnatural bandle of hairs (all covered with powder) that never grew on his head, but now should thus our broomstick pretend to enter the seene, proud of those birehen spoils it never bore, and all covered with dust, though the sweepings of the finest lady's chamber, we should be apt to ridicule and de spise Its vanity Partial judges that we are of our own excellences, and other men's defaults!

But a broomstick, perhaps you will say, is an emblem of a tree standing on its head, and pray, what is man but a topsy turvy creature, his animal faculties perpetually mounted on his rational, his head where his heels should be, grovelling on the earth! and yet, with all his faults, he sets up to be a universal reformer and corrector of abuses, a remover of grievances, rakes into every slut's corner of nature, bringing hidden corruptions to the light, and raises a mighty dust where there was none before, sharing deeply all the while in the very same pollutions he pretends to sweep away. His last days are spent in slavery to women, and generally the least deserving, till, worn to the stumps, like his brother besom, he is either kicked out of doors, or made use of to kindle flames for others to warm themselves by

Inconveniences likely to attend the Abolition of Christianity

I am very sensible how much the gentlemen of wit and pleasure are apt to murmin and be shocked at the sight of so many daggled tail parsons, who happen to fall in their way and offend their eyes, but at the same time, those wise reformers do not consider what an advantage and felicity it is for great wits to be always provided with objects of scorn and contempt, in order to exercise and improve their talents, and divert their spleen from falling on each other, or on themselves, especially when all this may be done without the least imaginable danger to their persons And to urge another argument of a parallel nature if Christianity were once abolished, how could the freethinkers, the strong reasoners, and the men of profound learning be able to find another subject so calculated in all points whereon to display their abilities? What wonderful productions of wit should we be deprived of from those whose genius, by continual practice, hath been wholly turned upon raillery and invectives against religion, and would, therefore, be never able to shine or distinguish themselves on any other subject! We are daily complaining of the great decline of wit among us, and would we take away the greatest, perhaps the only topic we have left? Who would ever have suspected Asgill for a wit, or Toland for a philosopher, if the ia exhaustible stock of Christianity had not been at hand to provide them with materials? What other subject through all art or nature could have produced Tindal for a profound author, or furnished him with readers? It is the wise choice of the subject that alone adorns and distinguishes the writer. For had a hundred such pens as hese been employed on the side of religion, they would immediately have sunk into silence and oblivion

Nor do I think it wholly groundless, or my fears altogether imaginary, that the abolishing of Christianity may perhaps bring the church in danger, or at least put the senate to the trouble of another securing vote. I desire I may not be misunderstood, I am far from pre suming to affirm or think that the church is in danger at present, or as things now stand, but we know not how soon it may be so, when the Christian religion is repealed As plausible as this project seems, there may be a dangerous design lurking under it. Nothing can be more notorious than that the atheists, deists, Socinians, anti trinitarians, and other subdivisions of freethinkers, are persons of little zeal for the present eeclesiastical establish ment. Their declared opinion is for repealing the sacra mental test, they are very indifferent with regard to ceremonies, nor do they hold the jus divinum of episco Therefore this may be intended as one politic step towards altering the constitution of the church established, and setting up preshytery in its stead, which I leave to be further considered by those at the helm

And therefore if, notwithstanding all I have said, it shall still be thought necessary to have a hill brought in for repealing Christianity, I would himbly offer an amendment, that, instead of the word Christianity, may be put religion in general, which I conceive will much hetter answer all the good ends proposed by the projectors of it. For as long as we leave in being a God and his Providence, with all the necessary consequences which curious and inquisitive men will be apt to draw from such premises, we do not strike at the root of the evil, although we should ever so effectually annihilate the present scheme of the Gospel. For of what use is freedom of thought, if it will not produce freedom of action? which is the sole end, how remote soever in appearance, of all objections against Christianity therefore the freethinkers consider it a sort of edifice, wherein all the parts have such a mutual dependence on each other, that if you happen to pull out one single nail, the whole fahrie must fall to the ground

The Spider and the Bee

Things were at this crisis, when a material accident fell out. For, upon the highest corner of a large window there dv elt a certain spider, swollen up to the first mag nitude by the destruction of infinite numbers of flies. r hose spoils lay scattered before the gates of his palace, like human bones before the cave of some giant. The avenues to his castle were guarded with turnpikes and palisadoes, all after the modern way of fortification After you had passed several courts you came to the centre, wherein you might behold the constable himself in his own lodgings, which had windows fronting to each avenne, and ports to sally out, upon all occasions of prev or defence. In this mansion he had for some time dwelt in peace and plenty, without danger to his person, by swallows from above, or to his palace, by brooms from below, when it was the pleasure of fortune to conduct thither a wandering bee, to whose curiosity a broken pane in the glass had discovered itself, and in he went. where expatiating a while, he at last happened to alight upon one of the ontward walls of the spider's citadel. which, yielding to the unequal weight, sunk down to the very foundation. Thrice he endeavoured to force his passage, and thrice the centre shook. The spider within, feeling the terrible convulsion, supposed at first that nature was approaching to her final dissolution, or else that Beelzebub with all his legions was come to revente the death of many thousands of his subjects, whom his enemy had slain and devoured. However, he at length valiantly resolved to issue forth and meet his fate. Meanwhile the bee had acquitted himself of his toils. and, posted securely at some distance, was employed in cleansing his vangs, and disengaging them from the ragged remnants of the cobweb By this time the spider was adventured ont, when, beholding the chasms, the ruins, and dilapidations of his fortress, he was very near at his wit's end, he stormed and swore like a madman, and swelled till he was ready to burst length, casting his eye npon the bee, and wisely gather ing causes from events (for they knew each other by sight), A plague split you, said he, for a giddy son of a whore, is it you, with a vengeance, that have made this litter here? could not you look before you, and be d-n'd' do you think I have nothing else to do (in the devil's name) but to mend and repair after your arse? Good words, friend, said the bee (having now pruned himself, and being disposed to droll), I'll give you my hand and word to come near your kennel no more, I was never in such a confounded pickle since I was born Sirrah, replied the spider, if it were not for breaking an old custom in our family, never to stir abroad against an enemy, I should come and teach you better manners. I pray have patience, said the bee, or you'll spend your substance, and, for aught I see, yon may stand in need of it all, toward the repair of your house Rogue, rogue, replied the spider, yet methinks you should have more respect to a person, whom all the world allows to be so much your betters. By my troth, said the bee, the comparison will amount to a very good jest, and you will do me a favour to let me know the reasons that all the world is pleased to use in so hopeful a dispute At this the spider, having swelled himself into the size and posture of a disputant, began his argument in the true spirit of controversy, with resolution to be heartily scurrilous and angry, to urge on his own reasons without the least regard to the answers or objections of his opposite, and fully predetermined in his mind against all conviction

Not to disparage myself, said he, by the comparison with such a rascal, what art thou but a vagabond with out house or home, without stock or inheritance? born to no possession of your own, but a pair of wings and a drone pipe. Your livelihood is a universal plunder upon nature, a freebooter over fields and gardens, and, for the sake of stealing will rob a nettle as easily as a violet. Whereas I am a domestic animal, furnished with a native stock within myself. This large castle (to show my improvements in the mathematics) is all built with my own hands, and the materials extracted altogether ont of my own person

I am glad, answered the bee, to hear you grant. at least that I am come honestly by my wings and my voice, for then, it seems, I am obliged to Heaven alone for my flights and my music, and Providence would never have bestowed on me two such gifts without designing them for the noblest ends. I visit indeed all the flowers and blossoms of the field and garden. but whatever I collect thence enriches myself, without the least injury to their beauty, their smell, or their taste. Now, for you and your skill in architecture, and other mathematics, I have little to say building of yours there might, for aught I know, havebeen labour and method enough, but by woeful expemence for us both, it is plain the materials are naught a and I hope you will henceforth take warning and con sider duration and matter, as well as method and art. You boast indeed of being obliged to no other creature, but of drawing and spinning out all from yourself : that is to say, if we may judge of the liquor in the vessel by what issues out, you possess a good plentiful store of dirt and poison in your breast, and though I would by no means lessen or disparage your genuine stock of either, yet I doubt you are somewhat obliged, for an increase of both, to a little foreign assistance. Your inherent portion of dirt does not fail of acquisitions by sweepings exhaled from below, and one insect formishes you with a share of poison to destroy another So that in short the question comes all to this, whether is the nobler being of the two, that which by a lazy contemplation of four inclies round, by an overweening pride, feeding and engendering on itself, turns all intoexcrement and venom, producing nothing at all but flybane and a cobweb, or that which hy a universal range, with long search, much study, true indigment, and distinction of things, brings home honey and wax.

This dispute was managed with such eagerness, clamour, and warmth, that the two parties of books, in arms below, stood silent a while, waiting in suspense what would be the issue, which was not long undetermined for the bee, grown impatient at so much loss of time, fled straight away to a bed of roses, without looking for a reply, and left the spider, like an orator, collected in himself, and just prepared to burst out.

Refinement of Style

The following letter has laid before me many great and manifest evils in the world of letters, which I had overlooked, but it opens to me a very busy scene, and it will require no small care and application to amend errors, which are become so universal. The affectation of politeness is exposed in this epistle with a great deal of wit and discernment, so that, what ever discourses I may fall into hereafter upon the subject the writer treats of, I shall at present lay the matter before the world without the least alteration from the words of my correspondent.

To Isaac Bickerstaff, Esq

SIR,-There are some abuses among us of great con sequence, the reformation of which is properly your province, although, as far as I have been conversant in your papers, you have not yet considered them These are, the deplorable ignorance that for some years had reigned among our English writers, the great de pravity of our taste, and the continual corruption of I say nothing here of those who handle particular sciences, divinity, law, physic, and the like, I mean the traders in history and politics and the belles lettres, together with those by whom books are not translated, but (as the common expressions are) done out of French, Latin, or other languages, and made English I cannot but observe to you that until of late years a Grub street book was always bound in sheepskin, with suitable print and paper, the price never above a shilling, and taken off wholly by common tradesmen or country pedlars, but now they appear in all sizes and shapes and in all places they are handed about from lapfuls in every coffeehouse to persons of quality, are shown in Westminster hall and the Court of Requests, you may see them gilt, and in royal paper, of five or six hundred pages, and rated accordingly I would engage to furnish you with a catalogue of English books, published within the com pass of seven years past, which at the first hand would cost you a hundred pounds, wherein you shall not be able to find ten lines together of common grammar or eommon sense

These two evils, ignorance and want of taste, have produced a third, I mean the continual corruption of our English tongue, which without some timely remedy will suffer more by the false refinements of twenty years past than it has been improved in the foregoing hundred. And this is what I design chiefly to enlarge upon, leaving the former evils to your animadversion

But instead of giving you i list of the late refine ments crept into our language, I here send you a copy of a letter I received some time ago from a most accomplished person in this way of writing, upon which I shall make some remarks. It is in these terms

'SIR,-I cou'dn't get the things you sent for all about town -I tho't to ha' come down myself, and then I'd ha' bro't nm, bnt ha'nt don't, and I believe I can't do't, that's pozz.--Tom begins to g'imself airs, because he's going with the plenipo's - 'Tis said the French king will bamboozle us agen, which causes many specu The Jacks, and others of that kidney, are verry uppish and alert upon't, as you may see by their phizz's -- Will Hazard has got the hipps, having lost to the tine of five hindr'd pound, tho' he under stands play very well, nobody better He has promis't me upon rep to leave off play, but you know 'tis a weakness he's too apt to give into, tho' lie has as much wit as any man, nobody more he has lain incog ever since.-The mobb's very quiet with us now -I helieve you tho't I banter'd you in my last like a country put.-I shan't leave town this month, &c.'

This letter is, in every point, an admirable pattern of the present polite way of writing, nor is it of less authority for being an epistle you may gather every flower of it, with a thousand more of equal sweetness, from the books, pamphlets, and single papers offered us every day in the coffee houses. And these are the beauties introduced to supply the want of wit, sense, humour, and learning, which formerly were looked upon as qualifications for a writer. If a man of wit who died forty years ago were to rise from the grave on purpose, how would he be able to read this letter? and after he had gone through that difficulty, how would he be able to understand it? The first thing that strikes your eye is the breaks at the end of almost every sentence, of which I know not the use, only that it is a refinement, and very frequently practised. Then you will observe the abbreviations and elisions, by which consonants of most obdurate sounds are joined together without one softening vowel to intervene and all this only to make one syllable of two, directly contrary to the example of the Greeks and Romans altogether of the Gothie strain, and of a natural fen dency towards relapsing into barbarity, which delights in monosyllables, and uniting of mute consonants, as it is observable in all the northern languages. And this is still more visible in the next refinement, which consists in pronouncing the first syllable in a word that has many, and dismissing the rest, such as phize, hipps, mobb, posz, rep, and many more, when we are already overloaded with monosyllables, which are the disgrace of our language. Thus we crum one syllable, and cut off the rest, as the owl fattened her mice after she had bit off their legs, to prevent them from running away, and if ours be the same reason for maiming words, it will certainly answer the end, for I am sure no other nation will desire to borrow them words are lutherto but fairly split, and therefore only in their way to perfection, as ineog and plenipo, but in a short time, it is to be hoped, they will be farther docked to me and plen. This reflection has made me of late years very impatient for a peace, which I believe would save the lives of many brave words as well as The war has introduced abundance of poly syllables, which will never be able to live many more campaigns. Speculations, operations, preliminaries, and ba. sadors, palisadoes, communications, circumvallations, battalions, as numerous as they are, if they attack us too frequently in our coffeehouses, we shall certainly put them to flight, and cut off the rear

The third refinement observable in the letter I send you consists in the choice of certain words invented by some pretty fellows, such as banter, bamboozle, country put, and kidney, as it is there applied, some of which are now struggling for the vogue, and others are in possession of it. I have done my utmost for some years past to stop the progress of mob and banter, but have been plainly borne down by numbers, and betrayed by those who promised to assist me

In the last place, you are to take notice of certain choice phrases scattered through the letter, some of them tolerable enough, till they were worn to rags by servile imitators. You might easily find them, although they were not in a different print, and therefore I need not disturb them.

These are the false refinements in our style, which you ought to correct first, by arguments and fair means, but if those fail, I think you are to make use of your anthority as censor, and by an annual index expurgatorius expunge all words and phrases that are offensive to good sense, and condemn those barbarous mutilations of vowels and syllables In this last point the usual pretence is, that they spell as they speak standard for language' to depend upon the caprice of every coxcomb, who, because words are the clothing of our thoughts, cuts them out, and shapes them as he pleases, and changes them oftener than his dress I believe all reasonable people would be content that such refiners were more sparing of their words and liberal in their syllables. On this head I should be glad you would bestow some advice upon several young readers in our churches, who, coming up from the uni versity full fraught with admiration of our town polite ness, will needs correct the style of our prayerbooks In reading the absolution, they are very careful to say 'Pardons and absolves,' and in the prayer for the royal family it must be endue'um, enrich'um, prosper'um, and bring'um, then in their sermons they use all the modern terms of art, sham, banter, mob, bubble, bully, cutting, shuffling, and palming, all which, and many more of the like stamp, as I have heard them often in the pulpit from some young sophisters, so I have read them in some of those sermons that have made a great noise of late. The design, it seems, is to avoid the dreadful imputation of pedantry, to show us that they know the town, understand men and manners, and have not been poring upon old unfashionable books in the unit ersity

I should be glad to see you the instrument of introducing into our style that simplicity which is the best and truest ornament of most things in human life, which the politer ages always aimed at in their building and dress (simplex munditus) as well as their productions It is manifest that all new affected modes of speech, whether borrowed from the court, the town, or the theatre, are the first perishing parts in any language, and, as I could prove by many hundred instances, have been so in ours The writings of Hooker, who was a country clergyman, and of Parsons the Jesuit, both in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, are in a style that, with very few allowances, would not offend any present reader, much more elear and in telligible than those of Sir Henry Wotton, Sir Robert Naunton, Osborn, Daniel the Instorian, and several others who writ later, but being men of the court, and affecting the phrases then in fashion, they are often either not to be understood, or appear perfectly

What remedies are to be applied to these evils I have not room to consider, having, I fear, already taken up most of your paper besides, I think it is our office only to represent abuses, and yours to redress them—I am, with great respect, Sir, yours, &c.

Diversions of the Court of Lilliput

The emperor had a mind one day to entertain me with several of the country shows, wherein they exceed all nations I have known, both for dexterity and mag nificence. I vas diverted with none so much as that of the rope-dancers, performed with a slender white thread extended about two feet, and twelve niches from the ground. Upon which I shall desire liberty, with the reader's patience, to enlarge a little

This diversion is only practised by those persons who are candidates for great employments and high favour at court. They are trained in this art from their wouth, and are not always of noble birth or liberal education. When a great office is vacant, either by death or disgrace (which often happens), five or six of those candidates petition the emperor to entertain his majesty and the court with a dance on the rope, and whoever jumps the highest, without falling, succeeds in the office. Very often the chief ministers them selves are commanded to shew their skill, and to con vince the emperor that they have not lost their faculty Flimnap, the treasurer, is allowed to cut a caper on the straight rope at least an inch higher than any other lord in the whole empire. I have seen him do the summerset several times together upon a trencher fixed on a rope which is no thicker than a common pack My friend Reldresal, principal thread in England secretary for private affairs, is, in my opinion, if I am not partial, the second after the treasurer, the rest of the great officers are much upon a par

These diversions are often attended with fatal accidents, whereof great numbers are on record. I myself have seen two or three candidates break a limb. But the danger is much greater when the ministers them selves are commanded to shew their dexterity, for, by contending to excel themselves and their fellows, they strain so far that there is hardly one of them who has not received a fall, and some of them two or three. I was assured that, a year or two before my arrival, Flimnap would infallibly have broke his neck if one of the king's cushions that accidentally lay on the ground had not weakened the force of his fall.

There is likewise another diversion, which is only shewn before the emperor and empress and first minister, upon particular occasions. The emperor lays on the table three fine silken threads, of six inches long, one is blue, the other red, and the third green threads are proposed as prizes for those persons whom the emperor has a mind to distinguish by a peculiar mark of his favour The eeremony is performed in his majesty's great chamber of state, where the candidates are to undergo a trial of dexterity, very different from the former, and such as I have not observed the least resemblance of in any other country of the new or old world. The emperor holds a stick in his hands, both ends parallel to the horizon, while the candidates, advancing one by one, sometimes leap over the stick, sometimes creep under it, backward and forward, several times, according as the stick is advanced or depressed Sometimes the emperor holds one end of the stick, and his first minister the other, sometimes the minister has it entirely to himself. Whoever performs his part with most agility, and holds out the longest in leaping and creeping, is rewarded with the blue coloured silk, the red is given to the next, and the green to the third, which they all wear girt twice round about the middle, and you see few great persons about this court who are not adorned with one of these girdles

(From Gullever's Travels)

The Treasurer was doubtless Sir Robert Walpole, then Prime Minister dismissed in 1717 through the intrigues of Sunderland and Stanhope. The cushion was prohably Sir Robert's interest with the Duchess of Kendal, the mistress of George I. Walpole held both the orders of the Garter and the Bath. here ridiculed.

The Projectors in the Academy of Lagado

I was received very kindly by the warden, and went for many days to the reademy. I very room has in it one or more projectors, and I believe I could not be in fewer than five hundred rooms.

The first man I saw was of a meagre aspect, with sooty hands and face, his hair and beard long ragged, and singed in several places. His clothes, shirt, and skin were all of the same colour. He had been eight years upon a project for extracting sunbeams out of cucumbers, which were to be put into phials hermetically scaled, and let out to warm the air in raw inclement He told me he did not doubt in eight years more that he should be able to supply the governor's gardens with sunshine at a reasonable rate, but he complained that his stock was low, and entreated me 'to give him something as an encouragement to in genuity, especially since this had been a very dear season for cucumbers' I made him a small present, for my lord had furnished me with money on purpose, because he knew their practice of begging from all who go to see them

I saw another at work to calcine see into gunpowder, who likewise showed me a treatise he had written con eerning the malleability of fire, which he intended to publish

There was a most ingenious architect, who had contrived a new method for building houses, by beginning at the roof, and working downwards to the foundation, which he justified to me by the lile practice of those two prudent insects, the becaude the spider

There was an astronomer who had undertaken to place a sun-dial upon the great weather each on the town house, by adjusting the annual and diurnal motions of the earth and sun, so as to answer and coincide with all accidental turnings of the wind.

We crossed a walk to the other part of the reademy, where, as I have already said, the projectors in speculative learning resided

The first professor I saw was in a very large room, with forty pupils about him. After salutation, observing me to look earnestly upon a frame which tool up the greatest part of both the length and breadth of the roca, he said, perhaps I might wonder to see him emr oved in a project for improving speculative know alge by practical and mechanical operations But the world would soon be sensible of its usefulness, and he flattered lumself that a more noble, exalted thought rever spring in any other man's head. Every one knew now laborious the usual method is of nttaining to art and sciences, whereas by his contribunce, the most gnorus, person, at a reasonable charge, and with a little 'wdily labour, may write books in philosophy, poetry, politics law, mathematics, and theology, without the least assistance from genius or study. He then led ne to the frame, about the sides whereof all his pupils stood in ranks It was thenty feet square, placed in the middle of the room The superficies was composed of several bits of wood, about the bigness of a Jie, but some larger than others They were nll linled together by slender wires These bus of wood were covered on every square with paper pasted on them, and on these papers were written all the words of their language in their several moods, tenses, and decrensions, but without any order The professor then desired me to observe, for he was going to set his engine at work

The pupils, at his erminand, tool each of them hold of an iron handle, whereof there were forty fixed round the edges of the frame, and giving them a salden turn the whole disposition of the words was entirely changed He then commanded six and thirty of the lade to read the several lines softly as they appeared upon the frame, and where they found three or four v ords together that might make part of a sentence, they dictated to the four remaining hoys, who were scribes. This work was repeated three or fear times, and at every turn the engine was so contrived that the vords shifted min ner place as the quare bits of wood moved up ide down. Six hours a day the young students were employed in this labour and the profes or whered me several volumes in large folio, already collected, of broken sentence, which he intended to piece together, and out of the c rich materials to give the vorid a complete hody of all arts and science

We next went to the school of language, where three professors sat in consiliation upon improving that of their own country

The first project was to shorten discourse by citing polysyllable into one, and leaving out serbs and par ticiples, because, in reality, all things imaginable are hut nouns. The other was a scheme for en irely abolish ing all words whatevever and the was night as a great advantage in point of health as well as hereity, for it is plain that ever word we speal is in some degree a diminution of our lungs by corre on, wh consequently contributes to the shortening of our Inco. An expedient was therefore offered, that since words are only names for things, it would be more convenent for all men to carry about them such thing as were necessary to express the particular business they are to discourse on. And this invention would certainly live taken place, to the great case as well as I calth of the subject, if the women, in conjunction with the vulgar and illiterate had not threatened to raise a rebellion, it iess they might be allowed the liberty to speal with their tongues, after the manner of their fo clurate such constant irreconcilable enemies to s ience are the common people

Inother great adventage proposed by this invention was, that it would serve as a universal language to be understood in all civilised nations, whose goods and utensils are generally of the same kind or nearly resembling, so that their uses might easily be comprehended. And thus ambassadors would be qualified to treat with foreign princes or ministers of state, to who e tongues they were utter stranger.

I was at the mathematical school where the master trught his pupils after a method scarce imaginable to us in Lurope The proposition and demonstration were fairly written on a thin wafer, with ink composed of a cephalic tineture. This the student was to smallow upon a fasting stomach, and for three days following eat Is the water digested, nothing but bread and water the tineture mounted to his brun, Learing the proposi tion along with it. But the success hath not litherto been answerable, partly by some error in the quantum or composition, and partly by the perverseness of lads, to whom this bolus is so nauscous that they generilly steal aside, and discharge it upwards before it can operate neither have they been yet persuaded to use so long an abstinence as the prescription

In the school of political projectors I was but ill entertained, the professors appearing in my judgment wholly out of their senses, which is a seene that never fails to make me melanchols. These unhappy people were proposing schemes for persuading monarchs to choose favourites upon the score of their wisdom, capacity, and virtue, of teaching ministers to consult the public good, of rewarding ment, great abilities, and eminent services, of instructing princes to know their true interest, by placing it on the same foundation with that of their people, of choosing for em ployments persons qualified to exercise them, with many other wild impossible chimeras, that never entered before into the heart of man to conceive, and confirmed in me the old observation, that there is nothing so extravagant and irrational which some philosophers have not maintained for truth

But, however, I shall so far do justice to this part of the academy as to acknowledge that all of them rere not so visionary. There was a most ingenious doctor, who seemed to be perfectly versed in the whole nature and system of government. This illustrious person had very usefully employed his studies in finding out effectual remedies for all diseases and corruptions to which the several kinds of public administration are subject, by the vices or infirmities of those who govern, as well as by the licentiousness of those who are to For instance, whereas all writers and reasoners have agreed that there is a strict universal resemblance between the natural and political body, can there be anything more evident than that the health of both must be preserved, and the diseases cured, by the same prescriptions? This doctor therefore proposed that upon the meeting of a senate, certain physicians should attend at the three first days of their sitting, and at the close of each day's debate feel the pulses of every senator, after which, having maturely considered and consulted upon the nature of the several maladies, and the methods of cure, they should on the fourth day return to the senate house, attended by their apothecaries stored with proper medicines, and, before the members sat, administer to each of them lenitives, aperitives, abs'ersives, corrosives, restringents, palliatives, laxatives, cephalalgies, ieteries, apoplilegmatics, acoustics, as their se eral cases required, and, according as these medicines should operate, repeat, alter, or omit them at the next meeting

He likewise directed that every senator in the great council of a nation, after he had delivered his opinion, and argued in the defence of it, should be obliged to give his vote directly contrary, because, if that were done, the result would infallibly terminate in the good of the public.

When parties in a state are violent, he offered a wonderful contrivance to reconcile them. The method is this. You take a hundred leaders of each party, you dispose them into couples of such whose heads are nearest of a size, then let two nice operators saw off the occiput of each couple at the same time, in such manner that the brain may be equally divided. Let the occiputs thus cut off be interchanged, applying each to the head of his opposite party man. It seems indeed to be a work that requireth some exactness, but the professor assured us that if it were dexterously performed, the cure would be infallible. For he argued thus, that the two half brains being left to debate the matter between themselves within the space of one skull would soon come to a good understanding, and produce that moderation, as well as regularity of thinking, so much to be wished for in the heads of those who imagine they come into the world only to watch and govern its motion and as to the difference of brains in quantity or quality, among those who are directors in faction, the doctor assured us, from his own knowledge, that it was a perfect trifle.

From 'Journal to Stella.'

Did the bishop of London die in Wexford? poor gentleman! did he drink the waters? were you at his burial? was it a great funeral? so far from his friends! But he was very old we shall all follow And yet it was a pity, if God pleased good man, not very learned I believe he died but poor Did he leave any charity legacies? who held up his pall? was there a great sight of clergy? do they design a tomb for him? are you sure it was the bishop of London? because there is an elderly gentleman here that we give the same title to or did you fancy all this in your water, as others do strange things in their wine? they say, these waters trouble the head, and make people imagine what never came to pass Do you make no more of killing a bishop? are these your Whiggish tricks?-Yes, yes, I see you are in a fret O faith, says you, saucy Presto, I'll break your head, what, can't one report what one hears without being made a jest and a laughing stock? are these your English tricks, with a murrain?—and Sacheverell will be the next bishop?

I was with the secretary this morning, who was in a mighty hurry, and went to Windsor in a chariot with lord keeper, so I was not invited, and am forced to stay at home, but not at all against my will, for I could have gone, and would not. I dined in the city with one of my printers, for whom I got the Gazette, and am come home early, and have nothing to say to you more, but finish this letter, and not send it by the bellman Days grow short, and the weather grows bad, and the town is splenetic, and things are so oddly contrived that I cannot be absent, otherwise I would go for a few days to Oxford, as I promised They say, 'tis certain that Prior has been in France, nobody doubts it. I had not time to ask the secretary, he was in such haste. Well, I will take my leave of dearest MD for a while, for I must begin my next letter to night consider that, young women, and pray be merry, and good girls, and love Presto There is now but one business the ministry wants me for, and when that is done, I will take my leave of them never got a penny from them, nor expect it. In my opinion, some things stand very ticklish, I dare say nothing at this distance. Farewell, dear sirrahs, dearest lives there is peace and quiet with MD, and nowhere else. They have not lessure here to think of small things, which may ruin them, and I have been forward enough Farewell again, dearest rogues I am never happy but when I write or think of MD I have enough of courts and ministers, and wish I were at Larreor and if I could with honour come away this moment, I would Bernage came to see me to-day, he is just landed from Portugal, and come to ruse recruits he looks very well and seems pleased with his station and manner of life he never saw London nor England before, he is ravished with Kent, which was his first prospect when he landed. Farewell again, &c &c. (Dated 24th and 25th August 1711)

From 'Polite Conversation,'

It was in the year 1695, and the sixth of his late majesty King William the Third, of ever glorious and inmortal memory, who rescued three kingdoms from popery and slavery, when, being about the age of six and thirty, my judgment mature, of good reputation in the world, and well acquainted with the best families in town, I determined to spend five mornings, to dine four times, pass three afternoons and six evenings every week, in the houses of the most polite families, of which I would confine myself to fifty, only changing as the masters or ladies died, or left the town, or grew out of vogue, or sunk in their fortnnes, or (which to me was of the highest moment) became disaffected to the government, which practice I have followed ever since to this very day, except when I happened to be sick, or in the spleen upon cloudy weather, and except when I entertained four of each sex at my own lodgings once in a month, by way of retaliation

I always kept a large table book in my pocket, and as soon as I left the company I immediately entered the choicest expressions that passed during the visit which, returning home, I transcribed in a fair hand, but somewhat enlarged, and had made the greatest part of my collection in twelve years, but not digested into any method, for this I found was a work of infinite labour, and what required the nicest judgment, and consequently could not be brought to any degree of perfection in less than sixteen years more.

Herein I resolved to exceed the advice of Horace, a Roman poet, which I have read in Mr Creech's admir able translation, that an author should keep his works nine years in his closet before he ventured to publish them and, finding that I still received some additional flowers of wit and language, although in a very small number, I determined to defer the publication, to pursue my design, and exhaust (if possible) the whole subject, that I might present a complete system to the world for I am convinced by long experience that the critics will be as severe as their old envy against me can make them I foresee they will object that I have inserted many an wers and replies which are neither witty, humorous, polite, nor authentic, and have omitted others that would have been highly useful as well as entertuning But let them come to particulars, and I will holdly engage to confute their malice.

For these last six or seven years I have not been able to add above nine valuable sentences to enrich my collection from whence I conclude that what remains will amount only to a trifle. However, if after the publication of this work, any lady or gentleman, when they have read it, shall find the least thing of importance omitted, I desire they will please to supply my defects by communicating to me their discoveries, and their letters may be directed to Simon Wagstaff, Esq., at his lodgings next door to the Gloucester head in St. James's street, paying the postage. In return of which favour, I shall make honourable mention of their names in a short preface to the second edition.

In the mean time, I cannot but with some pride, and much pleasure, congratulate with my dear country, which has outdone all the nations of Europe in advancing the whole art of conversation to the greatest height it is capable of reaching, and therefore, being entirely convinced that the collection I now offer to the public is full and complete, I may at the same time boldly affirm, that the whole genius, humour, politeness, and eloquence of England are summed up in it, nor is the treasure small, wherein are to be found at least a thousand shining questions, answers, repartees, replies, and rejoinders, fitted to adorn every kind of discourse that an assembly of English ladies and gentlemen, met together for their mitual entertainment, can possibly want especially when the several flowers shall be set off and improved by the speakers, with every circumstance of preface and circumlocution, in proper terms, and attended with praise, laughter, or admiration

From 'Thoughts on Various Subjects'

We have just religion enough to make us hate, but not enough to make us love one another

When we desire or solicit anything, our minds run wholly on the good side or circumstances of it, when it is obtained, our mind runs only on the bad ones.

When a true genius appeareth in the world, you may know him by this infallible sign, that the dinness are all in confederacy against him

I am apt to think that, in the day of judgment, there will be small allowance given to the wise for their want of morals, or to the ignorant for their want of faith, because both are without excuse. This renders the advantages equal of ignorance and knowledge. But some scruples in the wise, and some vices in the ignorant, will perhaps be forgiven upon the strength of temptation to each

It is pleasant to observe how free the present age is in laying taxes on the next 'Future ages shall talk of this, this shall be famous to all posterity 'whereas their time and thoughts will be taken up about present things, as ours are now

It is in disputes as in armies, where the weaker side setteth up false lights, and maketh a great noise, that the enemy may believe them to be more numerous and strong than they really are

I have known some men possessed of good qualities, which were very serviceable to others, but useless to themselves, like a sun dial on the front of a house, to inform the neighbours and passengers, but not the owner within

If a man would register all his opinions upon love, politics, religion, learning, &c. beginning from his youth, and so go on to old age, what a bundle of inconsistencies and contradictions would appear at last!

The stoical scheme of supplying our wants by lopping off our desires, is like cutting off our feet when we want shoes.

The reason why so few marriages are happy, is because young ladies spend their time in making nets, not in making cages.

Censure is the tax a man payeth to the public for being eminent.

No wise man ever wished to be younger

An idle reason lessens the weight of the good ones you gave before

Complaint is the largest tribute Heaven receives, and the sincerest part of our devotion

The common fluency of speech in many men and most women is owing to a scarcity of matter and scarcity of words for whoever is a master of language, and hath a mind full of ideas, will be apt, in speaking, to hesitate upon the choice of both, whereas common speakers have only one set of ideas, and one set of words to clothe them in, and these are always ready at the mouth. So people come faster out of a church when it is almost empty than when a crowd is at the door.

To be vain is rather a mark of himility than pride. Vain men delight in telling what honours have been done them, what great company they have kept, and the like, by which they plainly confess that these honours were more than their due, and such as their friends would not believe if they had not been told whereas a man truly prond thinks the greatest honours below his merit, and consequently scorns to boast. I therefore deliver it as a maxim, that whoever desires the character of a proud man ought to conceal his vanity.

Every man desireth to live long, but no man would be

If books and laws continue to increase as they have done for fifty years past, I am in some concern for future ages, how any man will be learned, or any man a lawyer

A nice man is a man of nasty ideas

If a man makes me keep my distance, the comfort is, he keeps his at the same time

Very few men, properly speaking, live at present, but are providing to live another time.

Princes in their infancy, childhood, and youth are said to discover prodigious parts and wit, to speak things that surprise and astonish strange, so many hopeful princes, so many shameful kings! If they happen to die young, they would have been prodigies of wisdom and virtue if they live, they are often prodigies indeed, but of another sort.

As universal a practice as lying is, and as easy a one as it seems, I do not remember to have heard three good lies in all my conversation, even from those who were most celebrated in that faculty

Sir Walter Scott's edition of Swift's Works (19 vols. 1814) and ed. 1824) includes most of what was valuable in the editions of Hawkesworth and Sheridan, a nev edition by Temple Scott, with biographical introduction by Mr Lecky, began in 1897 (vol. viii. 1899). Selections are by Traill (1884-85), Lewin (1886), H. Morley (1889-90), and Crail. (1892). John Forster published vol. 1. of a Life in 1875, and there are Lives by Crail (1882), Leslie Stephen (1882). Moriarty (1893), and Churton Collins (1893). See also Swift in Ireland by R. Ashe King (1896) and Mr Herbert Paul's Men'and Letters (1901).

GEORGE SAINTSBURY

John Arbuthnot, or Arbuthnott (1667–1735), the friend of Pope, Swift, Gay, and Prior, shared with his brother-wits—mostly keen Tories—in many humorous publications called forth chiefly by political events. His father was Episcopal parish minister of Arbuthnott in Kincardineshire, and was ejected after the Revolution, one of his brothers fought under Dundee at Killiecrankie, another in Mar's rebellion in 1715, and John himself was, according to Chesterfield, 'a Jacobite by prejudice, a republican by reflection and reasoning'. Having studied at Aberdeen and University College, Oxford, he took a degree in medicine at St Andrews (1696), and, settling in London, where before this he had taught mathematics, he became known as a wit and as author of an Examination of Dr Woodward's Account of the Deluge, and an Essay on the Usefulness of Mathematical Learning (1700) Happening to be at Epsom when Prince George was taken ill there, Arbuthnot treated the case so successfully that he was made the prince's regular physician. In 1705 he was appointed physician to the queen In 1715 Pope and he assisted Gay in the unlucky farce, Three Hours after Marriage The satirical Memoirs of the Extraordinary Life, Works, and Discoveries of Martinus Scriblerus, published in Pope's works (1741), was chiefly, if not wholly, written by Arbuthnot The design of this work, as expounded by Pope, was to ridicule all the false tastes in learning, under the character of a man of capacity who had dipped into every art and science, but injudiciously in each. Cervantes was the model, but though the witty authors copied his grave irony with success, the fine humanity and genial imagination of the Spanish novelist are wholly wanting in Scriblerus It is highly probable that the character of Cornelius Scriblerus suggested to Sterne the idea His oddities and absurdities of Walter Shandy about the education of his son-in describing which Arbuthnot displays extensive and curious learningare worthy of Sterne. Useful hints are thrown out amidst the ridicule and pedantry of Scriblerus. and one might almost think the author was poking fun at 'object lessons' when we read that 'the old gentleman so contrived it, to make everything contribute to the improvement of his knowledge, even to his very dress. He invented for him a geographical suit of clothes, which might give him some hints of that science, and likewise some knowledge of the commerce of different nations He had a French hat with an African feather, Holland shirts and Flanders lace, English cloth lined with Indian silk, his gloves were Italian, and his shoes were Spanish. He was made to observe this, and daily catechised thereupon, which his father was wont to call "travelling at home." He never gave him a fig or an orange but he obliged him to give an account from what country it came?

Another monument of Arbuthnot's wit and humour is his History of John Bull (1712), designed to ridicule the Duke of Marlborough and turn the nation against the French war The allegory is well sustained, and the satirical allusions wonderfully happy, though the political disputes of that time have largely lost their interest. In the like ironical vein are his Treatise concerning the Altercation or Scolding of the Ancients and his Art of Political Lying His wit, always pointed, is seldom acrimonious, and never without strong reasons personally offensive Of his serious works, the most notable, besides medical treatises, was a series of dissertations on ancient coins, weights, and measures He was singularly careless of his literary fame, published his best things anonymously, and let his friends court and after them at will, accordingly some things quite unworthy of him were falsely attributed to him. After the death of Queen Anne all court functionaries were changed, and Arbuthnot removed from St. James's to Dover Street. Swift affirmed he knew his art but not his trade, and declared, 'He has more wit than we all have, and more humanity than wit' Arbuthnot, though displaced at court still had a good practice in great houses, and to the end main tained his unaffected cheerfulness and good nature. From 1723 he was in ill health, and bore with dignity beconvement and suffering. His severest utterance is his epitaph on Colonel Charteris, the most notorious blackguard of the day

Here continueth to rot the body of FRANCIS CHAPTRES, who, with an inflexible constancy, and immitable uniformity of life, persisted, in spite of age and infirmities, in the practice of every human vice, excepting prodigality and hypocrisy, his insatiable avarice exempted him from the first, his matchless impudence from the second. Nor was he more singular in the undersating pravity of his minners than successful in accumulating wealth, for, without trade or profes sion, without trust of public money, and without bribe worthy service, he required, or more properly created, a ministerial estate He was the only person of his time who could eheat with the mask of honesty, retain his primeval meanness when possessed of ten thousand a year, and having daily deserved the gibbet for what he did, was at last condemned to it for what he could not do. Oh, indignant reader! think not his life use less to mankind. Providence connised at his execuble desirns, to give to after ages a conspicuous proof and example of how small estimation is exorbitant wealth in the sight of God, by his bestowing it on the most inworthy of all mortals.

John Bull (the English), Nic Frog (the Dutch) and Hocus (the Duke of Marlborough).

Bull, in the main, was an honest plain dealing fellow, cholene, hold, and of a very unconstant temper, he dreaded not old Lewis either at lineksword, single falchion, or endgel play but then he was very apt to quarrel with his best friends, especially if they pretended to govern him, if you flattened him, you might lead him like a child. John's temper depended ery much upon the air, his spirits note and fell with the weather John was quick, and understood he begins very well, but no man alive was more employ in loof me into his accompts or more cheated by partners, apprentices, and servants. This was occasioned by his being a boon companion, losing his bottle and has diversion for to say truth, no man Lep a better house than John nor spent his mones more generously. Br I han and fair dealing John had acquired some plans, and might have kept them, hal it and been for Li un happy lawant

Nie I rog was a cumming alse who reson quite the reverse of John in many particular cove ous fragil minded domestic affairs, would pinch his och to save his pocket, never lost a farthing his circless servants or bad debtors. He did not eare much for any som of diversions except tricks of high German artist, and legical comming no man exceeded. Nie in these year it must be owned that Nie vas a fair dealer, and in that way acquired immense riches.

Hocus was an old cunning attornes, and though the was the first con iderable suit that ever he was ergaged in, he showed himself superior in addres to most his profesion, he kept always good clears he loved money, was smooth tongued, gave good words and seldom lost his temper, he was not worse than an infidel, for he provided plentifully for his family, but he loved himself better than them all the neigh hours reported that he was henjecked, which was impossible by such a mild spirited woman as his wife was

The Duchess of Marlborough was a termacent. The Teep wis charged the great duke with peculation as commander in chief and with prolonging the war on that account

John Bull's Mother (the Church of England)

John had a mother whom he loved and honoured extremely a discreet, grave, solver, good-conditioned cleanly old gentlewoman as ever lived, she was more of your cross grained terringant, scolding jades, that one had as good be hanged as live in the house with, such as are always censuring the conduct and telling scandalous stories of their neighbours, extolling their own good qualities, and undervaluing those of others. On the contrary, she was of a nicely spirit, and, as she was strictly virtuous herself, so she always put the best construction upon the words and actions of her neighbours, except where they were irreconcilable to the rules of honesty and decency. She was neither one of your precise prudes, nor one of your fantastical old belles, that dress themselves like girls of fifteen, as she neither wore a ruff, forehead cloth, nor high crowned hat, so she had laid aside feathers, flowers, and crimpt ribbons in her head-dress, fur below scarfs, and hooped petiticoats. She scorned to patch and paint, yet she loved to keep lier hands and lier face clean. Though she vore no flaunting laced ruffles, she would not keep herself in a constant sweat with greasy flannel, though lier hair was not stack with jewels, she was not ashamed of a diamond cross—she was not, like some ladies, hang about with toys and trinkets, tweezer cases, pocket-glasses, and essence bottles, she used only a gold watch and an almanac, to mark the hours and the holidays.

Her furniture was neat and genteel, well fancied, with a lon gout As she affected not the grandeur of a state with a canopy, she thought there was no offence in an elbow chair, she had laid aside your carving, gilding, and japan work as being too apt to gather dirt, but slie never coald be prevailed upon to part with plain wainsco and clean hangings. There are some ladies that affect to smell a stink in everything, they are always highly perfumed, and continually burning frank meense in their rooms, she was above such affectation, yet she never would by aside the use of brooms and scrubbing brushes, and scrupled not to lay her linen in fresh lavender. She was no less genteel in her behaviour, well bred, without affectation, in the due mean between one of your affected courtesying pieces of formality, and your romps that have no regard to the common rules of civility There are some ladies that affect a mighty regard for their relations must not eat to-day for my uncle Tom, or my consin Betty died this time ten years, let's have a ball to night, it is my neighbour such a one's She looled upon all this as grimace, yet birthday she constantly observed her husband's birthday, her wedding day, and some few more. Though she was a truly good woman, and had a sincere mo lierly love for her son John, yet there wanted not those who en deavoured to create a misunderstanding between them, and they had so far prevailed with him once that he turned her out of doors [i.e. in 1643-60], to his great sorrow, as he found afterwards, for his affairs went on at sixes and sevens

She was no less judicious in the turn of her con versation and choice of her studies, in which she far exceeded all her sex, your rakes that hate the company of all sober grave gentlewomen would bear hers, and slie would, by her handsome manner of proceeding, sooner reclaim them than some that were more sonr and reserved. She was a zealous preacher up of chastity and conjugal fidelity in wives, and by no means a friend to the newfangled doctrine of the indispensable duty of cuckoldom, though slie advanced her opinions with a becoming assurance, yet slie never usliered them in, as some positive creatures will do, with dog matical assertions-this is infallible, I cannot be mis taken, none but a rogue can deny it. It has been observed that such people are oftener in the wrong than anybody Though she had a thousand good qualities, she was not without her faults, amongst which one might perhaps reckon too great lenity to her servants, to whom slic always give good counsel, but often too gentle correction

Bull's Sister Peg (the Scottish Nation and Church)

John had a sister, a poor girl that had been starved at nurse, anybody would have guessed miss to have been bred up under the inflaence of a cruel stepdame, and John to be the fondling of a tender mother John looked ruddy and plump, with a pair of cheeks like a trumpeter, miss looked pale and wan, as if she had the green sickness, and no wonder, for John was the darling, he had all the good bits, was crammed with good pullet, chicken, pig, goose, and capon, while miss had only a little oatmeal and water, or a dry crust without butter John had his golden pippins, peaches, and nectarines, poor miss a crab apple, sloe, or a blackberry Master lay in the best apart ment, with his bed chamber towards the south sun, miss lodged in a garret, exposed to the north wind, which shrivelled her countenance. However, this usage, though it stunted the girl in her growth, gave her a hardy constitution, she had life and spirit in abund ance, and knew when she was ill used now and then she would seize upon Jolin's commons, snatch a leg of a pullet, or a bit of good beet, for which they were sure to go to fisticulf. Master was indeed too strong for her, but miss would not yield in the least point, but even when master had got her down, she would scratch and bite like a tiger, when he gave her a cuff on the car, she would prick him with lier knitting needle. John brought a great chain one day to tie her to the bcd post, for which affront miss aimed a penknife at his heart. In short, these quartels grew up to rooted aversions, they gave one another nicknames, she called him Gundy guts, and he called her Lousy Peg, though the girl was a tight clever wench as any was and through her pale looks you might diseern spirit and vivacity, which made her not, indeed, a perfect beauty, but something that was agreeable. It was barbarous in parents not to take notice of these early quarrels, and make them live better together, such domestic feuds proving afterwards the occasion of misfortunes to them both Peg had, indeed, some odd humours and comical antipathy, for which John would jeer her 'What think you of my sister Peg,' says he, 'that faints at the sound of an organ, and vet will dance and frisk at the noise of a bagpipe?' 'What's that to you, Gundy guts' quoth Peg, 'everybody's to choose their own music.' Then Peg had taken a fancy not to say her paternoster, which made people imagine strange things of her Of the three brothers that have made such a clutter in the world, Lord Peter, Martin, and Jack [the Pope, Luther, and Calvin], Jack had of late been her inclination Lord Peter she detested, nor did Martin stand much better in her good graces, but Jack had found the way to her heart.

The Celerity and Duration of Lies

As to the celerity of their motion, the author says it is almost incredible. He gives several instances of hes that have gone faster than a man can ride post. Your terrifying lies travel at a prodigious rate, above ten miles an hour. Your whispers move in a narrow vortex, but very swiftly. The author says it is impossible to explain several phenomena in relation to the celerity of lies, without the supposition of synchronism and combination. As to the daration of lies, he says there are of all sorts, from hours and days to ages, that there are some which, like insects, die and revive again in a different form, that good artists, like people who build upon a short lease, will calculate the duration of a he surely to answer their purpose—to last just as long, and no longer, than the turn is served

The properest contradiction to a lie is ano lier lie For example, if it should be reported that the Pre tender was in I ondon, one would not contradict it by saying he never was in Ingland, but you must prove by eye witnesses that he came no further than Greenwich, and then went back again. Thus, if it be spread about that a great pur on were dving of some disease, you must not say the truth, that they are in health and never had such a disease, but that they are slowly recovering of it. So there was not long ago a gentleman who affirmed that the treats with I rance, for bringing popers and slavers into England, was signed the 15th of September, to which another answered very judiciously, not by opposing truth to his he, that there was no such treats. But that to his certain know ledge there were many things in that treaty not yet adjusted

Letter to Pope

I little doubt of your I ind concern for me, nor of that of my Lord Bathur t I have nothing to repay my friends with at present but pravers and good wishes I have the satisfaction to find that I am as officiously served by my friends as he that has thousands to leave in legacies, besides the assurance of their sincerity Almighty has made my bodily disease as easy as a thing of that nature can be. I have found relief sometimes from the air of this place, my nights are bad, but many poor creatures are wor e. As for you, my good friend, I think since our first requirintance there has not been any of those little suspicions or jealousies which often affect the sincerest friendship, I am sure not on my side I must be so sinecre as to own that though I could not help valuing you for those talents which the world praises, jet they were not the foundation of my friend ship They were quite of another sort, nor will I at present offend you by enumerating them. And I make it my last request, that you will continue that noble dis dain and abhorrence of vice which you seem naturally endued with, but still with regard to your own safety and study more to reform than chastise, though the one cannot be effected without the other

Lord Bathurst I have always honoured for every good quality that a person of his runk ought to have Pray give my respects and kindest wishes to the family. John Strype (1643-1737), the son of John van Strip, a religious refugee from Brabant, was born in London, was educated at St Paul's School and Cambridge, and became incumbent of Low Leyton, Essey, but was known to the world as an ecclesiastical historian and biographer His prolix and illarranged, but honest and invaluable, works (27 vols,

He also edited Stow's Survey of Lordon (1720). The following letter to his mother from Cambridge sets the life of a university man about that period in a vivid light.

Good Mother,

Your of the 24th instant I gladly received, expecting indeed one a weel lefore, but I understand both le Waterson and your elf of your indisposedness then to The reason's a receive this no sooner is, becaute Write I had a mind (knowing of this honest moman's so ting out so suddenly for I or lon from hence and her bu iresse In inc so neer to Let ice to Lame) that she should dearer it into so r hands, that is sourmed the letter and more fully heare of me, and mon how a fareth with me. She is my laundre to make her velcorie and tell her how tou would have my linen washed as you were saring in your letter. I am very glad to hear that you and my brother John on do three to well, that I believe von account an unusual cour este that le should have vot out to the cake here. However, priv mother, he careful of your elf and the noncernally sourself, for that v want to bring you upon a sid bel. I here allo my brother Soveris of en a victor truly I am glod of it. I hope your children may be comforts to you now you are Remember me back again mor kinlig to growing old in brother Siver

Concerning the taking up of my things, its true I go at one shilling too much in the hundred. Int why I give so much, I thought indeed I had given you an account in that same letter, but it seems I have not. The oals rea on is, because they were a scholar's good. I is coun on to make them pay one shilling more than the town's people. Dr Pearson himself paved so and exert o her lads in this college, and my tutor told me they really expect so much of me, being a scholar, and I found it so.

Do not wonder so much at our commons they are nore than many colleges have. Frinity uself taher Herring and Davies are), which is the famousest college in the University, have but three half pence roast ment, dinner and supper, throughout the weeker and such meate as you know I not use to care for and that is real but non I have learnt to eat it Sometimes neverthelesse we have boiled ment, with pottage, and beef and mutton which I am glad of except Fridays and Saturdays and sometimes Wednesdays, which days we have fish at dinner and tansy or pudding for supper Our parts then are slender enough. But there is the remedy, we may retire unto the butternes and there take a half penny loafe and butter or chiese, or else to the kitchen, and take there what the cook hath. But, for mr part, I am sure I never visited the Litchen vet, since I have been here, and the butteries but seldom after meals unlesse for a ciza, that is for a farthing worth of small beer so that lesse than a peny in beer doth serve me a Neverthelesse sometimes we have exceed whole day ings then we have two or three dishes (but that is very rare) otherwise never but one so that a cake and a cheese would be very welcome to me, and a weats tongue, or some such thing, if it would not require too If you do intend to send me any thing, do much money not send it set, until you hear further of me for I have many things to send for, which may all, I hope, be put into that box you have at home but what they are, I shall give you an account of hereafter, when I would have them sent and that is, when I have got me a chamber for as yet. I am in a chamber that do h not at all please me. I have thoughts of one, which is a very handsome one, and one pair of stairs high, and that looketh into the master's garden. The price is but 205 per annum, ten whereof a knight's son, and lately admitted into this college, doth pay though he did not come till about midsummer, so that I shall have but 10s to pay a year besides my income, which may be about 40s, or there Mother, I kindly thank you for your orange pills you sent me. If you are not too straight of money, send me some such thing by the woman, and a pound or two of almonds and raisons. But first ask her if she will carry them, or if they be not too much trouble to her I do much approve of your agreeing with the carrier quarterly he was indeed telling me of it, that you had agreed with him for it and I think he means both yours and mine. Make your brigain sure with him

I understand by your letter that you are very inquisitive to I now how tlungs stand with me here. I believe you may be yell enough satisfied by the woman. My break ings-out are non all gone. Indeed I was afraid at my first coming it would have pro ed the itch but I am fairly rid on it but I fear I shall get it, let me do what I can for there are many here that have it cruelly Some of them take strong purges that would kill a horse, recels together for it, to ge it away, and yet are hardly At my first coming I Lid alone but since, my tutor desired me to let a very elear lad lay with me, and an alderman's son of Colchester, which I could not deny, being newly come the both last with me now for almost a fortnight, and will do till he can provide himself 41th a chamber I have been with all my acquaintance. sho have entreated me very courteously, especially Jonathan Houghton I went to his chamber the I riday uight I first came, and there he made me stay and sup with him, and would have had me laid with him that night, and was extraordinary 1 and to me. Since, we have been together pretty often He excused lumselfe that he did not come to see me before he went, and that he did not write to me since he had been come. He hath now, or is about obtaining, £10 more from the college

We go twice a day to Chapel, in the morning about 7, and in the evening about 5. After we come from Chapel in the morning, which is towards 8, we go to the butteries for our breakfast, which usually is five farthings, an halfepenny loaf and butter, and a eize of beer. But sometimes I go to an honest house near the college, and have a pint of milk boiled for my breakfast.

Truh I was much troubled to hear that my letter for Ireland is not vet gone. I wish if Mr Jones is not vet gone, that it might be sent some other way. Indeed I wish I could see my cousin James Bonnell here within three or four years for I believe our University is less strict to observe lads that do not in every point conforme than theirs at Dublin though ours be had enough. Pray remember me to my uncle, and all my friends there, when you write. Remember me to my cousin James Knox. I am glad he is recovered from his dangerous sickness, whatsoever it is, for I canuot make any thing of it, is you have written it. And thus, for want of paper, I end, desiring heartily to be remembered to all my friends. Excuse me to my brother and sister that they have not heard from me yet. Next week I hope to write to them both. Excuse my length, I thought I would answer your letter to the full. I remaine your dutiful son,

Daniel Defoe.

the author of Robinson Cruson, was born towards the close of 1659 in the London parish of St Giles, Cripplegate His father, James Foe, was a butcher there, his grandfather was a veoman of Etton near Peterborough, and the change to De Foe or Defoe was made by Daniel about 1697 was educated for the Nonconformist ministry at a Stoke Newington academy, learning Latin, Greek, French, Italian, Spanish, and, above all, English. but by 1683 he was in business as a hose factor He was apparently out with Monmouth, joined King William at Henley in 1688, trivelled in Scotland, France, and Spain, and went bankrupt in 1602, his debts be scrupulously paid up later next became accountant to the glass-duty commissioners and secretary and owner of a Tilbury tile His Essay upon Projects appeared in factors 1698, and he became noted as an able pamphleteer in support of the king's policy—e.g. in his vigorous poem, The True born Englishman (1701) success was prodigious, eighty thousand copies sold upon the streets Defoe was no poet, but he could reason in verse, and lind an unlimited command of homely, forcible language The sature opens with a paraphrase of Burton (see Vol. I p 440)

Wherever God erects a house of prayer, The devil always builds a chapel there, And 'twill be found upon examination, The latter has the larger congregation.

Defoc's restless pen was active throughout the bitter struggle under Anne between the High-Church party and the Dissenters, and his famous treatise, The Shortest Way with the Dissenters (1703), first deceived and then infuriated his oppo-The House of Commons ordered the pamphlet to be burned, and, when tried at the Old Bailey in July, he was sentenced to pay a fine of 200 marks, to stand thrice in the pillory, to find sureties for his good behaviour during seven years, and to be imprisoned during the queen's pleasure. On the first day he suffered appeared his Hymn to the Pillory, and that portion of his penalty was converted into a Whig triumph During his imprisonment in Newgate he continued an incessant literary activity upon 'occasional conformity' and other controversies, and started his Review (February 1704–June 1713), at first a weekly, then a bi weekly, and finally a tri weekly newspaper. This was his largest, if not his most important, work, embracing in over five thousand pages essays on almost every branch of human knowledge. During the same nine years he published eighty distinct works, with 4727 pages. His 'Scandal Club' was the forerunner of the Tatlers and Spectators

In August 1704 Defoe was released from prison through Harley, who further procured him employment. Giving Alms no Charity (1704) was a masterly denunciation of indis criminate charity and national workshops In 1705 appeared The Consolidator or Memoirs of Sundry Transactions from the World in the Moon, a political satire, which per haps supplied a hint for Gulliver's Travels, and in 1706 The True Relation of the Apparition of one Mrs Veal, which Mr Aitken has proved to be founded on fact or supposed fact. Jure Divino Was a tedious political satire in twelve books of poor verse. In 1705 Defoe was sent by Harley on a secret mission to the west of England, in 1706-7 he was in Scotland as a secret agent to promote the Union His History of the Union appeared in 1709 After Harley's fall (1708) he found himself able to be a staunch Whig under Godolphin, but on Harley's return to power (1710) he once more supported a Tory Ministry In 1713 Defoe agam tried his hand at political irony, and issued three pamphlets - Reasons against the Succession of the House of Hanover, What if the Pretender should Come? and What if the Queen should Die? Neither Whig nor Tory could understand Defoe's ironical writings. He was taken into custody, and had to find bail, himself in £800, and two friends in £400 each, to answer for the alleged libels Through the influence, however, of Harley, now Lord Oxford, Defoe obtained a pardon under the Great Seal, confuting the charges brought against him, and exempting him from any consequences thereafter on account of those publications. In his Review he had striven in vain to preserve the semblance of consistency, and, playing a dubious part in the intrigues that preceded and attended the accession of the House of Hanover, hie found himself in a general discredit which his Appeal to Honour and Justice (1715) did not remove. In 1718 he was in equivocal government service, too ingeniously sub editing Jacobite and High Cliurch organs Defoe was not scrupu lous in his point of lionour, still, it is certain he never was a Ton, but always at heart devoted to the glorious Revolution and the Protestant succession None the less, it is amazing to find Мг Thomas Wright thus vin dicating his con 'If it 15 duct dishonourable to be a spy, Defoc's conduct cannot be defended, if it is not dishonour able, let no stones be cast at him' In 1715 appeared the first volume of the Family In structor, and on 25th April 1719 the first volume of the immortal Robinson Crusoe, founded partly on

Dampier's Voyage (see page 103 above), but mainly on the astventures of Alexander Selkirk, which were described at length in Woodes Rogers's Criming logage round the World and Captun Cooke's ware made (both published in 1712), and were made more coessible in Steele's Englishman (see the article on Steele in this volume) in 1713, from Sel n narration Perhaps no man in the whole kırk's ι Interature ever devised at fifty-nine a more history sterpiece of creative imagination. The splendi appeared the second volume, and in 1720 same 3 e-The Serious Reflictions during the Life the u 1 ng Adventures of Robinson Crusoe, acand Sur ach the original story was an allegory cording to of the no ist's own life. In this his most prolific year he also gave to the world the Life and Adventures of Duncar Campbell, the famous Memoirs of a Cavalier, and Captain Singleton, a book of great brilliancy In 1722 he issued Mote Flanders, a marvel of the novelistic art, The Journal of the Plague Year, better known by the title in the second edition, A History of the Plague, a fresh masterpiece of verisimilitude, and the History of Colonel Jacque, which, unequal throughout and actually feeble towards its close, is in parts the most charming of all his books. Later works were Roxana (1724), a weaker Moll Flanders, A Tour through Great Britain (1724-26), A New Volage round the World (1725), The Complete English Tradesman (1725-27), a glorification of moneygetting, and The Political History of the Devil (1726), which may be grouped with his System of Magic (1726) and the Essay on the Reality of Apparations (1727) Other works are his rather ignoble Religious Courtship (1722) and The Use and Abuse of the Marriage Bed (1727) Everybody's Business is Nobody's Business (1725) is an amusing diatribe upon the insolence of domestic servants, in which he recommends for London shoeblacks the drastic discipline proposed by Fletcher of Saltoun (Vol. I p 828) for Scots vagabonds 'Under the notion of cleaning our shoes, above ten thousand wicked, idlc, pilfering vagrants are permitted to patrol about the city I therefore humbly propose that these vagabonds should be put immediately under such taskmasters as the government shall appoint, and that they be employed, punished, or rewarded according to their capacities and demerits, that is to say, the industrious and docible to woolcombing, as also to husbandry and other parts of agriculture.'

Meantime Defoe had built himself 'a very hand some house' at Stole Newington, where he had 'a very genteel way of living' and amused himself with gardening and the company of his three daughters. But about 1729 his affairs seem to have fallen into confusion, one of his sons had behaved undutifully, and he was under apprehensions of trouble. He died in Ropemakers' Alley, Moorfields, 26th April 1731, and was buried in Bunhill Fields In his last preserved letter, from some place where he was hiding near Greenwich, he writes 'I am so near my journey's end, and am hastening to the place where the wearv are at rest, and where the wicked cease to trouble, be it that the passage is rough, and the day stormy, by what vay soever He please to bring me to the end of it, I desire to finish life with this temper of soul in all cases-Te Deum Laudamus'

As a novelist Defoe was the father of Richardson, and partly of Fielding, as an essayist he suggested the Tatler and Speciator His imagination had no visions of surpassing loveliness, nor any rich combinations of humour and eccentricity, yet he is equally at home in the plain scenes of English life, in the wars of the cavaliers, in the haunts of dissipation and infamy, in the roving adventures of the buccaneers, and in the appalling visitation of the plague. In scenes of diablerie and witchcraft he preserves the same unmoved and truth like demeanour Taste or circumstances led him mostly into low life, and his characters often are such as we cannot sympathise with. The whole arcana of roguery and villains seem to have been open to him, his experiences of Newgate were not without their use. It might be thought that the good taste which led Defoe to write in a style of such pure and unpretending English, instead of the inflated manner of vulgar writers. would have dictated a nicer selection of his subjects. and kept him from wandering so frequently into the low and disgusting purlieus of vice. But he seems to have selected the adventures of pirates. pickpockets, demireps, and the like worthless characters for the simple reason that they would sell best, of course he nowhere holds them up for imitation. He evidently felt most at home where he had to descend, not to rise, to his subject, Robinson Crusoe's experiences, his shipwreck and sojourn in the solitary island, invest that incomparable tale with more romance than any of his other works 'Pathos,' said Sir Walter Scott, 'is not Defoe's general characteristic, he had too little delicacy of mind. When it comes, it comes uncalled, and is created by the circumstances, not sought for by the author. The excess, for instance, of the natural longing for human society which Crusoe manifests while on board of the stranded Spanish vessel, by falling into a sort of agony as he repeated the words "Oh, that but one man had been saved -oh, that there had been but one " is in the highest degree pathetic The agonising reflections of the solitary, when lie is in danger of being driven to sea, in his rash attempt to circumnavigate his island, are also affecting' To these may be added Crusoe's sensations on finding the footprint on the sand-an incident conceived in the spirit of poetry great success of this novel induced the author to write a continuation to it, in which Crusoe is again brought among the busy haunts of men, the attempt was hazardous, and it proved a The once solitary island, peopled by mariners and traders, is disenchanted, and be comes tame, vulgar, and commonplace

The relation of adventures, not the delineation of character and passion, was the forte of Defoe. His invention of common incidents and situations seems to have been unbounded, and those minute references and descriptions 'immediately lead us,' as was pointed out by Dunlop in his History of Fiction, 'to give credit to the whole narrative, since we think they would hardly have been mentioned unless they had been true. The same circumstantial detail of facts is remarkable in Gulliver's Travels, and we are led on by them to a partial belief in the most improbable narrations' The power of Defoe in feigning reality, or 'forging the handwriting of nature,' as it has been forcibly termed, may be seen in the narrative of Mrs Veal's apparation. It was prefixed to a religious book, Diclincourt on Death, and had the effect of drawing attention to an otherwise unsale able and neglected work The imposition was a bold one-perhaps the least defensible of all his inventions Defoe is more natural even than Swift, and his style, though inferior in directness and energy, is more copious He was strictly an original writer, with strong, clear conceptions ever rising up in his mind, which he was able to embody in language equally perspicuous and forcible both read and seen much, and treasured up an amount of knowledge and observation certainly not equalled by the store of any writer of that day When we consider Defoe's misfortunes and sufferings, if we remember that his spirit had been broken and his means wasted by prosecutions, that his health was broken by apopley, and that he was verging on sixty, his invention of Robinson Crusor and the long train of fiction which succeeded it seems a marvellous triumph of native genius, self-reliance, and energy

Defoe's irony was often too subtle and obscure for popular apprehension, but the following is as obvious as it is ingenious

From What if the Pretender should Come?'

Give us leave, O people of Great Britain, to lay before you a little sketch of your future felicity, under the auspicious reign of such a glorious prince as we all hope and believe the Pretender to be. First, you are to allow that by such a just and righteous shutting up of the Exchequer in about seven years' time, he may be supposed to have received about forty millions sterling from his people, which not being to be found in specie in the kingdom, will for the benefit of circulation enable him to treasure up infinite funds of wealth in foreign banks, a prodigious mass of foreign bullion, gold, jewels, and plate, to be ready in the Tower or elsewhere, to be issued upon future emergency, as occasion may allow This prodigious wealth will necessarily have these happy events, to the infinite satisfaction and advantage of the whole nation, and the benefit of which I hope none will be so unjust or ungrateful to deny 1 It will for ever after deliver this nation from the burden, the expense, the formality, and the tyranny of parliaments. No one can perhaps at the first view be rightly sensible of the many advantages of this article, and from how many mischiefs it will deliver this nation. How the country gentlemen will be no longer harassed to come, at the command of every court occasion, and upon every summons by the prince's proclamation, from their families and other occa sions, whether they can be spared from their wives, &c. or no, or whether they can trust their wives behind them or no, nay, whether they can spare money or no for the journey, or whether they must come carriage paid or no, then they will no more be unnecessarily exposed to long and hazardous journeys in the depth of winter, from the remotest corners of the island, to come to London, just to give away the country's money and go home again, all this will be dispensed with by the kind and gracious management of the Pretender, when he, God bless us, shall be our most gracious sovereign 2. In the happy consequence of the demise of parliaments, the country will be eased of that intolerable burden of travel ling to elect ons, sometimes in the middle of their harvest, whenever the writs of elections arbitrarily summon them. 3 And with them the poor gentlemen will be eased of that abominable grievance of the nation, viz. the expense of elections, by which so many gentlemen of estates have been runed, so many innocent people, of honest prin ciples before, have been debauched and made mercenary. partial, perjured, and been blinded with bribes to sell their country and liberties to who bids most It is well known how often, and yet how in vain, this distemper has been the constant concern of parliament for many ages to cure and to provide sufficient remedies for Now if ever the effectual remedy for this is found out, to the mexpressible advantage of the whole nation, and this perhaps is the only cure for it that the nature of the disease will admit of, what terrible havoe has this kind of trade made among the estates of the gentry and the morals of the common people I How has it kept alive the factions and divisions of the country people, keeping them in a constant agitation, and in triennial commotions ! so that, what with forming new interests and cultivating old, the heats and animosities never cease among the people But once set the Pretender upon the throne, and let the funds be but happily stopped, and paid into his hands, that he may be in no more need of a parliament, and all these distempers will be cured as effectually as a fever is cured by cutting off the head, or as a halter cures the bleeding at the nove.

From the 'History of the Plague'

Much about the same time I walked ont into the fields towards Bow, for I had a great mind to see how things were managed in the river and among the ships, and as I had some concern in shipping, I had a notion that it had been one of the best ways of securing one's self from the infection to have retired into a ship, and musing how to satisfy my curiosity in that point, I turned away over the fields, from Bow to Bromley, and down to Blackwall, to the stairs that are there for landing or taking water

Here I saw a poor man walking on the bank or sea wall, as they call it, by himself I walked a while also nbout, seeing the honses all shut up, at last I fell mto some talk, at a distance, with this poor man. First I asked him how people did thereabouts. 'Alas ! sir,' says he, 'almost desolate, all dead or sick. Here are very few families in this part, or in that village' (point ing at Poplar), 'where half of them are dead alread), and the rest sick.' Then he, pointing to one house 'There they are all dead,' said he, 'and the house stands open, nobody dares go into it. A poor thief,' says he, 'ventured in to steal something, but he paid dear for his theft, for he was carried to the churchyard too last night' Then he pointed to several other houses. 'There,' says he, 'they are all dead, the man and his wife and five children There,' says he, 'they are shut up, you see a watchman at the door, and so of other houses.' 'Whi,' says I, 'what do you here all alone?' 'Why,' says he, 'I am a poor desolate man it hath pleased God I am not yet visited, though my family 16, and one of my children dead ' 'How do you mean then,' said I, 'that you are not visited?' 'Why,' says he, 'that is my house' (pointing to a very little low boarded house), 'and there my poor wife and two children live,' said he, 'if they may be said to live, for my wife and one of the children are visited, but I do not come at them.' And with that word I saw the tears run very plentifully down his face, and so they did down mine too, I assure you.

'But,' said I, 'why do you not come at them? How can you abandon your own flesh and blood?' 'O, sir,' says he, 'the Lord forbid. I do not abandon them, I work for them as much as I am able, and blessed be the Lord, I keep them from want.' And with that I observed he lifted up his eyes to heaven with a counte nance that presently told me I had happened on a man that was no hypocrite, but a serious, religious, good man, and his cjaculation was an expression of thankfulness that, in such a condition as he was in, he should be able 'Well,' says I, 'honest to say his family did not want man, that is a great mercy, as things go now with the poor But how do you live then, and how are you kept from the dreadful calamity that is now upon us all?" 'Why, sir,' says he, 'I am a waterman, and there is my boat,' says he, 'and the boat serves me for a house I work in it in the day, and I sleep in it in the night, and what I get I lay it down upon that stone,' says he, shewing me a broad stone on the other side of the street, a good way from his house, 'and then,' says he, 'I halloo and call to them till I make them hear, and they come and fetch it

'Well, friend,' says I, 'but how can you get money as a waterman? Does anybody go by water these times?' 'Yes, sir,' says he, 'in the way I am employed, there does Do you see there,' says he, 'five ships lie at anchor?' (pointing down the river a good way below the town), 'and do you see,' says he, 'eight or ten ships he at the chain there, and at anchor yonder?' (pointing above the town) 'All those ships have families on board, of their merchants and owners, and such like, who have locked themselves up, and live on board, close shut in, for fear of the infection, and I tend on them to fetch things for them, carry letters, and do what is absolutely necessary, that they may not be obliged to come on shore, and every night I fasten my boat on board one of the ship's boats, and there I sleep by myself, and blessed be God, I am preserved lutherto'

'Well,' said I, 'friend, but will they let you come on board after you have been on shore here, when this has been such a terrible place, and so infected as it is?'

'Why, as to that,' said he, 'I very seldom go up the ship side, but deliver what I bring to their boat, or lie by the side, and they hoist it on board. If I did, I think they are in no danger from me, for I never go into any house on shore, or touch anybody, no not of my own family, but I fetch provisions for them'

'Nay,' says I, 'but that may be worse, for you must have those provisions of somebody or other, and since all this part of the town is so infected, it is dangerous so much as to speak with anybody, for the village,' said I, 'is, as it were, the beginning of London, though it be at some distance from it'

'That is true,' added he, 'but you do not understand me right—I do not buy provisions for them here, I row up to Greenwich, and bny fresh meat there, and sometimes I row down the river to Woolwich, and buy there, then I go to single farmhouses on the Kentish side, where I am known, and buy fowls, and eggs, and butter, and bring to the ships, as they direct me, sometimes one, sometimes the other I seldom come on shore here, and I came only now to call my wife, and hear how my little family do, and give them a little money which I received last night.'

'Poor man!' said I, 'and how much hast thou gotten for them?'

'I have gotten four shillings,' said he, 'which is a great sum, as things go now with poor men, but they have given me a bag of bread too, and a salt fish and some flesh, so all helps out'

'Well,' said I, 'and have you given it them yet?'

'No,' said he, 'but I have called, and my wise has answered that she cannot come out yet, but in half an hour she hopes to come, and I am waiting for her Poor woman' says he, 'she is brought sadly down, she has had a swelling, and it is broke, and I hope she will recover, but I fear the child will die, but it is the Lord'—— Here he stopped, and wept very much

'Well, honest friend,' said I, 'thon hast a sure comforter, if thou hast brought thyself to be resigned to the will of God, He is dealing with us all in judgment.'

'O sir,' says he, 'it is infinite mercy if any of us are spared, and who am I to repine!'

'Say'st thou so,' said I, 'and how much less is my faith than thine'.' And here my heart smote me, sug gesting how much better this poor man's foundation was on which he staid in the danger than mine, that he had nowhere to fly, that he had a family to bind linin to attendance, which I had not, and mine was mere pre sumption, his a true dependence and a courage resting on God, and yet that he used all possible caution for his safety

I turned a little way from the man while these thoughts engaged me, for indeed I could no more refrain from tears than lie.

At length, after some further talk, the poor woman opened the door, and called 'Robert, Robert' He answered, and bid her stay a few moments and he would come, so he ran down the common stairs to his boat, and fetched up a saek in which was the provisions he had brought from the ships, and when he returned, he hallooed again. Then he went to the great stone which lie shewed me, and emptied the sack, and laid all out, everything by themselves, and then retired, and his wife came with a little boy to fetch them away, and lie called and said such a captain had sent such a thing, and such a captain such a thing, and at the end adds 'God has sent it all, give thanks to Him poor woman had taken up all, she was so weak, she could not carry it at once in, though the weight was not much neither, so she left the biscuit, which was in a little bag, and left a little boy to watch it till she came again.

'Well, but,' says I to him, 'did you leave her the four shillings too, which you said was your week's pay?'

'Yes, yes,' says he, 'you shall hear her own it' So he calls again 'Rachel, Rachel,' which it seems was her name, 'did you take up the money?' 'Yes,' said she 'How much was it?' said he. 'Four shillings and a groat,' said she 'Well, well,' says he, 'the Lord keep you all,' and so he turned to go away

As I could not refrain contributing tears to this man's story, so neither could I refrain my charity for his assist ance, so I called him 'Hark thee, friend,' said I, 'come hither, for I believe thou art in health, that I may venture thee,' so I pulled out my hand, which was in niy pocket before. 'Here,' says I, 'go and call thy Rachel once more, and give her a little more comfort from me, God will never forsake a family that trust in llim as thou dost 'so I give him four other shillings, and bid him go lay them on the stone, and call his wife.

I have not words to express the poor man's thankful ness nother could be express it himself but by tears running down his face. He called his wife, and told her God had moved the heart of a stranger, upon hearing their condition, to give them all that money, and a great deal more such as that he said to her. The woman, too, made signs of the like thankfulness, as well to Heaven as to me, and joyfully picked it up, and I parted with no money all that year that I thought better bestowed

The Troubles of a Young Thief.

I have often thought since that, and with some mirth too, how I had really more wealth than I knew what to do with [five pounds, his share of the plunder from a stolen pocket book], for lodging I had none, nor any box or drawer to hide my money in, nor had I any pocket, but such as I say was full of holes, I knew nobody in the world that I could go and desire them to live tup for me, for being a poor, naked, ragged boy, they would presently say I had robbed somebody, and perhaps lay hold of me, and my money would be my crime, as they say it often is in foreign countries. And now, is I was full of wealth, behold I was full of care, for what to do to secure my money I could not tell, and this held me so long, and was so vexatious to me the next day, that I truly sat down and cried

Nothing could be more perplexing than this money was to me all that night I carried it in my liand n good while, for it was in gold all but 14s, and that is to say, it was in four guineas, and that 14s was more difficult to carry than the four guineas. At last I sat down and pulled off one of my shoes, and put the four gumeas into that but after I had gone awhile, my shoe hurt me so I could not go, so I was fain to sit down again, and take it out of my shoe, and carry it in my hand. Then I found a dirty linen rag in the street, and I took that up, and wrapped it all together, and carried it in that a good I have often since heard people say, when they have been talking of money that they could not get in, 'I wish I had it in a foul clout ' in truth, I had mine in a foul clout, for it was foul, according to the letter of that saying, but it served me till I came to a convenient place, and then I sat down and washed the cloth in the kennel, and so then put my money in again

Well, I carried it home with me to my lodging in the glass house, and when I went to go to sleep, I knew not what to do with it. If I had let any of the black crew I was with know of it, I should have been smothered in the ashes for it, so I knew not what to do, but lay with it in inv hand, and my hand in my bosom, but then sleep went from my eyes. Oh, the weight of human care! I, a poor beggar boy, could not sleep, so soon as I had but a little money to keep, who before that could have slept upon a lieap of brickbats, or stones, or cinders, or any where, as sound as a rich man does on his down bed, and sounder too

Lvery now and then dropping asleep, I should dream that my money was lost, and start like one frighted, then, finding it fast in my liand, try to go to sleep again, but could not for n long while, then drop and start again At last a fancy came into my head, that if I fell asleep, I should dream of the money, and talk of it in my sleep, and tell that I had money, which if I should do, and one of the rogues should hear me, they would pick it out of my bosom, and of my hand too, without waking me, and after that thought I could not sleep a wink more, so I passed that night over in care and anxiety enough, and this, I may safely say, was the first night's rest that I lost by the cares of this life and the deceitfulness of nehes.

As soon as it was day, I got out of the hole we lay in, and rambled abroad in the fields towards Stepney, and there I mused and considered what I should do with this money, and many n time I wished that I had not had it, for after all my ruminating upon it, and what course I should take with it, or where I should put it, I could not hit upon any one thing, or any possible method to secure it, and it perplexed me so that at last, as I said just now, I sat down and cried heartily

When my erying was over, the case was the same, I had the money still, and what to do with it I could not tell. At last it came into my head that I should look out for some hole in a tree, and seek to hide it there till. I should have occasion for it. Big with this discovery, as I then thought it, I began to look about me for n tree, but there were no trees in the fields about Stepney or Mile end that looked fit for my purpose, and if there were any that I began to look narrowly at, the fields were so full of people that they would see if I went to hide anything there, and I thought the people eyed me as it was, and that two men in particular followed me to see what I intended to do

This drove me farther off, and I crossed the road at Mile end, and in the middle of the town went down a lane that goes away to the Blind Beggar's at Bethnal Green When I came a little way in the lane, I found a footpath over the fields, and in those fields several trees At last, one tree had a little for my turn, ns I thought hole in it pretty high out of my reach, and I climbed up the tree to get it, and when I came there, I put my hand in and found (as I thought) a place very fit, so I placed my treasure there, and was mighty well satisfied with it, but, behold, putting my hand in again, to lay it more commodiously, as I thought, of a sudden it slipped away from me, and I found the tree was hollow, and my little parcel was fallen in out of my reach, and how far it might go in I knew not, so that, in a word, my money was quite gone, irrecoverably lost There could be no room so much as to hope ever to see it again, for it was a vast

As young as I was, I was now sensible what a fool I was before, that I could not think of ways to keep my money, but I must come thus far to throw it into a hole where I could not reach it. Well, I thrust my hand quite up to my elbow, but no bottom was to be found, nor nny end of the hole or cavity I got a stick of the tree, and thrust it in n great way, but all was one. I cried, nay roared out, I was in such a passion. Then I got down the tree again, then up again, and thrust in my hand ngain till I scratched my arm and made it bleed, and cried all the while most violently Then I began to think I had not so much as a halfpenny of it left for a halfpenny roll, and I was hungry, and then I cried again Then I came away in despair, crying and roaring like a little boy that had been whipped, then I went back again to the tree, and up the tree again, and this I did several times.

The last time I had gotten up the tree, I happened to come down not on the same side that I went up and came down before, but on the other side of the tree, and on the other side of the bank also, and, behold, the tree had a great open place in the side of it close to the ground, as old hollow trees often have, and looking in the open place, to my inexpressible joy there lay my money and my linen rag, all wrapped up just as I had put it into the hole for the tree being hollow all the way up, there had been some moss or light stuff, which I had not judgment enough to know was not firm, that had given way when it came to drop out of my hand, and so it had slipped quite down at once

I was but a child, and I rejoiced like a child, for I holloed quite out loud when I saw it, then I ran to it and snatched it up, hugged and kissed the dirty rig a hundred times, then danced and jumped about, ran from one end of the field to the other, and, in short, I knew not what, much less do I know now what I did, though I shall never forget the thing, either what a sinking grief it was to my heart when I thought I had lost it, or what a flood of joy overwhelmed me when I had got it again.

While I was in the first transport of my joy, as I have said, I ran about and knew not what I did, but when that was over, I sat down, opened the foul clout the money was in, looked at it, told it, found it was all there, and then I fell a crying as violently as I did before, when I thought I had lost it.

[Jacque present] restored the pocket book, with the bills, to its owner, ] and the gentleman gave me £25 in good guineas. When he gave it me he bide me hold out my hand, and he told the money into my hand, and when he had done he asked me if it was right. I said I did not know, but I believed it was. 'Why,' says he, 'can't you tell it?' I told him no, I never saw so much money in my life, nor I did not know how to tell money. 'Why,' says he, 'don't you know that they are guineas?' No, I told him, I did not know how much a guinea was.

'Why, then,' says he, d'idid you tell me yon believed it was right?' I told him, because I believed he would not give it me wrong

'Poor child,' says he, 'thou knowest little of the world, indeed What art thou?'

'I am a poor boy,' says I, and eried

'What is your name?' says he 'But hold, I forgot,' said he, 'I promised I would not ask your name, so you need not tell me'

'My name is Jacque,' said I

'Why, have you no surname?' said he

'What is that?' said I

'You have some other name besides Jacque,' says he, 'han't you?'

'Yes,' says I, 'they call me Colonel Jacque.'

'But have you no other name?'

'No,' said I

'How came you to be Colonel Jacque, pray?'

'They say,' said I, 'my father's name was Colonel'

'Is your father or mother alive?' said he

'No,' said I, 'my father is dead'

'Where is your mother, then?' said he.

'I never had e'er a mother,' said I

This made him laugh 'What,' said he, 'had you never a mother? What, then?'

'I had a nurse,' said I, 'but she was not my mother'

'Well,' says he to the gentleman, 'I dare say this boy was not the thief that stole your bills.'

'Indeed, sir, I did not steal them,' said I, and cried

'No, no, child,' said he, 'we don't believe you did This is a very clever boy,' says he to the other gentlemen, 'and yet very ignorant and honest, 'tis pity some care should not be taken of him, and something done for him Let us talk a little more with him' So they sat down and drank wine, and gave me some, and then the first gentleman talked to me again

'Well,' says he, 'what wilt thou do with this money now thou hast it?'

'I don't know,' said I

'Where will you put it?' said he

'In my pocket,' said I

'In your pocket' said he 'Is your pocket whole? Shan't you lose it?'

'Yes,' said I, 'my pocket is whole'

'And where will you put it when you get home?'

'I have no home,' said I, and cried again

'Poor child!' said he 'Then what dost thou do for thy living?'

'I go of errands,' said I, 'for the folks in Rosemary Lane.'

'And what dost thou do for a lodging at night?'

'I he at the glass house,' said I, 'at night'

'How, he at the glass house! Have they any beds there?' says he.

'I never lay in a bed in my life,' said I, 'as I remember'

'Why,' says he, 'what do you he on at the glass house?'

'The ground,' says I, 'and sometimes a little straw, or upon the warm ashes'

Here the gentleman that lost the bills said, 'This poor child is enough to make a man weep for the miseries of human nature, and be thankful for himself, he puts tears into my eves' 'And into mine too,' says the other

'Well, but hark ye, Jacque,' says the first gentleman, 'do they give you no money when they send you of crrands?'

'They give me victuals,' said I, 'and that's better'

'But what,' says he, 'do you do for clothes?'

'They give me sometimes old things,' said I, 'such as they have to spare'

'Why, you have never a shirt on, I believe,' said he, 'have you?'

'No, I never had a shirt,' said I, 'since my nurse died'

'How long ago is that?' said he.

"Six winters, when this is out," said L

'Why, how old are you?' said he

'I can't tell,' said I

'Well,' says the gentleman, 'now you have this money, won't you buy some clothes and a shirt with some of it?'

'Yes,' said I, 'I would buy some clothes'

'And what will you do with the rest?'

'I can't tell,' said I, and cried

'What dost cry for, Jacque?' said he.

'I am afraid,' said I, and cried still.

'What art afraid of?'

'They will know I have money'

'Well, and what then?'

'Then I must sleep no more in the warm glass house, and I shall be starved with cold. They will take away my money'

'But why must you sleep there no more "

Here the gentlemen observed to one another how naturally anxiety and perplexity attend those that have money 'I warrant you,' says the clerk, 'when this poor boy had no money he slept all night in the straw, or on the warm ashes in the glass house, as soundly and as youd of care as it would be possible for any creature to do, but now, as soon as he has gotten money, the care of preserving it brings tears into his eyes and fear into his heart'

They asked me a great many questions more, to which I answered in my childish way as well as I could, but so as pleased them well enough. At last I was going away with a heavy pocket, and I assure you not a light heart, for I was so frighted with having so much money that I knew not what in the earth to do with myself. I went they however, and walked a little way, but I could not tell what to do, so, after rambling two hours or there about, I went back again, and sat down at the gentle man's door, and there I cried as long as I had any moisture in my head to make tears of, but never knocked at the door

I had not sat long, I suppose, but somebody belonging to the family got knowledge of it, and a maid came and talked to me, but I said little to her, only cried still At length it came to the gentleman's ears. As for the merchant, he was gone. When the gentleman heard of me he called me in, and began to talk with me again, and asked me what I stayed for

I told him I had not stayed there all that while, for I had been gone a great while, and was come again

'Well,' says he, 'but what did you come again for?'

'I can't tell,' says I

'And what do you cry so for?' said he 'I hope you have not lost your money, have you?'

No, I told him, I had not lost it yet, but was afraid I should

'And does that make you cry?' says he

I told him yes, for I knew I should not be able to keep it, but they would cheat me of it, or they would kill me and take it away from me too

'They?' says he. 'Who? What sort of gangs of people art thou with?'

I told him they were all boys, but very wicked boys, 'thickes and pickpockets,' said I, 'such as stole this letter case—a sad pack, I can't abide them'

'Well, Jacque,' said he, 'what shall be done for thee? Will you leave it with me? Shall I keep it for you?'

'Yes,' said I, 'with all my heart, if you please."

'Come, then,' says he, 'give it me, and that you may be sure that I have it, and you shall have it honestly again, I'll give you a bill for it, and for the interest of it, and that you may keep safe enough Nay,' added he, 'and if you lose it, or anybody takes it from you, none shall receive the money but yourself, or any part of it'

I presently pulled out all the money, and gave it to him, only keeping about 15s for myself to buy some clothes, and thus ended the conference between us on the first occasion, at least for the first time. Having thus secured my money to my full satisfaction, I was then perfectly easy, and accordingly the sad thoughts that afflicted my mind before began to vanish away.

(From the Life of Colonel Jacque)

Crusoe's Wonderful Escape

And now our case was very dismal indeed, for we all saw plainly that the sea weut so high that the boat could not live, and that we should be inevitably drowned. As to making sail, we had none, nor, if we had, could we have done anything with it, so we worked at the oar towards the land, though with heavy hearts, like men going to execution, for we all knew that, when the boat came nearer the shore, she would be dashed in a thousand pieces by the breach of the sea. However, we committed our souls to God in the most earnest manner, and the wind driving us towards the shore, we hastened our destruction with our own hands, pulling as well as we could towards land

What the shore was, whether rock or sand, whether steep or shoal, we knew not, the only hope that could rationally give us the least shadow of expectation was if we might happen into some bay or gulf, or the month of some river, where, by great chance, we might have run our boat in, or got under the lee of the land, and perhaps made smooth water. But there was nothing of this appeared, but, as we made nearer and nearer the shore, the land looked more frightful than the sea.

After we had rowed, or rather driveh, about a league and a half, as we reckoned it, a raging wave, mountain like, came rolling astern of us, and plainly bade us expect a watery grave. In a word, it took us with such a fury that it overset the boat at once, and, separating us as well from the boat as from one another, gave us not time hardly to say 'Oh God'' for we were all swallowed up in a moment.

Nothing can describe the confusion of thought which I felt when I sank into the water, for though I swam very well, yet I could not deliver myself from the waves so as to draw breath, till that wave having driven me, or rather carried me, a vast way on towards the shore, and, having spent itself, went back, and left me upon the land almost dry, but half dead with the water I took in. I had so much presence of min, as well as breath left, that, seeing myself nearer the lainland than I expected, I got upon my feet, and endea oured to make on towards the land as fast as I could, before another wave should return and take me up again But I soon found it was impossible to avoid it, for I saw the sea come after me as high as a great hill, and as furious as an enemy, which I had no means or strength to contend with—my busi ness was to hold my breath, and raise myself upon the water, if I could, and so, by swimming, to preserve my breathing, and pilot myself towards the shore, if possible -my greatest concern now being, that the sea, as it would carry me a great way towards the shore when it came on, might not carry me back again with it when it gave back towards the sea.

The wave that came upon me again, buried me at once twenty or thirty feet deep in its own body, and I could feel myself carried with a mighty force and swift ness towards the shore a very great way, but I held my breath, and assisted myself to swim still forward with all my might. I was ready to burst with holding my breath, when, as I felt myself rising np, so, to my immediate robef, I found my head and hands shoot out above the surface of the water, and though it was not two seconds of time that I could keep myself so, yet it relieved me greatly, gave me breath and new conrige. I was covered again with water a good while, but not so long but I held it out, and, finding the water had spent itself and begin to return, I struck forward against the return of the waves, and felt ground again with my feet. I stood still a few moments to recover breath, and till the water went from me, and then took to my heels, and ran with what strength I had farther towards the shore. But neither would this deliver me from the furiof the sea, which came pouring in after me again, and twice more I was lifted up by the waves and carried forwards as before, the shore being very flat

The last time of these two had well near been fatal to me, for the sea, having hurried me along as before, landed me, or rather dashed me, against a piece of a rock, and that with such force as it left me senseless, and indeed helpless, as to my own deliverance, for the blow taking my side and breast, beat the breath, as it were, quite out of my body, and, had it returned again imme diately. I must have been strangled in the water, but I recovered a little before the return of the waves, and, seeing I should be covered again with the water, I resolved to hold fast by a piece of the rock, and so to hold my breath, if possible, till the wave went back. Now, as the waves were not so high as at first, being near land, I held my hold till the wave abated and then fetched another run, which brought me so near the shore that the next wave, though it went over me, yet did not so swallow me up as to carry me away, and the next run I tool I got to the mainland, where to my great comfort I clambered up the cliffs of the shore, and sat me down npon the grass, free from danger, and onite out of the reach of the water I was now landed and safe on shore. and began to look up and thank God that my life was saved, m a case wherein there was, some minutes before, scarce any room to hope. ## Friday

He was a comely, handsome fellow, perfectly well made, with straight strong limbs, not too large, tall and well shaped, and, as I reckon, about twenty-six years of age. He had a very good countenance, not a fierce and surly aspect, but seemed to have something very manly in his face, and yet he had all the sweetness and softness of an European in his countenance too, especially when he smiled. His hair was long and black, not curled like wool, his forehead very high and large, and a great vivacity and sparkling sharpness in his eyes. The colour of his skin was not quite black, but very tawny, and yet not of an ugly, yellow, nauseous tawny, as the Brazilians and Virginians, and other natives of America are, but of a bright kind of a dun olive colour, that had in it some thing very agreeable, though not very easy to describe. His face was round and plump his nose small, not flat like the negroes, a very good mouth, thin lips, and his fine teeth well set, and white as ivory

After he had slumbered, rather than slept, about half an hour, he waked again, and comes out of the cave to me, for I had been milking my goats, which I had in the enclosure just by When he espied me, he came running to me, laying himself down again upon the ground, with all the possible signs of an humble, thinli ful disposition, making a many antic gestures to show it. At last he lays his head flat upon the ground, close to my foot, and sets my other foot upon his head, as he had done before, and after this made all the signs to me of subjection, servitude, and submission imaginable, to let me know how he would serve me as long as he lived. I under stood him in many things, and let him know I was very well pleased with him. In a little time I began to speak to him, and teach him to speak to me, and, first, I made him know his name should be Friday, which was the day I saved his life. I called him so for the memory of the time. I likewise taught him to say master, and then let him know that was to be my name. I likewise taught him to say Yes and No, and to know the meaning of them. I gave him some milk in an earthen pot, and let him see me drink it before him, and sop my bread in it, and I gave him a cake of bread to do the like, which he quickly complied with, and made signs that it was very good for him.

I kept there with him all that night, but as soon as it was day. I beckoned to him to come with me, and let him I now I would give him some clothes, at which he seemed very glad, for he was stark naked. As we went by the place where he had buried the two men, he pointed exactly to the place, and showed me the marks that he had made to find them again, making signs to me that we should dig them up again, and cat them this I appeared very angry, expressed my abhorrence of it, made as if I would vomit at the thoughts of it, and beckoned with my hand to him to come away, which he did immediately, with great submission. I then led him up to the top of the hill, to see if his enemies were gone, and pulling out my glass, I looked, and saw plainly the place where they had been, but no appearance of them or their canoes, so that it was plain that they were gone, and had left their two comrades behind them. without any search after them

When we had done this we came back to our castle. and there I fell to work for my man Friday, and first of all I gave him a pair of linen drawers, which I had out of the poor gunners chest I mentioned, and which I found in the wreek, and which with a little alteration fitted him very well. Then I made him a jerkin of goat's skin, as well as my skill would allow, and I was now grown a tolerable good tailor, and I gave him a cap, which I had made of a hare skin, very convenient and fashionable enough, and thus he was clothed for the present tolerably well, and was mighty well pleased to see himself almost as well clothed as his master true he went awkwardly in these things at first, wearing the drawers was very awkward to him, and the sleeves of the waistcoat galled his shoulders, and the juside of his arms, but a little easing them where he complained they hart him, and using himself to them, at length he took to them very well

The next day after I came home to my hutch with him, I began to consider where I should lodge him. And that I might do well for him, and yet be perfectly easy myself, I made a little tent for him in the vacant place between my two fortifications, in the inside of the last and in the outside of the first, and as there was a door or entrance there into my cave, I made a formal framed door-case, and a door to it of boards, and set it up in the passage, a little within the entrance, and causing the door to open on the inside, I barred it np in the night, taking in my ladders too, so that Friday could no way come at me in the inside of my innermost wall without making so much noise in getting over, that it must needs waken me, for my first wall had now a complete roof over it of long poles, covering all my tent, and leaning up to the side of the hill, which was aguin laid cross with smaller sticks instead of liths, and then thatched over a great thickness with the rice straw, which was strong, like reeds, and at the hole or place which was left to go in or out by the ladder, I had placed a kind of trap door, which, if it had been at tempted on the outside, would not have opened at all, but would have fallen down, and made a great noise, and as to weapons, I took them all into my side every night.

But I needed none of all this precaution, for never man had a more faithful, loving, sincere servant than Friday was to me, without passions, sullenness, or designs, perfectly obliged and engaged, his very affections were tied to me, like those of a child to a father, and I dare say he would have sacrificed his life for the saying mine, upon any occasion whitsoever. The many testimonies he give me of this put it out of doubt, and soon convinced me that I needed to use no precautions as to my safety on his account.

DEAR SIR—I thank you for all the instances of your friendship, both before and since my misfortunes. A little time will complete them, and separate you and me for ever But in what part of the world soever I am, I will live mindful of your sincere kindness to me, and will please myself with the thought that I still live in your esteem and affection as much as ever I did, and that no accident of life, no distance of time or place, will alter you in that respect. It never can me, who have loved and valued you ever since I knew you, and shall not fail to do it when I am not allowed to tell you so, as the case will Give my faithful services to Dr Arbuthuot, and thanks for what he sent me, which was much to the pur pose, if anything can be said to be to the purpose in a case that is already determined. Let him know my desence will be such, that neither my friends need blush for me, nor will my enemies have great occasion to triumph, though sure of the victory I shall want his advice before I go abroad in many things But I question whether I shall be permitted to see him or any body but such as are absolutely necessary towards the dispatch of my private affairs If so, God bless you both 1 and may no part of the ill fortune that attends me ever pursue either of you. I know not but I may call upon you at my hearing, to say somewhat about my way of spending my time at the deanery, which did not seem calculated towards manag ing plots and conspiracies But of that I shall consider You and I have spent many hours together upon much pleasanter subjects, and, that I may preserve the old custom, I shall not part with you now till I have closed this letter with three lines of Milton, which you will, I know, readily, and not without some degree of concern apply to your ever affectionate, &c.

William Whiston (1667-1752), an accom plished but eccentric theologian, born at Norton rectory in Leicestershire, became successively a Fellow of Clare College, Cambridge (1693), chaplain to the Bishop of Norwich, and (1698) rector of Lowestoft. He was ere this known as a zealous His Theory of the exponent of Newton's system Earth (1696), meant to supersede Thomas Burner's, brought him reputation, and in 1703 he was ap pointed Newton's successor as Lucasian professor of mathematics at Cambridge But for Arianism (Eusebianism he frankly professed) he was in 1710 deprived of his professorship and expelled from the university His Primitive Christianity Revived (1711-12) included the famous heretical essay on the Apostolic Constitutions, first sketched in a paper in 1708, which maintained that this work was the most sacred of the canonical books of the New Testament, and that the doctrine of the Trinity was unscriptural Whiston spent the remainder of his life in London, incessantly employed in writing, controversy, scientific crotchets, lectures, and the services of a 'Primitive Christian' congregation Though an Arian he was a strong supernaturalist, even anointing the sick and touchmg for the king's evil, and wrote vigorously against the deis's with v hom he was in the popular mind He was a transparently honest and associated sincere man, conscientious and outspoken, but full of scrupulosities, fads, and vagaries, who would unhesitatingly quarrel with his bread and butter for the merest trifles, and cheerfully confute his dearest friend. He was much taken up with the fulfilment of prophecy, the identification of the lost tribes with the Tartars, the approach of the millennium and the restoration of the Jews it should be remembered that he was one of the very first to illustrate his lectures (on astronomy, earthqual es, and a great variety of subjects) with experiments. Whiston may have been in Goldsmith's mind when he was depicting the simple minded vagaries of Dr Primrose. Mr Leslie Stephen has recorded fifty two publications by Whiston Of his standard (though far from impeccable) translation of Josephus (1737) there is a good edition by Shilleto (1890), his Life of Samuel Clarke (1730) was admirable, and the Primitive New Testairent (1745) is a curiosity His autobiographical Memoirs (1749, new cd 1753) truly reflect, even in their pragmatical and at times tedious detail, his attractive character as well as his foibles. # The Discovery of the Newtonian Philosophy

After I had taken holy orders, I returned to the college, and vent on with my ovn studies there, par ticularly the mathematics and the Cartesian philosophy, hich was alone in sogue with us at that time. But it cas not long before I, with immense pains but no assistance, set myself with the utmost zeal to the study of Sir Iraac Newton's vonderful discoveries in his Philosophia Naturalis Principia Mathematica, one or two of vluch lectures I had heard lum read in the public schools, though I understood them not at all at that time, being in leed greatly excited thereto by a paper of Dr Gregory's when he was processor in Scotland, wherein he had given the most prodigious commendations to that v orl, as not only right in all things, but in a manner the effect of a plainly divine genius, and had already caused several of his scholars to keep acts, as we call them, upon several branches of the Newtonian philosophy, while we at Cambridge, poor v retches, were ignominiously studying the fictitious hypotheses of the Cartesian, which Sir Isaac Newton had also himself done formerly, as I have heard him say What the occasion of Sir Isaac Newton's leaving the Cartesian philosophy, and of discovering his amazing theory of gravity, was, I have heard him long ago, soon after m, first acquaintance with him, which was 1694, thus relate, and of which Dr Pemberton gives the like account, and somewhat more fully, in the prefice to his explication of his philosophy. It was this, inclination came into Sir Isaac's mind to try whether the same power did not keep the moon in her orbit, notwithstanding her projectile velocity, which he Fnew always tended to go along a straight line the tangent of that orbit, which makes stones and all heavy bodies with us fall downward, and which we call gravity, taking this postulatum, which had been thought of before, that such power might decrease in a duplicate proportion of the distances from the earth's centre. Upon Sir Isaae's first trial, when he took a degree of a great circle on the earth's surface, whence a degree at the distance of the moon was to be determined also, to be sixty measured miles only, according to the gross measures then in use, he was in some degree disappointed, and the power that restrained the moon in her orbit, measured by the versed sines of that orbit, appeared not to be quite the same that was to be expected had it been the power of gravity alone by which the moon was there influenced Upon this disappoint ment, which made Sir Isaac suspect that this power was partly that of gravity and partly that of Cartesius's vortices, he threw aside the paper of his calculation, and went to other studies However, some time afters and when Monsieur Picart had much more exactly measured the earth, and found that a degree of a great circle was sixty nine and a half such miles, Sir Isaae, in turning over some of his former papers, lighted upon this old imperfect calculation, and, correcting his former error. discovered that this power, at the true correct distance of the moon from the earth, not only tended to the earth's center, as did the common power of gravity with us, but was exactly of the right quantity, and that if a stone was carried up to the moon, or to sixty semi diameters of the earth, and let fall downward by its gravity, and the moon's own menstrual [monthly] motion was stopped, and slic was let fall by that power which before retained her in her orlnt, they would exactly fall towards the same point, and with the same velocity which was therefore no other power than that of gravity And since that power appeared to extend as far as the moon, at the distance of 240,000 miles, it was but natural, or rather necessary, to suppose it might reach twice, thrice, four times, &c., the same distance, with the same diminution, according to the squares of such distances perpetually which noble discovery proved the happy occasion of the invention of the wonderful Newtonian philosophy

Samuel Clarke (1675-1729), born at Norwich, was the son of the M P for the town, and at Caus College, Cambridge, studied physics, philosophy, and theology The Cartesian system then held almost universal sway, but Clarke adopted the views of Newton, and expounded them in his edition of Rohault's Physics He took orders in Chaplain from 1698 to Bishop Moore of Norwich, in 1706 he became chaplain to Queen Anne, and in 1709 rector of St James's, Westminster By his work on the Trinity (1712), in which he denied that that doctrine was held by the early Church, he raised the controversy in which Waterland was his chief opponent. His own views seem to have a distinctly Arian character or tendency, and when he was charged with heresy, the form in \ hich he stated his adherence to orthodoxy was held by some to be a conscious evasion. He recanted nothing, but promised not to write more on the subject, and escaped the fate that had befallen Whiston four years earlier Clarke was a vigorous antagonist of the deists, he wrote against materialism, empiricism, and necessitarianism, and maintained the essential immortality of the soul He trught that the fundamental truths of morals were as absolutely certain as the truths of mathematics, space and time he held to be attributes of an infinite and immaterial being. His famous Discourse concerning the Being and Attributes of God, originally the Boyle Lectures of 1704-5, was in answer to Hobbes, Spinoza, Blount, and the freethinkers, and contained the famous de monstration of the existence of God, often, but inaccurately, called an a priori argument. He expressly says of some points in his argument that they are not easily proved a priori, and as expressly proves them a posteriori, using these terms The main propositions in this celebrated argument as given in summary by Clarke himself

(1) That something has existed from eternity, (2) That there has existed from eternity some one immutable and independent being, (3) That that immutable and independent being, which has existed from eternity, without any external cause of its existence, must be self existent, that is, necessarily existing, (4) What the substance or essence of that being, which is self-existent or necessarily existing is we have no idea, neither is it at all possible for us to comprehend it, (5) That though the substance or essence of the self cristent being is itself absolutely incomprehensible to us, yet many of the essential attributes of his nature are strictly demonstrable, as well as his existence, and, in the first place, that he must be of necessity eternal, (6) That the self-existent being must of necessity be infinite and omnipresent, (7) Must be but one, (8) Must be an intelligent being, (9) Must be not a necessary agent, but a being indued with liberty and choice, (10) Must of necessity have infinite power, (11) Must be infinitely wise, and (12) Must of necessity be a being of infinite goodness, justice, and truth, and all other moral perfections, such as become the supreme governor and judge of the world

Clarke, who was after Locke the most notable English philosopher of the day, was opposed to Locke in the whole attitude of his mind, and might in contrast to Locke be described as an a priori philosopher He was more decidedly a metaphysician, more inclined to speculation, more given to drawing large conclusions from abstract postulates and propositions, an intuitionalist in ethics, metaphysics, and theology He was rather admirably skilful in the controversial handling of philosophical commonplaces than an original thinker, a keen and powerful dialectician than a profound theologian or philosopher But though without any gift of style other than the power of making himself as clear as the argument permitted, he was for many years the most conspicuous English writer in the domain of philosophy and theology, and in morals he ranks as founder of the intellectual school of which Wollaston and Price were exponents, affirming that the nature of good and evil, the obligation to virtue, are evident from the principles of reason, and that immorality means a perversity of obtuseness of intelligence. Pope assailed his 'high priori road' in the Dunciad; Bolingbroke often attacked his views and other latitudinarian Churchmen were devoted disciples, Butler, Berkeley, Hutcheson, were cor Clarke's keen correspondence with respondents Leibnitz (published in 1717) dealt with space and time and their relations to God, and with He wrote as forcibly on the moral freedom proportion of force to velocity as on the being of God, translated Newton's Optics into Latin for him, and published editions of Cæsar and of the Iliad, the latter with a Latin version mainly original, though the notes were compiled from The following (from the great various quarters Discourse, Part II) is a statement by Clarke on the

Essential Difference between Right and Wrong

The principal thing that can with any colour of reason seem to conntenance the opinion of those who deny the natural and eternal difference of good and evil the difficulty there may sometimes be to define exactly the bounds of right and wrong, the variety of opinions that have obtained even among understanding and learned men concerning certain questions of just and unjust, especially in political matters, and the many contrary laws that have been made in divers ages and in different countries concerning these matters. But asin painting two very different colours, by diluting each other very slowly and gradually, may, from the highest intenseness in either extreme, terminate in the midst insensibly, and so run one into the other that it shall not be possible even for a skilful eye to determine exactly where the one ends and the other begins, and yet the colours may really differ as much as can be, not in degree only but entirely in kind, as red and blue, or white and black so though it may perhaps be very difficult in some nice and perplexed cases (which yet are very far from occurring frequently) to define exactly the bounds of right and wrong, just and unjust-and there may be some latitude in the judgment of different men, and the laws of divers nations-jet right and wrong are nevertheless in themselves totally and essen tially different, even altogether as much as white and black, light and darkness. The Spartan law, perhaps, which permitted their youth to steal, may, as absurd as it was, bear much dispute whether it was absolutely unjust or no, because, every man having an absolute right in his own goods, it may seem that the members of any society may agree to transfer or alter their own properties upon what conditions they shall think fit. But if it could be supposed that a law had been made at Sparta, or at Rome, or in India, or in any other part of the world, whereby it had been commanded or allowed that every man might rob by violence, and murder whomsoever he met with, or that no faith should be kept with any man, nor any equitable compacts per formed, no man, with any tolerable use of his reason, whatever diversity of judgment might be among them in other matters, would have thought that such ? lan could have authorised or excused, much less have justified such actions, and have made them become good because 'tis plainly not in men's power to make falsehood be truth, though they may alter the property of their goods as they please. Now if in flagrant cases the natural and essential difference between good and evil, right and wrong, cannot but be confessed to be plainly and undeniably evident, the difference between them must be also essential and unalterable in all, even the smallest and nicest and most intricate cases, though it be not so easy to be discerned and accurately distin guished. For if, from the difficulty of determining exactly the bounds of right and wrong in many per plext cases, it could truly be concluded that just and unjust were not essentially different by nature, but only by positive constitution and custom, it would follow equally that they were not really, essentially, and unalterably different, even in the most flagrant cases that can be supposed Which is an assertion so very absurd that Mr Hobbes himself could hardly vent it without blushing, and discovering plainly, by his shifting expressions, his secret self condemnation. There are therefore certain necessary and eternal differences of things, and certain fitnesses or unfitnesses of the application of different things, or different relations one to another, or depending on any positive constitutions, but founded unchangeably in the nature and reason of things, and unavoidably arising from the difference of the things themselves.

See the Life by Hoadly prefixed to his collected works (4 vols. 1738-42) that by Whiston (1741) and a German one by R. Zimmer mann (Vienna, 1870)

John Toland (1669-1722) was born of Catholic parents near the village of Redcastle in He entered the University County I ondonderry of Glasgow in 1687, but removing to Edinburgh, abandoned the Roman Catholic faith and passed MA in 1690 At Leyden, where he spent two years, he studied theology under Spanheim, and made the acquaintance of the famous Le Clerc, foremost and most accomplished of the 'advanced' theologians of Europe, and distinctly 'unsound' on the inspiration of the Scriptures He resided for a time at Oxford, and in the Bodleian collected the materials of more than one of his later publications In Christianity not Mysterious (1696) he expressly claimed to accept all the essentials of Christianity, but maintained that the value of religion could not lie in any unintelligible element, and that no part of the truth could be contrary to reason He chose his title with evident reference to Locke's Reasonableness of Christianity (1695), and professed to have at heart the defence of revelation against deists and atheists But the anti supernatural and freethinking tendency-and disguised intention-of the work was obvious, it greatly perturbed the theological world, began the 'deistical controversy' that occupied so much of the early eighteenth century, and led to several replies (as by Stillingfleet) Locke somewhat anxiously sought to diswow community of thought. Prosecuted in Middlesex, Toland withdrew to Ireland, but when by vote of the Irish House of Commons his book was burned publicly by the common hangman, and a prosecution decided on, he fled back to London He annoyed Shaftesbury by surreptitiously publishing his Inquiry in 1699.

In Amyntor (1699) and other works he fairly rused the question as to the comparative evidence for the canonical and apocryphal scriptures, with professed candour but unmistakably mischievous intent. pamphlet entitled Anglia Libera, on the succession of the House of Brunswick, led to his being received with favour by the Princess Sophia when he accompanied the English ambassador to the court of Hanover, and from 1707 to 1710 he lived in Berlin and various Continental towns His after-life was that of a literary adventurer, and fills a painful chapter in D'Israeli's Calamities of Authors was apparently employed as an agent by Harley, and he did some political pamphleteering-latterly against Jacobitism and High-Church views Nazarenus (1720) he insisted, somewhat on the lines developed by Semler and the Tubingen school, that there were two distinctly opposed parties in the early Christian Church-one Judaistic (which he identified with the Ebionites), and one Pauline or liberal His Pantheisticon, a pan theistic liturgy for a hypothetical society of new light philosophers, was regarded as an offensive parody of the Anglican Prayer-book. He resided from the year 1718 at Putney, and there he died

Besides the works named, and various defences, apologies, and pamphlets, he wrote a Life of Milton, prefixed to an edition of the prose works (1698), which gave room for criticisms of Church polity and implicit commendation of unorthodoxy, an Account of Prussia and Hanovei (1705), Adeisidamon (1709), Origines Judaica (1709), and a History of the Druids Hodegus explains that the pillar of cloud and fire was not meant by the author of the Pentateuch to be taken as miraculous, but was a portable fire or ambulatory beacon carried on a proper machine on a pole, such as we know were used by the ancient Persians, and in the twenty-two short chapters of Hypatia, written when Whiston was suffering for his heresies, he finds plenty of room for assailing the pride, malice, cruelty, and unscrupulousness of the Churchmen of all ages

He was an acute and audicious pioneer of free thought, versatile but vain, unseasonably aggressive in diffusing his new light, and widely read rather than really learned, and he wrote with point and vigour His grasp of some of the problems of early Christian history was really remarkable, and seems to have had some influence on German rationalism. His precarious life cut him off from the chance of scholarly research, but he was quite unjustly despised by the orthodox Defoe-not himself a model character-reflects the general attitude towards deists. Reporting the death of 'the late eminent or rather notorious Mr Toland,' he was sadly scandalised at Toland's character and history, 'how he lias for many years employed the best parts and a great stock of reading to the worst purposes, namely, to shock the faith of Christians in the glorious person and divinity of their Redeemer, and to sap and undermine the principles of the orthodox faith.' And he held that the premature death of one 'who has been so great an enemy of revealed religion, so open an opposer of orthodox principles, and had so often blasphemed the divinity of our blessed Redeemer,' confirms his own observation that 'he never knew an open blasphemer of God live to be an old man'

From the Life of Milton.

He was never very healthy, nor too siekly, and the distemper that troubled him most of any other was the gont, of which he died without much pain in the year from the birth of Christ 1674, and in the six and sixtieth of his age. All his learned and great friends in London, not without a friendly concourse of the vulgar, accompanied his body to the church of St Giles near Cripple gate, where he lies buried in the chancel, and where the piety of his admirers will shortly erect a monument becoming his worth, and the incouragement of letters in king William's reign

Thus lived and died John Milton, a person of the best accomplishments, the happiest genius, and the vastest learning which this nation, so renowned for producing excellent writers, could ever yet shew esteemed indeed at home, but much more honoured abroad, where almost in his childhood he made a considerable figure, and continues to be still reputed one of the brightest lumi names of the sciences He was middle sized and well proportioned, his deportment erect and manly, his hair of a light brown, his features exactly regular, his com plexion wonderfully fair when a vouth, and ruddy to the He was affable in conversation, of an equal and cheerful temper, and bighly delighted with all sorts of music, in which he was himself not ineanly skilled He was extraordinary temperat in his diet, which was any thing most in season or the easiest procured, and was no friend to sharp or strong liquors His recreations, before his sight was gone, consisted much in feats of activity, particularly in the exercise of his arms, which he could handle with dexterity but when blindness and age confined him, he played much upon an organ he kept in the house, and had a pully to swing and keep him in motion But the love of books exceeded all his other passions In summer he would be stirring at four in the morning, and in winter at five, but at night he used to go to bed by nine, partly attributing the loss of his eys to his late watching when he was a student, and looking on this custom as very permicious to health at any time but when he was not disposed to rise at his usual hours, he always had one to read to him by his bedside. As he looked upon true and absolute freedom to be the greatest happiness of this hfc, whether to societies or single persons, so he thought constraint of any sort to be the utmost misery for which reason he used to tell those about him the intire satisfaction of his mind, that he had constantly imployed his strength and faculties in the defence of liberty, and in a direct opposition to slavery He ever exprest the profoundest reverence to the Deity as well in deeds as words, and would say to his friends, that the divine properties of goodness, justice, and merey were the adequate rule of human actions, nor less the object of imitation for privat advantages, than of admiration or respect for their own excellence and perfection his early days he was a favorer of those Protestants then opprobriously called by the name of Puntans In his middle years he was best pleased with the Inde pendents and Anabaptists, as allowing of more liberty than others, and coming nearest in his opinion to the primitive practice but in the latter part of his life, he was not a profest member of any particular sect among Christians, he frequented none of their assemblies, nor made use of their particular rites in his family Whether this proceeded from a dislike of their uncharitable and endless disputes, and that love of dominion, or inclina tion to persecution, which, he said, was a piece of Popery inseparable from nil churches, or whether he thought one might be a good man without subscribing to any parts, and that they had all in some things corrupted the institutions of Jesus Christ, I will by no means adventure to determine for conjectures on such occasions are very uncertain, and I never met with any of his acquaintance who could be positive in assign ing the true reasons of his conduct

I shall now conclude this discourse with a character given of him by a man of unparalleled diligence and industry, who has disobliged all sides merely for telling the truth either intirely or without disguise, and who, since most men have the fruity of ingaging in factions, cannot be suspected of partiality in favor of Milton. He was a person, says Anthony Wood in the first volume of his Athena Oxomenses, of wonderful parts, of a very sharp, biting, and satyrical wit, he was a good philosopher and historian, an excellent poet, Latinist, Grecian, and Hebrician, a good mathematician and musician, and so rarely endowed by nature, that had he' bin but honestly principled, he might have bin lightly useful to that party against which he all along appeared with much malice and bitterness.

There is a Life by Des Maizeaux prefixed to two vols of ToLind's posthumous works (1747), and a monograph by Berthold John Toland und der Monsmus der Gegenvart (Heidelb 1876). For Toland's parinal anticipation of Semler and Baur, see an article in the Theological Review, 1877

Matthew Tindal (1656-1733), destical writer, born at Beerferris rectory, South Devon, was elected a Fellow of All Souls College, Oxford A Roman Catholic under James II, he reverted to Protestantism of a freethinking type, and wrote An Essay of Obidience to the Supreme Powers (1693) and Rights of the Christian Church asserted against the Romish and all other Priests (1706) The latter raised a storm of opposition, but even 1 prosecution failed to prevent a fourth edition in 1709 In 1730 Tindal published his Christianity as old as the Creation, which was soon known as 'The Deist's Bible,' its aim is not merely to state the case in favour of natural religion, but, less directly, to infer the superfluousness of any other He seems to admit an actual revelation confirm ing natural religion, but, seeing that in this case there was nothing new revealed, the result is to eliminate the supernatural element from Cliris tianity, and to prove that its morality is its only 'Answers' clum to the reverence of mankind were innumerable, and the deistical controversy was an outstanding topic of interest to all educated men, to laymen as much as to those theologically educated The note of the deistical writers was their reliance on common-sense argument rather than on theological learning, though they freely availed themselves of all arguments they had access to And they addressed not theologians but the general public. The form of the argument is a dialogue between A and B, it is plainly a very one sided discussion

From 'The Deist's Bible'

A I desire no more than to be allowed, that there's a religion of nature and reason written in the hearts of every one of us from the first creation, by which all mankind must judge of the truth of any instituted religion whatever, and if it varies from the religion of nature and reason in any one particular, nay, in the minutest circumstance, that alone is an argument which makes all things clsc that can be said for its support totally meffectual If so, must not natural religion and external revelation, like two tallies, exactly answer one another, without any other difference between them but as to the manner of their being delivered? And how can it be otherwise? Can laws be imperfect, where a legislator is absolutely perfect? Can time discover any thing to him which he did not foresee from eternity? And as his wisdom is always the same, so is his good ness, and consequently from the consideration of both these, his laws must always be the same -Is it not from the infinite wisdom and goodness of God, that you suppose the gospel a most perfect law, incapable of being repealed, or nitered, or of having additions, and must not you own the law of nature as perfect a law, except you will say, that God did not arrive to the perfection of wisdom and goodness till about seventeen hundred years since >

To plead that the gospel is incapable of any additions, because the will of God is immitable, and his law too perfect to need them, is an argument, was Christianity a new religion, which destroys itself, since from the time it commenced, you must own God is mutable, and that such additions have been made to the all perfect laws of infinite wisdom as constitute a new religion reason why the law of nature is immutable is because it is founded on the unalterable reason of things, but if God is an arbitrary Being, and can command things meerly from will and pleasure, some things to day, and others to morrow there is nothing either in the nature of God or in the things themselves to hinder him from perpetually changing his mind. If he once commanded things without reason, there can be no reason why he may not endlessly change such commands

Anthony Collins (1676-1729), deist, born near Hounslow, passed from Eton o King's College, Cambridge, and became the disciple and friend of John Locke. In 1707 he published his Lissay concerning the Use of Reason, in 1709 Priesteraft in Perfection. In Holland he made the friendship of Le Clerc, in 1713 his Discourse on Iree thinling, that to which Bentley replied in his famous Remarks, attracted much attention, and explicitly insisted on the value and necessity of unprejudiced inquiry in religious matters. One great argument for it is the mutually destructive dogmas of priests throughout the world, in all faiths and Churches. While there is no direct polemic against the truths of revealed religion, the way the 'ever blessed Trinity' is referred to manifestly does not suggest faith in it, and there is an obvious aim to shake confidence in the canon of Scripture and its infallibility. In his Grounds and Reasons of the Christ an Religion, published in 1724, Collins argues that Christianity is founded on Judaism, and that its main support is the argument for the fulfilment of the prophecies. And yet no interpretation of them will stand a strict and non-allegorical fulfilment in the New Testament. The inference is not directly drawn, but is patent enough. In the course of the book lie gives most of the arguments now held to prove that Daniel deals with past or contemporaneous events and dates from the Maccabean period

From the 'Discourse on Free-thinking'

The priests throughout the world differ about Scrip tures, and the authority of Scriptures. The Pramins have a book of Scripture called the Shasters Persees have their Zundavastaw [Zend avesta] Bonzes of China have books written by the disciples of To he [Buddha], whom they call the God and Saviour of the world, who was born to teach the way of salva tion, and to give satisfaction for all mens sins Talapoins of Siam have a book of Seripture written by Sommonocodom [Sakya muni, Buddha] who, the Siamese say, was born of a virgin, and was the God expected by the universe Dervices have their Alchoran. The rabbis among the Saniaritans, who now live at Siehem in Palestine, receive the five books of Moses (the copy whereof is very different from ours) as their Scripture, together with a Chronicon, or history of themselves from Moses's time, quite different from that contained in the historical books of the Old Testament. This Chronicon is lodged in the public library of Leyden, and lins never been published in print. The rabbis among the common herd of Jews received for Scripture the four and twenty books of the Old Testament. The priests of the Roman Church, of the Lighsh and other Protestant Churches, receive for Scripture the four and twenty books of the Old Testament, and all the books of the New Testament hut the Roman receives several other books, called Apocrypha, as canonical, which all the Protestant churches utterly reject, except the Church of England, which differently from all other Christian churches, receives them as half canonical, reading some parts of them in their churches, and thereby excluding some chapters of canonical Scripture from being read The prests of all Christian churches differ among themselves in each church about the copies of the same books of Scripture, some reading them according to one manuscript, and others according to another But the great dispute of all is concerning the Hebrew and Septungint, between which two there is a great difference, (the latter maling the world 1500 years older than the former ) to name no other differences of greater or less importance.

Lastly, As the most ancient Christian churches and priests received several gospels and books of Scripture which are now lost, such as the Gospel according to the Hebrews, the Gospel according to the Lgyptians, the Traditions of Matthias, &c., and as not one father in the two first centuries (whose works now remain) but received books of Scripture which are either lost to us, or that we reject as Apoers phal so the several sects of Christians in the East and in Africa receive at this day some bools of Scripture, which are so far lost to us, that we know only their names, and others which we have and reject As for instance, the Reverend Dr Grabe tells us of a book received by the Copticks, called the Secrets of Peter, of which we have no copy, and Lu lolphus tells us that the Abyssinian Christians receive the Apostolick Constitutions, and Postellus brought from the Last, where it was in use, the Gospel of James both which we reject as Apocryphal

The same books of Scripture have, among the e priests who receive them, a very different degree of authority, some attributing more, and others less authority to them. The Popish priests contend that the text of Scripture is so corrupted, precarious, and unintel ligible, that we are to depend on the authority of their church for the true particulars of the Christian religion Others, who contend for a greater perfection in the text of Scripture, differ about the inspiration of those books some contending that every thought and word are in spired, some that the thoughts are inspired, and not the words, some that those thoughts only are inspired which relate to fundamentals, and others that the books were written by honest men with great care and faithfulness, without any inspiration either with respect to the thoughts or words. In like manner, the Bramins, Persees, Bonzes Talapoins, Dervices, Rabbis, and all other priests who build their religion on books, must from the nature of things vary about books in the same religion, about the inspiration, and copies of those books

The priests differ about the sense and meaning of those books they receive as sacred. This is evident from the great number of sects in each religion, founded on the diversity of senses put on their several Scriptures. And the the books of the Old and New Testament are the immediate dictates of God himself, and all other Scriptures are the books of imposters, are the priests of the Christian church (like the priests of all other churches) not only divided into numberless sects, on account of their different interpretations of them, but even the priests of the same sect differ endlessly in opinion about their sense and meaning

To set this matter before you in the clearest manner, and to possess you with the justest idea of the differences among priests about the sense and meaning of their Scriptures, and to make my argument the stronger for the duty and necessity of free thinking, I will confine myself to the most divine of all books, and by conse quence the best adapted of any to prevent diversity of opinion, and will take the following method will give you an idea of the nature of our holy books, whereby you'll see the foundation therein laid for a diversity of opinions among the priests of the Christian And, Secondly, I will give you a specimen of the diversity of opinions among the priests of the Church of England, pretended to be deduced from them for all their differences are too great to be enumerated From whence you'll easily infer, that there must be an infinite number of opinions among all other sorts of priests as to the meaning of their Scriptures, since the most divine of all books lays such a foundation for difference of opinion, that priests of the same sect are not able to agree, tho neither art, nor force, nor in terest are wanting to compel them to an agreement of opinion.

Thomas Woolston (1669-1731), the son of a Northampton currier, became a Fellow of Sidney Sussey, Cambridge, tool orders, and was in 1677 elected ecclesiastical lecturer in the university An enthusiastic student of Origen, in 1705 he published the Old Apology for the Truth of the Christian Religion, affirming that the Mosaic story was allegorical, a prophetic parable of Christ. But from being a sound and dignified scholar and a popular preacher, he became gradually so aggressive in his criticism on the clergy and those who abode by the literal interpretation of Scripture that his friends thought him a little crazed. The Moderator bet-veen the Infidel and the Apostate (developed in a second series, 1721-23) was to show that the gospel miracles could not prove Christ to be the Messiah, he disputed the reality of the incarnation in a virgin and of the resurrec tion, and developed a facctious vein that was as offensive as his thesis, and in 1721 his college deprived him of his fellowship. In his famous six Discourses on the Miracles of Clrist (1727-29, with two Defences) he maintained that the gospel narra tives taken literally were a tissue of absurdines Sixty answers were made to the Discourses, and an indictment for blasphemy was brought against Woolston He was sentenced to a years imprison ment and a fine of £100, and unable to pay so considerable a sum, this partial anticipator of the mythical theory of Strauss died, a martir to his convictions, within the rules of King's Bench His works were collected in 1733 with a Life.

From the 'Defence.'

I have promised the world, what, by the assistance of God, and the leave of the Government shall be published, a Discourse on the mischiels and inconveniences of in hired and established priesthood in which it shall be shown (1) That the preachers of Christianity in the first ages of the church (when the gespel was far and near spread, and triumphed over all opposition of Jen and Gentiles) neither received nor insisted on any wages for their pains, but were against preaching for hire and, as if they had been endewed with the spirit of prophers, before an hireling priesthood was establi hed, predicted their abolition and ejection out of Christ's church, (II) That since the establishment of an lire for the presthood, the progress of Christianity has not only been stopt, but lot ground, the avance, ambition, and power of the clergy having been of such unspeakable mischief to the world, as is enough to make a mans heart ake to think, read, or write of, (III) That upon an abolition of our present established priesthood, and on God's call of his own ministers, the profes ion of the gospel will again spread, and virtne, religion, and learning will more than ever flourish and abound The elergy are forewarned of my design to publish such a Discourse, and this is the secret reason, what ever openly they may pretend, of their accusations against me for blasphemy and infidelity and industry will be never wanting to prevent the pubheation of this Discourse neither need I doubt of persecution, if they can excite the Government to it, to that end

In my first Discourse on Miracles, I happened to treat on that of Jeas's driving the buyers and sellers out of the Temple, which, upon the authority of the Lathers. I showed to be a figure of his future election of hishons. priests, and deacons out of his church for making merchandise of the goopel. The Bi hop has taken me and that mirrele to task, and if ever any man smiled at another's impertinence, I then heartily laughed when I read him I begred of the Bishop before hand no to meddle with that mirrele, because it was a hot one, and would burn his fingers. But for all my caution he has been so fool hard as to venture upon it, but has really toucaed and handled it as if it was a barning coal He takes it up, and as soon drops it again to blow his fingers, then endeavours to throw a little water on this and that part of it to cool it, but all would not do. The most fiery part of it, viz. that of its being a type of Tesus's future ejection of mercenary preachers out of the church he has not, I may say it, at all touched, except b, calling it my allegorical in ective against the Mein tenance of the Clergs, which is such a piece of Conn than effrontery in the Bishop, that was he not resolved to be and defame at all rates, for the support of their interests, he could never have had the face to have uttered. If the Bishop had pro-ed that that imraele (which literally was such a ---, as I dare not now call it) neither was not could be a shadow and resemblance of Iesu's ejection of hired priests out of the church at his second Advent, and that the Fathers were not of this on mon, he had I nocked me down at once done nothing of this, so he might have spared his pains in support of the letter of this story. But I shall have a great deal of diversion with the Bishop when I come, in a proper place, to defend my exposition of that mirrole. In the mean time, as the Bi hop has published one of the Articles of my Christian Laith, thinking to render me odious for it so here I vill insert ano her, viz. 'I believe upon the authority of the I athers, that the spirit and pover of Jesus vall soon enter the church and expel hirching priess, who male merchandie of the cospel, out of h r, after the manner he is supposed to have driven the buvers and sellers out of the Temple !

Thomas Chubb (1679-1747), deist, was born at East Harnham near Salisbury. His father a malister, died early, so that the children were poorly educated and early sent to work. Thomas was fir t apprenticed to a glover in Salishury but his eye sucht falling, in 1705 he became a tallor-chandler He had already contrived to do a good deal of reading when a perusal of the 'historical preface' to Whis on's Primit of Christianity Kerrold impelled him to write his own tract, Tre Sufrence, of the Father Assert, t, which Whiston helped him to publish in 1715. # From 'Remarks on the Scriptures'

Among t the many complaints made against me, occasioned by the publication of my dissertations, this I apprehend to be the principal, namely, that I have fallen foul of the lible, and have not paid it the defer ence which I ought, and that, in con equence thereof, I have dug up foundations, and greatly unsettled the minds of men. So that the present que tions ar, how, or in what respect, have I fallen foul of the Bible? What foundations have I day up? And what minds have I unscitled thereby? And first, how, or in what respect, have I fallen foul of the I thle? And wherein I ave I fallen short of paying it the deference it has a right to claim? Why, truly, I have taken the likety to enquire into the conduct and behaviour of some of our Old Testa ment spints, which stand upon record in it. I have also withheld my assen from such facts therein related, and from such propositions therein contained as have the marks of incredibility upon them, when having 10 other evidence to support them than the bare an hority of the writer And is this all? To which it may perhaps, be thought sufficient to answer that this minis ers just ground for complaint. they may have had very different views, as that has been preity much the case of writers at all times, and there fore, I think, it is not doing justice to the Deity to call it, in the gross, the revealed will and word of God, whint ever some parts of it may be conceived to be Bible is such a composition as that the most opposite tenets are extracted from it, as the many controversies that now, and at all times past, have subsisted in the Christian church do plainly demonstrate, and by this means it has been the groundwork of most of the heresies and schisms that have taken place in Christendom, and has occasioned great confusion, each one appealing to the Bible as the standard which their pretensions are to be And the' the various denominations of Chris tians have racked their inventions or conceiving powers in order to reconcile its most disagreeing parts, yet, alas i it is as easy to make the two pole stars meet in a point as fairly to make all the parts of this composition center in any one of the many systems that have been grounded This collection of writings has been the parent of doctrines most dishonourable to God and most inju rions to men, such as the doctrines of absolute unconditional election and reprobation, of religious persecution, This being the case, it furnishes out a reason, more than sufficient, to engage every considerate man, who would see with his own eyes, would follow the guidance of his own understanding, and thereby would act consonant to his intelligent nature, carefully to read, and attentively to consider what he reads in the Bible, thereby to prevent his being misled, and this, I pre sume, is a sufficient apology for my doing as I have done with relation thereto

Besides, this book, called the holy Bible, contains many things that are greatly below and unworthy of the Supreme Deity That God should specially interpose to acquaint men with, and to transmit to posterity, such trifling observations as that two are better than one, that which is crooked cannot be made streight, that which is wanting cannot be numbered, and the like, or that he should spirit men with, approve of, or countenance such malevolent desires as these. Let his children be fatherless and his wife a widow, let his children be continually ragibonds, and beg, let them also seek their bread out of their desolate places, let the extortioner catch all that he hath, and let the stranger spoil his labour, let there be none to extend mercy to him, neither let there be any to favour his fatherless children, let his posterity be eut off, and in the generation following let their name be I say that such trifling observations, and blotted out such malevolent desires as these, should be considered as the offering of God is playing at hazard indeed the travels and ndventures of Nuomy and her two sons, Mahlon and Chilion, into the country of Morb (as in the book of Ruth) is true, perhaps, may not be disputed, but that God should specially interpose to transmit such an insignificant relation to posterity, when we have nothing to ground the supposition upon, seems to me to be taking too great a liberty with the character and conduct of the Deity There are many things con tained in that collection of writings commonly called the Bible that are much below and unworthy of the most perfect intelligence and boundless goodness, that these should be made the act of the Supreme Deity, should be declared to be a revelation from and the very worl of God, without so much as a seeming reason or ground for so doing, any otherwise than to support the religious systems men have imbibed, or, perhaps, the schemes of worldly policy they are engaged in, this, surely, is not acting properly, nor even justly, by the common and kind parent of the universe. For men thus to father upon God whatever they please is taking such a liberty with the character and conduct of the supreme Deity as no honest upright man would take with that of his neighbour and if such practising should not come under the denomination of blaspliemy, which it scarcely falls short of, yet it must, at least, be a very strange kind of piets. Yea, such is the extraordinary piety of this age (like that of doing honour and service to God by killing his servants), that if a man, in conscience of that dnty he owes to his maker, takes upon him to vindicate the moral character of the Deity in opposition to the religious system in vogue, or what passes for current orthodoxy, he may be sure to fall under the imputation of being a free thinker, a Deist (those terms being used in a bad sense), or, perhaps, an Atheist

And as to the preceptive parts of the Bible, there is a difficulty attends them that is unsurmountable to me, viz. what is required to be done at one time, and under one dispensation, is forbid to be done under another, whilst human nature continues the same, and men's rela tions, and dependencies, and the obligations that arise from them, continue the same also The Deity cannot but perceive things as they really are, nt all times, what ever colouring or shading men may draw over them, and therefore, to suppose that he commands and forbids the same thing, whilst the natures, the relations, and the circumstances of men and things continue the same, this, I say, is to me an unsurmountable difficulty v 38 le have heard that it hath been said, or ye have read, Exodus vai 23, 24, 25, Life for life, eye for eve, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe. Upon which I observe, if such a retaliation of injuries as this is, in its own nature, proper to restrain men's viewded appetites and passions, and therefore was appointed under the dispensation of Moses, then, for the same reason, it ought to be appointed and executed under all dispensations, because mankind are the same, they have the same appetites and passions, and are liable to indulge them to excess at all times and under all dispensations-Whereas, Jesus Christ reversed the aforesaid law of retaliation, ver 39 But I say unto ye, that ye resist not evil, but whosoever shall smite thee on thy nght cheek, Here, we see, Christ hath turn to him the other also not only forbid all resistance of evil, but he also requires the patient, when he has sustained a first injury, to be a volunteer with regard to a second, and to meet it half way

William Nicolson (1655–1727), successively Bishop of Carlisle and Londonderry, and Archbishop of Cashel, was a learned antiquary and Instorical writer, his Historical Libraries of England, Scotland, and Ireland (1696–1724) being detailed catalogues or lists of books and manuscripts referring to the history of each nation He also wrote An Essay on the Border Laws, A Treatise on the Laws of the Anglo Saxons, A Description of Poland and Denmark, a preface to Chamberlayne's Polyglot of the Lord's Prayer, and some able pamphlets on the Bangorian Controversy, and left many interesting letters

Earl of Shaftesbury.

Anthony Ashley Cooper (1671-1713), third Earl of Shaftesbury, was born in London, son of the second Earl saturated by Dryden as a 'shapeless lump,' and grandson of the brilliant, eloquent, unconscionable first Earl, the Ashley of the Locke superintended his early education at Clapham, and he spent three years at Winchester and three more in travel. On his three visits to Holland he formed friendships vith Bayle and Le Clerc. A zealous Whig, he sat for Poole in 1695-98, but ill-health drove him from politics to literature. He succeeded to the earldom in 1600, and spole frequently and well in the House Toland published, without leave, in of Lords 1699 his boyish Inquiry Concerning Merit and Virtue, which contained many of the views expounded in his later works. His (anonymous) Letter on Enthusiasm (1708) was prompted by the extravagance of the 'Trench prophets,' the Huguenot refugees who revived in England the visionary claims to the gift of prophecy asserted by the persecuted Camisards. What he meant by 'enthusiasm' was fanaticism or extravagance, he would have professed lumself an enthusiast in our sense for truth, beauty, and goodness Disapproving equally the familie and the persecutor, he pled for 'good humour' in religious controversy

In 1709 appeared his Moralists, a Philosophical Rhapsody, which is inaptly described as a dialogue, since it contains long disquisitions by a third interlocutor, only towards the end does it become a rhapsody and an impassioned lymn to nature, which reads like a prose version of a poem treatise has less to do with the principles of morals than with the method and order of the universe as an argument for a God, the origin of evil, a future life, and the nature of human society survey of nature in the third part there is an outpouring-surely remarkable in the early eighteenth century-on the beauty and terror, the majesty and mystery, of lofty mountain scenery And there is an amusing passage levelled against what is now called psychical research, against 'the sort of people who are alvays on the hot scent of some new prodigs or apparation, some upstart revelation or prophecy,' against 'rambling in blind corners of the world in ghostly company of spirit hunters, witch finders, and lavers out for hellish stories and diabolical transactions. There is no need of such intelligence from hell to prove the power of heaven and being of a God.' Sens is Community 1709), an essay upon the freedom of wit and humour, vin dicates the use of indicule is a test of truth, a doctrine already set forth in the Letter on Enthusiasm, but Shaftesbury is quite misunderstood if he is supposed to mean that facetious or frivolo is millers should supersede serious argument. His argument was that irrational folly and superstition could better be met by a humorous violence, or persecution. No sane person vould ridicule the truth, but if truth is ridiculed, it suffers nothing, whereas hallucinations and impostures can be laughed out of court appeared his Solilogus, or Advice to an Author In 1711 he issued a collection of his works in three volumes, under the general title of Characteristics of Men, Manners, Opirions, and Times Here appeared again his revised Inquiry Concerning l'irlue, and the third volume contained Miscellanious Reflections The Characteristics were reissued in ten other editions before the end of the century, and were translated into French and German. Ill health having compelled him to seek a warmer climate, this independent thinker died in Naples at the age of forty-two

The style of Shaftesbury is studied and rhythmical, sometimes even artificial and affected, lic too obviously bestowed great pains on the construction of his sentences. It was of purpose that he exchanged continuity, precision, and simplicity for artistic discursiveness, and in order to display the nobleman in the author, he assumes at times an air which suggests the superfineness and superficiality of the virtuoso, deliberately proposing 'to regulate his language by the standard of good company'. He was hostile to Locke's philosophy, was an ardent admirer of the ancients, imitated Plato, and preached Stoicism, his Askemata, published in 1901, are mainly texts, with comments, from Epictetus and Marcus Aurelius.

He was fiercely attached as a deist, and his very vagueness on religious problems allies him with the deists, even if his sceptical or free andeasy attitude towards Scripture, especially towards the Old Testament, were not plainly apparent. his style and method of discussion he was unlike the bulk of the deists, he protested against those 'who pay handsome compliments to the Deny?' but 'explode devotion' and leave but little of zeal, affection, or warmth in what they call rational religion. He has more in common with those who later in Germany broke the power of self complacent rationalism than vitli the rationalists properly so But by his effective, attractive style lie influenced thousands untouched by such writers as Collins or Tindal, and greath promoted the cause the deists had at heart. Lile most of the deists, he was a theist and denounced atheism, though his theism at times seems closely akin to pantheism. His work was on the whole, a powerful plea for freedom in the search for truth, for frank speech, and for toleration

Shriftesbury though he borroved much from dicates the use of ridicule is a test of truth, a doctrine already set forth in the Letter on Enthusiasm, but Shriftesbury is quite misunderstood if he is supposed to mean that frectious or frivolo is rullery should supersede serious argument. His argument was that irrational folly and superstition could better be met by a humorous reduction and absuraum than by angry polemic.

Shriftesbury though he borroved much from the Greeks, from Cumberland, and from others, may rank as founder of the school of English moralists who, holding virtue and vice as naturally and fundamentally distinct, believe man to be endowed with a 'moral sense' by which these are discriminated and at once approved of or condemned without reference to the self interest reduction and absuraum than by angry polemic.

he maintains that the very nature of man leads to the exercise of benevolent and disinterested affections in the social state. Conscience he defines as the 'moral sense,' a plir use of which he is the author, and makes this sense ikin to feeling, taste, and sentiment rather than to reason

This doctrine, left by its founder in a some what unsystematic shape, was taken up and developed by Hutcheson, and influenced Hume and Adam Smith Shaftesbury was ittacked in his own time both by the followers of Clarke's 'intellectual system' and by the more thorough utilitarians. The gentle Berkeley railed at him, and the augged Warburton dissented from his opiniors, while warmly prusing his character. Butlet heartily admired Shaftesbury's support of the 'natural obligation of virtue,' and there is in all his work evidence of sincere, warm, earnest feeling, the outcome of a generous mind Sidgwick regards the appearance of the Characteristics as a turning point in English ethical speculation, and treats its author as 'the first to make psychological experience the basis of ethics,' and Hettner sees in him a power in European thought. A pronounced optimist, Shaftesbury insisted that God should be loved without fear of reward or punishment, and argued that 'religion is still a discipline and the progress of the soul towards perfection, a thought which, contemplating not merely the individual but the race, contains the germ of Lessing's famous Einehung des Menschenge schlechtes, and may have suggested this theme to Lessing, who was a diligent student of the Characteristics Moses Mendelssohn, Herder, and even Kant were influenced by the English peer Leibnitz and Diderot admired him, and so did Volture, though he carrentured his optimism in Candide Gray, on the other hand, speals scorn fully of Shiftesbury's philosophy, and, oddly enough, Pope, who paraphrased Bolingbrole and was Shaftesbury's friend, told Warburton that the Characteristics had done more harm to rescaled religion in Lingland than all the works of infidelity put together? Yet it is impossible not to see that Shiftesbury's philosophy was the foundation of Bolingbroke's Michintosh, who rightly thought Shaftesbury's utlucal work had at first been admired beyond its literary or philosophical ments, and had next been too unsparingly condemned or still more unjustly neglected, somewhat extravagantly said of the first passage quoted below from Tre Moralists 'that there is scarcely any composition in our language more lofts in its moral and rel gious sentiments or more exquisitely elegant and musical in its diction?

From Advice to an Author'

One who aspires to the character of a man of breeding and politeness is careful to form his judgment of aris and sciences upon right models of perfection. If he trivels to Rome he inquires which are the trie pieces of architecture, the best remains of statues, the less paintings of a kaplinel or a Carache [Caracut]. However and quitted, rough or dismal they may appear to him at first sight, he resolves to view them over aid over till he has brought himself to relish them and finds their hidden graces and perfections. He takes particular care to turn his ever from every thing which is gaudy, he could and of a false taste. Not is he less careful to turn his ear from every sort of musick lessibes that y high is of the best manner and truest harmony.

Twere to be wished we had the same regard to a right taste in life and immners. What mortal being once convinced of a difference in inward character, and of a preference due to one kind above another, would not be concerned to make his own the best? If civility and humanity be a taste, if brutality, insolence, not, he in the same manner a taste, who if he could reflect, would not chose to form himself on the annable and agreeable rather than the odious and perverse model? Who would not endeavour to force nature as well in this respect as in what relates to a taste or judgment in other arise and sciences? To in each place the force on nature is used only for its redress. If a natural good taste be not already formed in us, why should not we endeavour to form it, and become natural?

'I like! I funcy! I admire! How? By accident or as I please. No But I learn to fancy, to admire, to please, as the subjects themselves are deserving and can bear me out. Otherwise, I like at this hour, but dislike the next. I shall be weary of my pursuit and, upon experience, find little pleasure in the main, if my choice and judgment in it be from no other rule than that single one, because I please. Grotesque and monstrous figures often please. Cruel spectacles and barbanties are also found to please, and, in some tempers, to please beyond all other subjects. But is this pleasure right? And shall I follow it if it presents? Not strive with it, or endeavour to prevent its growth or prevalency in my temper?-How stands the case in a more soft and flatternor kind of pleasure?—Effeminacy pleases me. Indian figures, the Japan work, the enamel strikes my eve. The luscious colours and glossy paint gain upon my fancy A French or Flemish style is highly liked by me, at first sight, and I pursue my liking But what ensues?-Do I not for ever forfeit my good relish? How is it possible I should thus come to taste the beauties of an Italian master, or of a hand happily formed on nature and the antients? 'Tis not by wanton ness and humour that I shall attain my end, and arrive at the enjoyment I propose. The art itself is severe the rules rigid. And if I expect the knowledge should come to me by accident, or in play, I shall be grossly deluded, and prove myself, at best, a mock virtuoso, or mere pedant of the kind '

Here therefore we have once again exhibited onr moral science in the same method and manner of soliloquy as above. To this correction of humour and formation of a taste, our reading, if it be of the right sort, must principally contribute. Whatever company we keep, or however polite and agreeable their characters may be with whom we converse or correspond, if the authors we read are of another kind, we shall find our palate strangely turned their way. We are the unhappier in this respect for being scholars if our studies be ill chosen. Nor can I, for this reason, think it proper to call a man well read who reads many anthors, since he must of necessity have more ill models than good, and be more stuffed with bombast, ill fancy, and wry thought, than filled with solid sense and just imagination.

But notwithstanding this hazard of our taste from a multiplicity of reading, we are not, it seems, the least scrupulous in our choice of subject. We read whatever comes next us What was first put into our hand when we vere young, serves us afterwards for serious study and wise research, when we are old. We are many of us, indeed, so grave as to continue this exercise of youth through our remaining life The exercising authors of this kind have been above described, in the beginning of this treatise. The manner of exercise is called meditation, and is of a sort so solemn and profound, that we dare not so much as thorowly examine the subject on which we are bid to meditate. This is a sort of task reading, in which a taste is not permitted. How little soever we take of this diet, 'tis sufficient to give full exercise to our grave humour, and allay the appetite towards further research and solid contemplation. The rest is holiday, diversion, play, and fancy We reject all rule as think ing it an injury to our diversions to have regard to truth or nature without which, however, nothing can be truly agreeable or entertaining, much less instructive or improving Through a certain surfeit taken in a wrong lind of serious reading, ve apply ourselves, with full content, to the most ridiculous. The more remote our pattern is from any thing moral or profitable, the more freedom and satisfaction we find in it hov Gothick or barbarous our models are, what ill designed or monstrous figures we view, or vhat false proportions we trace, or see described in history, romance, or fiction And thus our eve and ear is lost. Our relish or taste must of necessity grow barbarous whilst barbarian customs, savage manners, Indian wars, and wonders of the terra incognita employ our leisure liours, and are the chief materials to furnish out a library were in those of our forefathers. I know not what faith our valuant ancestors may have had in the stories of their giants, their dragons, and St Georges But for our faith indeed, as well as our taste, in this other way of reading, I must confess I can't consider it without assonishment

It must certainly be something else than incredulity which fashions the taste and indement of many gentle men, whom we hear censured as atheists for attempting to philosophize after a newer manner than any known of late. For my own part, I have ever thought this sort of men to be in general more credulous, though after another manner, than the mere vulgar Besides what I have observed in conversation with the men of this character, I can produce many anathematized authors who, if they want a true Israelitish faith, can make amends by a Chinese or Indian one If they are short in Syria or the Palestine, they have their full measure in America Histories of Incas or Iroquois written by friars and missionaries, pirates and renegades, sea captains and trusty travellers, pass for authentick records, and are canonical, with the virtuosos of this sort. Though Christian miracles may not so well satisfy them, they dwell with the highest contentment on the produces of Moonsh and pagan countries They have far more pleasure in hearing the monstrous accounts of monstrous men and manners, than the politest and best narrations of the affairs, the governments, and lives of the wisest and most polished people.

'Tis the same taste which makes us prefer a Turkish history to a Grecian or a Roman, an Ariosto to a Virgil, and a romance or novel to an Iliad We have no regard to the character or genius of our author nor are so far curious as to observe how able he is in the judg ment of facts, or how ingenious in the texture of his hes For facts unably related, though with the greatest sincerity and good faith, may prove the worst sort of deceit and mere lies, judiciously composed, can teach us the truth of things beyond any other manner to amuse ourselves with such anthors as neither know how to be nor tell truth, discovers a taste which methinks one should not be apt to envy enchanted we are with the travelling memoirs of any casual adventurer, that, be his character or genius what it will, we have no sooner turned over a page or two than we begin to interest curselves highly in his affairs. No sooner has he taken shipping at the month of the Thames, or sent his baggage before him to Gravesend or bnoy in the Nore, than strait our attention is earnestly taken up. If in order to his more distant travels he takes some part of Europe in his way, we can with patience hear of inns and ordinaries, passage boats and ferries, foul and fair weather, with all the particulars of the author's diet, habit of body, his personal dangers and mischances on land and sea. And thus full of desire and hope we accompany him till he enters on his great scene of action, and begins by the description of some enormous fish or beast I rom monstrous brutes he proceeds to yet more monstrous men For in this race of anthors lie is ever completest and of the first rank who is able to speak of things the most ninntural and monstrous.

This humour our old tragick poet seems to have discovered. He bit our taste in giving us a Moorish hero, full fraught with prodigy—a wondrous story teller! But for the attentive part, the poet chose to give it to woman kind. What passionate reader of travels or student in the prodigious sciences can refuse to pity that fair lady who fell in love with the mirreulous Moor, a pecially considering with what suitable prace such a lover could relate the most monstrous adventures and satisfy the wondering appetite with the most vondrous tales, wherein (says the hero traveller)

'Of antres vist and deserts idle
It was my hint to speal
And of the cannibals that each other eat
The anthropophage and men whose heads
Do grow beneath their shoulders—I has to hear
Would Desdemon seriously incline.

Seriously, 'twas a woful tale! unfit, one would think, to win a tender fair one. It's true, the poet sufficiently condemns her fancy, and makes her (poor lady ') pay dearly for it in the end But whi, amongst his Greek names, he should have tho en one which denoted the lady superstitious [deisidaimonia in Greel means super stition] I can't imagine unless, as poets are some times prophets too, he should figuratively, under this dark type, have represented to us that about a hundred years after his time, the fair sex of this island should, by other monstrous tale, he so seduced as to turn their favour chiefly on the persons of the tale tellers, and change their natural inclination for fair, candid, and conrecous knights into a passion for a my terious race of black enchanters such as of old were said to creep into houses and lead captive silly women

'Tis certain there is a very great affinity between the passion of superstition and that of tales. The love of strange narrations and the ardent appetite towards unnatural objects has a near alliance with the like appetite towards the supernatural kind, such as are called prodigious and of dire omen. For so the mind forchodes on every such unusual sight or hearing. Inte, destiny, or the anger of Heaven seems denoted and as it were dehneated by the mon trous birth, the horrid fact, or dire event For this reason the very persons of such relators or tale tellers, with a small help of dismal habit, suitable countenance and tone, become sacred and tremendous in the eyes of mortals who are thus addicted from their youth. The tender virgins, losing their natural softness, assume this trigick passion, of which they are highly susceptible, especially when a suitable kind of eloquence and action attends the character of the narrator A thousand Desdemon's are then ready to present themselves, and would frankly resign fathers, relations, countrymen, and country itself to follow the fortunes of a hero of the black tribe

But whatever monstrous zeal or superstitious passion the poet might foretell, either in the gentlemen, ladies, or common people of an after age, its certain that as to books the same Moorish fancy in its plain and literal sense prevails strongly at this present time. Monsters and monsterlands were never more in request. And we may often see a philosopher or a wit run a talegathering in those idle deserts, as familiarly as the silliest woman or merest boy.

The Nobler Love

'You shall find then, said I (taking a grave air), that it is possible for me to be serious, and that 'tis probable I am growing so, for good and all. Your over seriousness awhile since, at such an unseasonable time, may have driven me perhaps into a contrary extreme, by opposition to your inclansholy humour. But I I we not a better idea of that inclandiols you discovered, and notwith standing the humorous turn you were pleased to give it, I am persuaded it has a different foundation from any of the standard cause. I then as igned to it. Lore, doubtle, it at the bottom but a nobler love than such as common beauties inspire.

Here in inviture I begin to rus, in voice, ar I initiate the solerni way you had been teaching me. "Knowing as you are, consided I, vell I no mark experienced in all the degrees and orders of seart, in all the invitations charms of the particular forms, you ruse to what is more peneral and with a larger feart, and mind more comprehen is a your pensor sly seel that vinch is higher in the limb. Not expristed by the hincaments of a fur face, or the well-drawn proportions of a human body, you view the life it all, as I embrace rather the mind which adds the little, and reeders chiefly aimable.

"Nor is the enjoyment of each a single be, at sufficient to satisfy such an apart small. It sacks for to compare more be true and by what coalition of these to form a beautiful society. It views communities, for a Islaps relations, dutice, and contable he what hard one particular mind, the peneral harmony is composed and commonweal established.

Nor sate fied even with julker good in one community of men, it frames itself reduced, be an exampled affection seed, the pood of manual. It dwell with pleasure annote that the normal foodly interest which this four correspondence and foodly interest extrablished. Law, can title in each and take are rates, whatever engines or politic rade mention, the secences and arts, philosophic, morals, with the floureshing state of human affairs, on the perfection of him nature, these are its delightful projects, and this the charm of beauty which attracts in "Still ordent in this pursuit (so h is reclove of order and perfection), it resement here nor extissies a chough the beauty of a part—but extending further its communicative bounds, seeks the good of all, and affects the interest and property of the whole. True to its name world and higher country, its here it seeks order and perfection, wishing the best, and hoping still to find a just and wise administration.

'And since all hope of this were vain and idle if no innversal initial presided, since without such a supreme intelligence and providential care the districted universal must be condemned to suffer infinite calamities, 'tis here the generous mind labours to discover that healing cause by which the interest of the whole is securely established, the beauty of things, and the innversal order happing sustained

'This, Palemon, is the labour of your soul, and this its melancholy, when, misucces fully pursuing the suireme beauty, it meets with darkning clouds which intercept its sight. Monsters arise—not those from I vlain deserts, but from the heart of man more fertile—and with their horrid aspect cast an unseemly reflection upon nature. She, helpless (as she is thought) and working thus absurdly, is contemned, the government of the world arraigned, and Deity made you

"Much is alledged in answer to show why nature errs, and how she came thus impotent and erring from an unerring hand. But I deny she errs, and when she seems most ignorant or perverse in her productions, I assert her even then as wise and provident as in her goodliest vorks. For 'tis not then that men complain of the world's order, or abhor the face of things, when they see various interests mixed and interfering, natures subordinate, of different kinds, opposed one to another, and in their different operations submitted, the higher to the lower. 'Tis, on the contrary, from this order of inferior and superior things that we indinize the world's beauty, founded thus on contrarreties, whilst from such various and disagreeing principles a universal concord is established.

'Thus in the several orders of terrestrial forms a resignation is required, a sacrifice and mutual yielding of natures one to another. The vegetables by their death sustain the animals and inimal bodies dissolved enrich the earth and raise again the vegetable world numerous insects are reduced by the superior kinds of birds and beasts and these again are checked by man, who in his turn submits to other natures, and resigns his form a sacrifice in common to the rest of things if in natures so little exalted or pre eminent above each other the sacrifice of interests can appear so just, how much more reasonably may all inferior natures be sub sected to the superior nature of the world! That world. Palemon, which even now transported you vlien the sun's fainting light gave vay to these bright constella tions, and left you this vide system to contemplate

'Here are those laws which ought not, nor can submit to any thing below. The central powers, which hold the lasting orbs in their just poize and movement, must not be controuled to save a fleeting form, and rescue from the precipice a puny animal, whose brittle frame, however protected, must of itself so soon dissolve. The ambient air, the inward vapours, the impending meteors, or what ever else is nutrimental or preservative of this earth, must operate in a natural course, and other constitutions must submit to the good habit and constitution of the all sustaining globe

'Let us not therefore wonder if liv earthquakes, storms, pestilential blasts, nether or upper fires, or floods, the animal kinds are oft inflicted, and whole species perhaps involved at once in common ruin but inneh less let us account it strange if, either by outward shock or some interior wound from hostile matter, particular animals are deformed even in their first conception, when the disease invades the seats of generation, and seminal parts are injured and obstructed in their accurate labours. 'Tis then aloue that monstrons shapes are seen nature still working as before, and not perversely or erroneously, not faintly, or with feeble endeavours, but o'erpower'd by a superior rival, and by another nature's justly conquering force

'Nor need we wonder if the interior form, the soul and temper, partakes of this occasional deformity, and sympathizes often with its close partner. Who is there can wonder either at the sicknesses of sense, or the depravity of minds inclosed in such frail bodies, and dependent on such pervertible organs?

'Here then is that solution you require, and hence those seeming blemishes cast upon nature. Nor is there ought in this beside what is natural and good. 'Tis good which is predominant, and every corruptible and mortal nature by its mortality and corruption yields only to some better, and all in common to that best and highest nature, which is incorruptible and immortal.'

(From Part I of The Moralists)

Of Dialogue

This brings to my mind a reason I have often sought for, why we moderns, who abound so much in treatiscs and essays, are so sparing in the way of dialogue, which hereto'ore was found the politest and best way of inanaging even the graver subjects. The truth is, 'tworld be an abominable falshood and belying of the age to put so much good sense together in any one conversation as might male it hold out steadily and with plain coherence for an hour's time, till any one subject bad been rationally examined

(From The Moralists.)

Of Temperance

I own (said I) I am far from thinking temperance so disagreeable a character. As for this part of virtue, I think there is no need of taking it on any other terms to recommend it than the mere advantage of being sav'd from intemperance, and from the desire of things un necessary

How! said Theocles, are you thus far ndvanc'd? And can you carry this temperance so far as to estates and honours, by opposing it to avarice and ambition?—Nay, then truly, you may be said to have fairly embark'd your self in this cause—You have pass'd the channel, and are more than half seas over

Religion a Discipline and Progress of the Soul.

Now whether our friend be unfeignedly and sincercly of this latter sort of real theologists, you will learn best from the consequences of his hypothesis. You will observe whether, instead of ending in mere speculation, it leads to practice and you will then surely be satisfied, when you see such a structure rused as with the generality of the world must pass at least for high re ligion, and with some, in all likelihood, for no less than enthusiasm

For I appeal to you, Philocles, whether there be any thing in divinity which you think has more the air of entbusiasm than that notion of divine love, such as separates from everything worldly, sensual, or meanly interested? A love which is simple, pure, and unmixed, which has no other object than merely the excellency of that Being itself, nor admits of any other thought of happiness than in its single fruition. Now I dare presume you will take it as a substantial proof of my friend's being far enough from irreligion if it be shewn that be has espoused this notion, and thinks of making out this high point of divinity, from arguments familiar even to those who oppose religion.

According therefore to his hypothesis, he would in the first place, by way of prevention, declare to you, that though the disinterested love of God were the most excellent principle, yet he knew very well that by the indiscreet zeal of some devout well meaning people it had been stretched too far, perhaps even to extravagance and enthusiasm, as formerly among the mysticks of the antient church, whom these of latter days have followed. On the other hand, that there were those who in opposi tion to this devout mystick why, and as professed enemies to what they call enthusiasm, had so far exploded every thing of this ecstatick kind as in a manner to bave given up devotion, and in reality had left so little of zeal, affection, or warmth in what they call their rational religion as to make them much suspected of their sin eerity in any For though it be natural enough (he would tell you) for a mere political writer to ground his great argument for religion on the necessity of such a belief ns that of a future reward and punishment, yet, if you will take his opinion, 'tis a very ill token of sincerits in religion, and in the Christian religion more especially, to reduce it to such a philosophy as will allow no room to that other principle of love, but treats all of that kind as enthusiasm, for so much as aiming at what is called disinterestedness, or teaching the love of God or virtue for God or virtue's sake

Here then we have two sorts of people (according to my friend's account) who in these opposite extremes expose religion to the insults of its adversaries on one hand twill be found difficult to defend the notion of that high raised love espoused with so much warmth by those devout mysticks, so, on the other hand, 'twill be found as hard a task, upon the principles of these cooler men, to guard religion from the imputation of mercenariness and a slavish spirit. I or how shall one deny that to serve God by compulsion, or for interest merely, is service and mercenary? Is it not evident that the only true and liberal's rvice paid either to that supreme Bung, or to any other superior, is that 'which proceeds from an esteem or love of the person served, a sense of duty or gratitude, and a love of the dutiful and grateful part, as good and amiable in itself?? where is the injury to religion from such a concession as this? Or what detriction is it from the belief of an after reward or punishment to own 'that the service caused by it is not equal to that which is voluntary and with inclination, but is rather disingenuous and of the slavish kind'? Is it not still for the good of mankind and of the world that obedience to the rule of right should some way or o her be paid if not in the better may, yet at least in this imperfect one? And is it not to be shewn, 'that although this service of fear be allowed ever so low or base, jet religion still being a discipline and progress of the soul towards perfection, the motive of remard and punishment is primary and of the highest moment with us, till, being capable of more sublinic instruction, we are led from this service state to the generous service of affection and love??

To this it is that in our friend's opinion we ought all of us to aspire, so as to endeavour 'that the excellence of the object, not the reward or punishment, should be our motive but that where, through the corruption of our nature, the former of these motives is found insufficient to excite to virtue, there the latter should be brought in aid, and on no account be undervalued or neglected'

John Gay.

Italian opera and English pastorals were driven out of the field at this time by easy, indolent, good humoured John Gay (1685–1732), most artless and best beloved of all the Pope and Swift circle of wits and poets. Gay was born at Barn staple, younger son of an impoverished house Both parents dying when he was about ten years old, he was, after receiving his education in the free grammar-school of his native town put apprentice to a silk mercer in London, but dishing this employment, he at length obtained his discharge from his master. In 1708 he published a poem in blank verse entitled Wine, in 1712 he became domestic secretary to the Duchess of Monmouth, and in 1713 appeared his Rural Sports, dedicated to Pope, in which we may trace his joy at emancipation from shopkeeping

But I, who no er was ble sed by I ortine's han I, Nor brightened I longlisherer in paternal land, I ong in the noisy town have been immured. Respired its smolg and all its cares enfured. In an iddress to the 'courteous render' Gay says "Thou wilt not find my shepherdesses ally piping on onen reeds, but milking the line, tying up the sheaves, or if the hogs are astray, driving them to their stics shepherd gathereth none other nosegavs but what are the growth of our own fields, he sleepeth not under mytile slindes, but under a hedge, not doth he vigilantly defend his flocks from wolves This 'Instorical' view because there are none! of rural life was immated by Allan Ramsay, and was followed by Crabbe with a moral aim to which In February 1715 appeared Gry never aspired The What d've Call It? a traga come pastoral farce, which the audience had 'not vit enough to take," and next veir assisted by limts from Swift, Gay produced his mack heroic Int a, or, the Art of Walling the Streets of Lordon, in which he gives a graphic account of the dangers and impediments then encountered in traversing the narrow, crowded, ill-lighted, and vice-infested thoroughfures of the metropoli-His pictures of City-life are in the Dutch style, familiar but forcibly drawn Here 15

O roving Muse! recall that wondrous year When winter reioned in bleak Britannia's air . When hoary Thames, with frosted osiers crowned, Was three long moons in icy fetters bound The waterman, forlorn, along the shore, Pensive reclines upon his useless our See harnessed steeds desert the stony town, And vander roads unstable, not their own, Wheels o'er the hardened waters smoothly glide. Thick rising tents a canvas city build, And the loud dice resound through all the field

Gay was always sighing for public employment, for which he was eminently unfit, and in 1714 he had a glimpse of fancied happiness wrote with joy to Pope 'Since you went out of the town, my Lord Clarendon was appointed envoy extraordinary to Hanover, in the room of Lord Paget, and by making use of those friends which I entirely one to you, he has accepted me for his secretary. Ouitting his situation with the Duchess of Monmouth, he accompanied Lord Clarendon on his embassy, but seems to have held the new post only for about two months, in the same year Pope welcomed him to his native soil, and counselled him, now that the queen was dead, to 'write something on the king, or prince, or princess' The anxious expectant of court favour complied with Pope's request, and wrote a poem entitled An Epistle to a Lady [probably Mrs Ho vard] Occasioned by the Arrival of Her Royal Highness [the Princess of Wales, whom he had seen at Hanoverl, and, as a consequence, the Princess and her husband went to see his play of The What d' se Call It? Gry was stimulated to another dramatic attempt (1717), and produced Three Hours After Marriage, but some personal satire and indecent dialogue, together with the improbability of the plot, scaled its fate lt soon fell into disgrace, and its author, afraid that Pope and Arbutlinot would suffer from their connection with it, took all the blame on himself Nevertheless the trio of friendly wits vere attacked in two pumphlets, and Pope's quarrel with Cibber originated in this unlucky drama. Gay was silent and dejected for some time, but in 1720 he published his poems by subscription, and realised £1000 He also received a present of South Sea stock, and was supposed to be worth £20,000, all of which he serious calamity almost overwhelmed a wit fond of finery and of luxurious living, but his friends were zealous, and he was prompted to further literary In 1724 he brought out another drama, evertion The Captures, which was acted with moderate success, and in 1727 he wrote a volume of Fables, designed for the edification of the Duke of Cumberland (then a boy of six), who does not seem to liave learnt mercy or humanity from them accession of the prince and princess to the throne seemed to augur well for Gay's fortunes, but he was only offered the situation of gentleman-usher to the little Princess Louisa, a child under three, and considering this an insult, he rejected it. In 1726 Swift had come to England, and lived two months with Pope at Twickenham this or some earlier date, the Dean liad suggested to Gay the idea of a Newgate pastoral, in which the characters should be thickes and highwaymen, and The Beggar's Opera was the The two friends were doubtful of the success of the piece, but it was received with unbounded applause The songs and music aided greatly its popularity, and there was also the recommendation of political satire, for the quarrel between Peachum and Lockit was accepted as an allusion to a personal collision between Walpole and his colleague, Lord Townshend The spirit and variety of the piece, in which song and sentiment are cheerfully intermixed with vice and reguery, still render the Leggar's Ofers a favourite with the public, but as Gay succeeded in making highwavmen agreeable, and even attractive, it can liardly be commended for its lost by the collapse of that famous delusion. This i moral tendency—a matter of lettle account with the epicurean playwright, who was, in Pope's words-

Of manners gentle, of affections mild, In wit a man simplicity a child

The opera had a run of sixty two nights, became the rage of town and country, and had also the effect of giving rise to the English opera, a species of light comedy enlivened by songs and music, which for a time supplanted the Italian opera, with all its evotic and elaborate graces By this successful opera Gay, as appears from the manager's account-book, cleared £693, 13s 6d besides what he derived from its publication. He tried a sequel to the Beggar's Opera, under the title of Polly, but as it was supposed to contain sarcasms on the court, the Lord Chamberlain prohibited its representation. The author had recourse to publication, and such was the zeal of his friends and the effect of party spirit that Polly produced a profit of £1100 or £1200 Henrietta, Duchess of Marlborough, gave £100 as her subscription for a copy Gry had now amassed £3000 by his writings, which he resolved to keep 'entire and sacred.' He was at the same time received into the house of his kind patrons the Duke and Duchess of Queensberry, with whom he spent the remainder of his life. His only literary occupation was composing additional fables, and corresponding occasionally with Pope and Swift. A sudden attack of inflammitory fever carried him off in three days Pope's letter to Swift announcing the event was endorsed 'On my dear friend Mr Gay's death Received, December 15th, but not read till the 20th, by an impulse foreboding some misfortune.' And nothing in Swift's life is more touching or honourable to his memory than those passages in his letters where the recollection of his friend melted his haughty stoicism. Gry was buried in Westminster Abbev, where a costly monument erected by the Duke and Duchess of Queensberry bears his own lines

> Life is a jest, and all things show it I thought so once, and now I know it

The works of this genial son of the Muses, which have lost much of their popularity, show the heentiousness without the elegance of Prior His Fables are still the best we possess, and if they have not the rich humour and archness of La Fontaine's, they are light and pleasing, and are always smooth in versification. The Hare with Many Friends is doubtless drawn from the fabulist's own experience. In the Court of Death he tries a higher flight, and marshals his 'diseases dire' with strong and glooms power His song of Black-ward Susan and the 'ballad' beginning "Twas when the seas were roaring" are full of characteristic tenderness and lyrical This ballad (in the then usual sense of the word) was said by Cowper to have been the joint production of Arbuthnot, Swift, and Gav, but the tradition is not supported by evidence.

The Country Ballad-singer

Sublimer strains, O rustic Muse! prepare, Forget awhile the barn and dury s care,
Thy homely voice to loftier numbers ruise,
The drunkard's flights require sonorous lays,
With Bowzy beus' songs exalt thy verse,
While rocks and woods the various notes rehearse.

'Twas in the senson when the respers' toil
Of the ripe harvest 'gen to rid the soil,
Wide through the field was seen a goodly rout,
Clean damsels bound the gathered sheaves about,
The lads with sharpened hook and sweating brow
Cut down the labours of the winter plough.

When fast asleep they Bowzybeus spied,
His hat and oaken staff lay close beside,
That Bowzybeus who could sweetly sing,
Or with the rosined bow torment the string,
That Bowzybeus who, with finger's speed,
Could call soft warblings from the breathing reed,
That Bowzybeus who, with jocund tongue,
Ballads, and roundelays, and catches sung
They londly laugh to see the damsel's fright,
And in disport surround the drunken wight.

Ah, Bowzybee, why didst thou stay so long? The mugs were large, the drink was wondrous strong! Thou shouldst have left the fair before twas night, But thou sat st toping till the morning light.

No sooner 'gan he raise his tuncful song But lads and lastes round about him throng Not ballad singer placed above the crowd Sings with a note so shrilling sweet and loud, Nor parish clerk, who calls the psalm so clear, Like Bowzybeus soothes the attentive car

Of Nature's laws his carols first begun-Why the grave owl can never face the sun For owls, as swains observe, detest the light, And only sing and seek their prey by night How turnips hide their swelling heads below, And how the closing coleworts upwards grow, How Will a Wisp misleads night faring clowns O'er hills, and sinking bogs, and pathless downs. Of stars he told that shoot with shining trail, And of the glowworm's light that gilds his tail. He sung where woodcocks in the summer feed, And in what climates they renew their breed-Some think to northern coasts their flight they tend, Or to the moon in midnight hours ascend— Where swallows in the winter's season keep, And how the drowsy but and dormouse sleep, How Nature does the puppy's eyelid close Till the bright sun has nine times set and rose (For huntsmen by their long experience find That puppies still nine rolling suns are blind)

Now he goes on, and sings of fairs and shows, For still new fairs before his eves arose. How pedlers' stalls with glittering to varie laid, The various furings of the country maid. Long silken laces hang upon the twine, And rows of pins and amber bracelets shine, How the tight lass knives, combs, and scissors spies, And looks on thimbles with desiring eyes Of lotteries next with tuneful note he told, Where silver spoons are won, and rings of gold The lads and lasses trudge the street along, And all the fair is crowded in his song The mountebank now treads the stage, and sells

His pills, his balsams, and his ague spells,
Now o'er and o'er the nimble tumbler springs,
And on the rope the venturous maiden swings,
Jack Pudding, in his parti coloured jacket,
Tosses the glove, and jokes at every packet
Of raree sho vs he sung, and Punch's feats,
Of pockets picked in erov ds, and various cheats

On the Streets of London.

Through winter streets to steer your course anglit. How to walk clean by day, and safe by night. How jostling crowds with prudence to decline. When to assert the wall, and when resign, I sing. Thou, Trivia, Goddess, aid my song, Through spacious streets conduct thy bard along. By thee transported, I securely stray Where winding alleys lead the doubtful way. The silent court and opening square explore, And long perplexing lanes untrod before. To pave thy realm, and smooth the broken ways, Earth from her womb a flinty tribute pays, For thee the sturdy pavior thumps the ground, Whilst every stroke his labouring lungs resound, For thee the scavenger bids kennels glide Within their bounds, and heaps of dirt subside. We youthful bosom burns with thirst of fame, From the great theme to build a glorious name, To tread in paths to ancient bards unknown, And bind my temples with a civic crown But more, my country's love demands the lays, My country's be the profit, mine the praise!

When the black youth at chosen stands rejoice. And 'Clean your shoes' resounds from every voice. When late their miry sides stage coaches shew. And their stiff horses through the town move slow. When all the Mall in leafy ruin lies. And damsels first renew their oyster cries, Then let the prudent walker shoes provide, Not of the Spanish or Morocco hide, The wooden licel may raise the dancer's bound, And with the scalloped top his step be crowned Let firm, well hammered soles protect thy feet Through freezing snov's, and rains, and soaking sleet. Should the big last extend the shoe too wide, Each stone will wrench the unwary step aside, The sudden turn may stretch the swelling vein, Thy cracking joint unhinge, or ankle sprain, And when too short the modish shoes are worn, You'll judge the seasons by your shooting corn

Nor should it prove thy less important care To choose a proper coat for winter wear Now in thy trunk thy D'Oily habit fold, Thy silken drugget ill can fence the cold, The frieze's spongy nap is soaked with rain, And showers soon drench the camblet's cockled grain, True Witney broadcloth, with its shag unshorn, Unpierced is in the lasting tempest worn Be this the horseman's fence, for who would wear Amid the town the spoils of Russia's bear? Within the Roquelaure's clasp thy hands are pent, Hands that, stretched forth, invading harms prevent. Let the looped Bavaroy the fop embrace, Or his deep cloak bespattered o'er with lace. That garment best the winter's rage defends Whose shapeless form in ample plaits depends,

By various names in various counties known, Vet held in all the true Surtout alone, Be thine of Kersey firm, though small the cost, Then brave unwet the rain, unchilled the frost

If the strong cane support thy walking hand, Chairmen no longer shall the wall command, Even sturdy carmen shall thy nod obey, And rattling coaches stop to make thee way This shall direct thy cautious tread aright, Though not one glaring lamp enliven night Let beaux their canes, with amber tipt, produce, Be theirs for empty show, but thine for use. In gilded chariots while they loll at ease, And lazily insure a life s disease, While softer chairs the tawdry load convey To Court, to White s, Assemblies, or the Play, Rosy complexioned Health thy steps attends, And exercise thy lasting youth defends

(From Trivia, Book L)

D Oily or Doyley who give name to a kind of woollen stuff at once cheap and genteel and to ornamental napkins, was a linen draper who had a shop in the Strand. White s was a chocolate-house in St James's Street.

Song

Virgins are like the fair flower in its lustre, Which in the garden enamels the ground, Sear it the bees, in play, flutter and cluster, And gaudy butterflies frolic around

But when once plucked, 'tis no longer alluring,
To Covent Garden tis sent (1s yet sweet),
There fades, and shrinks, and grows past all enduring,
Rots, stinks, and dies, and is trod under feet.

(From The Beggar's Ofera)

There is a close parallel to this in the words of Effic Deans in the Heart of Mid Lothian 'I thought o the bonny bit thorn that our father rooted out o the yard last May, when it liad a the flush o blossoms on it and then it lay in the court till the beasts had trod them a 10 pieces witheir feet. I little thought vien I was war for the bit silly green bush and its flowers, that I was to gang the same gate mysell.

The Court of Death.

Death, on a solemn night of state,
In all his pomp of terror sate
The attendants of his gloomy reign,
Diseases dire, a ghastly train!
Crowd the vast court. With hollow tone,
A voice thus thundered from the throne
'This night our minister we name,
Let every servant speak his claim,
Ment shall bear this chon wind'
All, at the word, stretched forth their hand

Fever, with burning heat possessed, Advanced, and for the wand addressed 'I to the weekly bills appeal, Let those express my fervent zeal, On every slight occasion near, With violence I persevere'

Next Gout appears with limping pace, Pleads how he shifts from place to place, From head to foot how swift he flies, And every joint and sinew plies, Still working when he seems supprest, A most tenacious stubborn guest

A haggard spectre from the erew Crawls forth, and thus asserts his due

The street tonguld Murray near her side attends,
Not on wheart the glance of Howard flies,
Not Harvey, fair of face, I mark full well,
With thee, youth's youngest daughter, sweet Lepell

Arbuthne there I see, in physics art,
As Galen learn d, or famed Hippocrate,
Who e company drives sorrow from the heart,
As all disease his medicines di sipute Kneller amid the triumph bears his part,
Who could (were mankind lost) mew create
What can the extent of his vast soul confine?
A painter, or tie, engineer, divine

How lot d' how honour d thou! vet be not vain
An! sure thou art not, for I hear thee say,
All the my friends, I owe to Homer's strain,
On whose strong pinions I exalt my lay
What from contending cities did he gain?
And what rewards his grateful country pay?
None, none were paid—why then all this for me?
These honours, Homer, had been just to thee

Love's sojourn in Greece was of course in spirit only. Major Cen ral Withers and Colonel Disney (familiarly Duke Disney) are buried lide by side in Westminster Abbey, Sir Paul Methuen was Secretary of State in 1716 17. Arthur may have been Arthur Mole Commissioner of Plantations and father of James Moore Smythe, playwright with whom a few years later Pope had a bitter quarrel. Harvey is John Lord Hervey. Lady Wortley Montagu in Lady Murray are named along with the Misses Howard and 1 epell, maids of honour to Queen Caroline. For Arbuthnot the farmous wit are page 145. The best edition of Gay's Works, with Line and Notes is by John Underhill (2 vols. 1893).

Alexander Pope,

born in London 22nd May 1688, claimed to be of gentle blood, his father, he said, was of a gentleman's family in Oxfordshire, the head of which was the Larl of Downe, his mother was the daughter of William Turner, Esq, of York. To this a relative of Pope's added that his grandfather was a clergyman in Hampshire, who had two sons, of whom the younger, also Alexander the poets fuller, was sent to Lisbon to be placed in a mercantile house, and there became a Roman Catholic. It has been ascer trained that from 1631 to 1645 an Alexander Pope was rector of Thruxton, and held two other hvings in the same county of Hampshire, but as there is no memorial of him in the church, and no entry in the register of his having had children, there is some doubt whether this rector of Thruston was poet's grandfather Pope's maternal descent has been clearly traced. His grandfather, William Turner, held property in Yorkshire, including the manor of Towthorpe, which he inherited from his uncle. He was wealthy, but did not rank with the gentry Of the reputed kinship with the Earls of Doone there is no proof, Popc's stort was apparently a fiction. In 1677 the poet's father is found carrying on business as a linenmerchant in London, and liaving acquired a respectable competency by trade, and additional property by his marriage with Edith Turner, he re ired from business before 1700 to a property he had purchased at Binfield near Windsor. The boy was partly educated by the family priest. He was afterwards sent to a Catholic seminary at Twyford near Winchester, where he lampooned his teacher, was severely whipped, and then removed to a small school in London, at which he learned little or nothing. Returning home to Binfield in his thirteenth year, he devoted him self to a course of self-instruction and to the enthusiastic study of literature. He delighted to remember that he had seen Dryden, and as Dryden died on the 1st of May 1700, his youthful admirer could not have been quite twelve years of age. But Pope was already a poet.

As yet a child, nor yet a fool to fame, I lisped in numbers, for the numbers came.

At the age of sixteen he had commenced his Pastorals, translated part of Statius, and written imitations of Waller and other English poets. He soon became acquainted with some of the most eminent persons of the age-with Walsh, Wicherley, Congreve, Lansdowne, and Garth, and from this time his life was that of a popular poet enjoying high social distinction His Pastorals were published in Tonson's Mis In 1711 appeared his Essay cellany in 1709 on Criticism, which is said to have been com posed two years before publication, when he was only twenty-one. Addison commended the Essay warmly in the Spectator, and it soon attained great popularity Pope's style was now completely formed. His versification was that of his master, Dryden, but he gave the heroic couplet a peculiar terseness, correctness, and melody The Essay was shortly afterwards fol lowed by the Rape of the Lock (1712). stealing of a lock of hair from a beauty of the day, Miss Arabella Fermor, by her lover, Lord Petre, was taken seriously, causing an estrange ment between the families, and Pope wrote his poem to make a jest of the affair, 'and laugh them together again' Though in this he did not succeed, he added greatly to his reputation by the effort. The machinery of the poem, founded upon the Rosicrucian theory that the clements are inhabited by spirits-sylphs, gnomes, nymphs, and salamanders—was added in 1713, and published in the spring of 1714. The addi tion forms the most perfect work of Pope's Sylphs had been previously genius and art. mentioned as invisible attendants on the fur, the idea is shadowed forth in Shakespeare's Arrel, and the amusements of the fairies in But Pope has the Midsummer Night's Dream blended the most delicate satire with the most lively fancy, and produced the finest and most brilliant mock-heroic poem in the world 'It is, said Johnson, 'the most airs, the most ingenious, and the most delightful of all Pope's compositions' In 1713 appeared his Windsor Forest, evidently founded on Denham's Cooper's Hill

Pope now commenced his translation of the Iliad, for which he issued proposals in 1713, it was published at intervals between 1715 and 1720. At first the gigantic task oppressed him with its difficulty. He was but an indifferent Greek scholar, but as he gradually grew more familiar with Homer's phrases, erelong he was able to despatch fifty verses a day. Great part of the manuscript was written upon the backs and covers of letters, it was not without reason Swift called him 'paper-sparing Pope'. The translation brought its author a clear £5320.

And thanks to Homer, since I live and thrive, Indebted to no prince or peer alive—was hardly a fair statement, if we consider that this large sum was in part a 'benevolence' from the upper classes of society, designed to reward his literary ment. The Odyssey was not published until 1725, and here Pope called in the assistance of his poetical friends Broome and Fenton two coadjutors translated twelve books, and the notes were compiled by Broome, who received from Pope £500, hesides being allowed the subscriptions collected from personal friends, amounting to £70, 4s Fenton's share was only £200 Deducting the sums paid to his co-translators, Pope realised by the Odyssey upwards of £3500 together the Iliad and Odyssey had brought the poet a fortune of from eight to nine thousand pounds-so princely was the patronage then extended to literature

While engaged on the Iliad Pope removed from Binfield, his father having sold his estate there, and from April 1716 till the beginning of 1718 lived at Chiswick Here he collected and published his works, and in this volume first appeared the most picturesque, melodious, and passionate of all his poems, the Elegy to the Memory of an Unfortunate Lady, and the Epistle of Cloisa to Abelard At Chiswick Pope's father died (1717), and soon after the poet removed with his aged mother to Twickenham, where he had taken a lease of a house and grounds, and there he lived for the rest of his life. The villa was not large, but sufficiently commodious for the wants of an English gentleman whose friends visited himself rather than his dwelling. The taste with which Pope laid out his grounds (five acres in all) had a marked effect on English landscape-The Prince of Wales took the gardening design of his garden from the poet's, and Kent, the improver and embellisher of pleasuregrounds, received his best lessons from Pope, who thus aided materially in banishing the stiff, formal Dutch style. The classic spot where Pope was visited by Ministers of State, wits, poets, and beauties has long since been transformed-his house pulled down, and his pleasuregrounds rearranged

After the Had the next great undertaking was an edition of Shakespeare, published in 1725, in six quarto volumes The preface to this work is the best of his prose writings, but Pope fuled as an editor, he lacked the necessary knowledge of Elizabethan literature, and the diligence required for collating copies and fixing and illustrating the text Fenton gave assistance for this edition of Shakespeare, for which he received £30, 14s Pope's remuneration as editor was £217, 125 In 1727 and 1728 Pope published, in conjunction with his friend Swift, three volumes of Miscellanues, which drew down upon the authors a torrent of invective, Impoons, and libels, and led to the Dunciad This elaborate and splendid satire was first printed in an imperfect form in May 1728, then enlarged with notes, the Prolegomena of Scriblerus, and other additions, and published in April 1729 The work displays the fertile invention of the poet, the variety of illustration at his command, and the unrivalled force and facility of his diction, but it is often indecorous, and still oftener unjust towards the miserable poets and critics against whom he waged war 'I have often wondered,' says Cowper, 'that the same poet who wrote the Duncial should have written these lines

> That mercy I to others sliew, That mercy shew to me.

Alas for Pope if the mercy he shewed to others was the measure of the mercy he received!' Sir Walter Scott was right in thinking Pope must himself have suffered most from these wretched But his propensity to satire was contentions irresistible, he was eminently sensitive, vain, and irritable, and implacable in his resentment towards all who had questioned or slighted his poetical supremacy Between 1731 and 1735 he had published his Epistles to Burlington, Bathurst, Cobham, and Arbuthnot—the latter, also known as the Prologue to the Satires, containing that famous 'Character of Atticus' which is the melancholy memorial of the quarrel with Addison, provoked partly by political diversities and partly by jealousy. See the article below on Tickell To the same period belongs the Essay on Man, in four Epistles, the first of which was published anonymously in February 1733, and the second about three months afterwards The third and fourth appeared in the winter of 1733-34. The Essay is now read not for its philosophy but for its poetry, its ethical distinctions are neglected for those splendid passages and striking incidents which irradiate the poem

Pope's later labours were chiefly confined to satire. Misfortunes were now gathering round him. Swift was fast verging on imbecility, and was lost to the world, Atterbury and Gay died in 1732, and next year he lost his mother, whose declining years he had watched with affectionate solicitude. Between 1733 and 1739 he published his inimitable Imitations of Horace, saturical, moral, and critical, containing the most noble and generous sentiments mixed up with withering invective and fierce denunciations 1742 he added a fourth book to the Dunciad, displaying the final advent of the goddess to destroy order and science, and to substitute the Political events kingdom of the dull upon earth contributed to agitate Pope's last days excitement, added to a life of ceaseless study, telling on a frame naturally delicate and deformed from birth, had completely worn him out. He com plained of his inability to think, yet shortly before his death lie affirmed 'I am so certain of the soul's being immortal, that I seem to feel it within me as it were by intuition? Pope died at Twickenham on the 30th of May 1744.

Most of the property within his disposal he left, for her life, to Martha Blount-the fair-haired Martha'—a daughter of an old Roman Catholic family at Mapledurham in Oxfordshire, who was a little vounger than himself, whose acquaintance he had made in the Binfield days, and to whom he remained devoted for more than thirty years scandal of one of the most scandalous times in the world's history questioned whether Martha's character was as fair as her hair, and even threw doubts on her beauty, her manners, and her gratitude to Pope But there is tolerable rebutting testimony as to her good looks and as for the rest literary history disdrins to inquire. She was certainly one of those Egerias of the greater poets whom they have at least funcied to be goddesslike, and who have inspired them to give us what is of itself not undivine. The rest may very well be silence.

There is no English poet-and perhaps there is hardly any English writer-whose position it is more difficult, for a critic with the sense of criticism, to lav down without some misgivings than it is to lay down Pope's The all-important historical preliminaries, so often neglected-s- certain to be neglected at the neglecter's peril- are indeed here quite certain and clear Fron, almost his first appearance there was no doubt about Pope in the minds of his contemporaries The very rage of his numerous foes was pretty certainly exasperated by the fact that it was rage against their own con-They felt that he was the poet they tried to make him out not to be. The discontent and surfeit with the obscure and 'metaphysical' style, which had first found expression at the Restoration, had not in the least exhausted itself, though little clouds-the recurrence to ballad poetry, the turn to exact description of nature, &c.-were rising on the far distance to threaten some change of weather in taste. But the first generation of 'prose and sense' had not succeeded in hitting a style of pactry tha would please the general surely siceds of Dryden's car (to borrow the image from one of Pope's half-rebels) needed Dryden to guide them, and, moreover, their pace was admittedly unequal There had been no real second to Dryden, except the belated and singular genius of Butler, during the forty years of Dryden's reign. Towards the end of that reign especially, though Dryden himself wrote ever better and better, there had been unpleasant stumbles into vulgarity and slipshodness, unpleasant backslidings into Cow Even before Pope, indeed, one or leian frigidity two writers-notably Garth-had made not quite unsuccessful attempts to conventionalise the choice of subject and treatment yet further, and to adjust the couplet so that it might be even smoother, even more pointed, and might make up for a loss of strength by an added refinement and correctness. They attempted this, Pope did it and the age frankly accepted what he did as what it wanted Nor-a most unusual experience-did the ages or generations immediately succeeding attempt any serious revolt. There were, throughout the eighteenth century, constant movements which, looking back upon them, we now see to have been movements of a revolutionary character, but they seldom consciously menaced the sove reign Warton himself, the first to hint reasoned doubts, put Pope above Dryden and next to Milton. Oddly enough, even when, at the close of the age, the Romantic movement came, it was at first less unjust to Pope than to Dryden, and Wordsworth, while most falsely deciding that whenever Virgil has his eye on the object Dryden spoils the passage, could find pruse for such a tissue of bookish con ventionalities as Windsor Forest When Bowles accentuated Warton's doubts and lessened his praises, he was sharply opposed by men from It was only Campbell and Byron downwards in the second Romantic generation-from 1820 or thereabouts onwards—that Pope's reputation came Of late it has been recover into serious jeopardy ing, but it is difficult to say that there is even yet more than a general agreement, which is not itself universal, and which, even where it prevails, had best not be disturbed by too inquisitive investiga tion of its articles We must, however, see what positive estimate we can ourselves extract from actual survey

The exact precociousness of Pope is, owing to his unlucky and now not denied untruthfulness, difficult to determine, but the dates of publication are not questionable. He may have written the Pastorals at sixteen—he certainly printed them at one and-twenty, the Messiah and part of Windsor Torest may have been written as early, but the latter certainly was published by 1713, by which time The Rape of the Lock was also in existence, and the Essay on Criticism, while it may have been written in 1709, was certainly advertised for The poetical characteristics publication in 1711 of this not inconsiderable body of work are perfectly well marked, and, with slight differences and immaturities, identical from the first with each other and those of the later poems The poet has, so far as he understands it and so far as his ovn great powers will let him, adopted that theory of 'correctness' which the sixteenth and seven teenth century critics of Italy first, and of France later, had built up, as they pretended, and perhaps honestly thought, out of Aristotle, Horace, Quintilian, and even Longinus, but really to a large extent out of their own heads. In this they carried a good deal farther the mistake-a very old one, but one of which Aristotle is not himself guilty -of confusing the Mimesis or representation of nature with a more or less slavish unitation of previous worls of art According to this theory it was always tacitly assumed, and sometimes expressly asserted. that the kinds, the methods, and all but the minutest proceedings of literature had been settled once for all by the practice of the ancients The parts of a tragedy or an oration. the construction of the 'fable' or story, the 'figures' of speech and thought, the rules for the selection of imagery, even to some extent the lines of character. and to a great extent the details of style, were imagined to exist somewhat as a sct of scaled patterns.

which might be worked out by the poet in different material and with a certain reasonable allowance for individual taste, but from which he was to depart always at his peril, and if he neglected them in any great degree, to his certain damna-That 'correctness' did go so far as this has of course been denied, but the description can be supported by an unbroken chain of justifying passages from those of Aristotle, which started the error, to Boileau and Pope lumself

Attempts have been made, sometimes with great knowledge and ability, to rebut the assertion that Pope and his school turned away from nature Campbell very ingeniously argued, in a passage quoted at length in former editions of this work, that art is not less 'sublime' than nature, and Mr Courthope with equal ingenuity has laid stress on the non naturalness of the metaphysical school. and on the fact that Pope himself 'returned to nature' in comparison with it. Both pleas are in themselves perfectly true and sound, but they will not quite stretch to the extent required undoubtedly much easier to follow rules of art in reference to artificial than to natural objects. A table, even a brocaded dress, looks very much the same to Dick and to Tom and to Harry, there is no real difficulty, if fair ability be present, in getting a description of it that all three can endorse. But a sunset and a wave only look alike to those who have no eves to see them at ill In the same way the manners of the town, the common weaknesses and ways of humanity, are communia which it may be difficult. but which it is possible, to describe with just that 'propriety,' that individual touch, which gives literary distinction, the obscurer and more singular pressions and thoughts elude such treatment. Furthermore, continual reference to the standards of plot, of character, of expression, necessarily leads ALEXANDER POPE. to convention, (From the Portrait by Wm. Hoare in the National Portrait Gillery ) whether it be in the acceptance of the stock part or incident, or in the admission of the gradus epithet.

It is almost necessary to premise these generalities, because without them not merely is an estimate of Pope himself impossible, but even an understanding of the differences in the opinions about For instance, that most able him is not easy defender of his who has been mentioned above urges that while The Ancient Mariner has neither beginning, middle, nor end,' The Rape of the Lock is above all things remarkable for the 'nature and propriety of its construction' To others the starting point of contrast between the wedding guest and the Ancient Mariner, the central sin of the shooting of the albatross, and the finale of purgation not vet complete seem, in their supernatural order, perfectly natural and proper, while the ordered arrangement of the Rape seems to them, for all its happy brilliancy, perfectly artificial and conventional, possessing no real sequence of action whatever, and dependent for such as it appears to have upon burlesque of previous conventions and upon episodes and digressive beauties. So difficult is it to secure common ground in this matter

In the Issay on Criticism and the Rape of the Lock, howe or poems all but contemporaneous, there is no doubt that we see a writer, and even with certain limitations a poet, of the most remark-Up to this time no poets save Horace and Dante (for though Ben Jonson was a greater, and Dryden a very much greater, critic than Pope, neither had so fully co-ordinated his gifts) had so thoroughly adjusted practice to principle and principle to practice. The Essay on Criticism is very far from original, it is not exactly consistent vith itself, it betrays almost schoolboy ignorance of literary and other history But the idea of poetry which animates it is exactly the idea which would suggest work of the kind of the Rape of the Locr, and this poem carries that idea out so consummately that further perfection is almost impossible. It may be matter of some surprise that Pope's extremest admirers have not seen how dam iging a fact it is that this unquestioned masterpiece of his is a mock heroic poem just as Boileau's Lutrin is the one unquestionably poetical thing that Boileau lias done. Not, indeed, that comedy (as some of their own prophets would hold) is necessarily a low or 'non serious' kind. But burlesque certainly is, from the mere fact that it is parasitic and second hand If the stock epic did not exist, the mock epic would lose more than half its attractions But this may pass. On Pope's principles you probably cannot have a better poem than the Rape of the Lock, and the only charge valid against it on these principles is the excessive prominence of the gradus epithet. This, it is true, might pass to some extent as parody, but it is resorted to on a scale and in contexts which more than suggest its employment as a genuine, not a mock ornament Il indsor Forest, on the other hand, though it is not much less in accordance with the principles of the Essay on Criticism, brings out the defects of those principles by showing, not the limited excellence which at the best they can produce, but the defects which they are likely to allow The composition, though rhetorically correct, is flat, and unnatural, the descriptions (in such a poem of the very first importance) show no direct impression on the poet's mind, give no characteristic features of the scenery, and produce on the mind of the reader a picture of but the vaguest decorative effect

But even in this which is a failure, as in the Esm, which is a partial, and the Rape, which is a brilliant and dazzling, success of its kind, Pope's true gifts and ments—the gifts and ments which give him a secure, though not a supreme, position among English poets-already appear Though he has still to polish it a little, he has already rearranged the Drydenian couplet, so as to deprive it of much of its stateliness and of a very great deal of the irresistible momentum which is its great characteristic, but to substitute for these a much greater polish, a constant glitter instead of the in termittent blaze, a variety contained within dangerously narrow limits, but astonishingly great within those limits, and a sort of castanet accompaniment of rhyme which, till the ear wearies utterly of it, is singularly attractive. It is not surprising that this should have produced an extraordinary effect on the public when presented to them within the short space of three or four years only, conveying such different matter as the artificial but agreeable con ventionalities of the Pastorals, the declamation of the Mess ah, the argument (thoroughly in the popular taste) of the Lssay on Criticism, the description of 11 indsor Forest, and the glittering badinage of the Rape of the Lock

The translation of Homer, though pleasant and perhaps even useful to the time, adds nothing to Pope's proper position as a poet, indeed, it may be said to weaken that position by showing how easy it was for understrappers, like Broome and Fenton, not so much to imitate as to reproduce his style It is, of tourse, 'not Homer' in any single point except that of giving the story completely in sense and with indifferent fidelity in words though it is no constituent of his poetical claims, it helped him to establish those claims in two ways -first, by supplying him with an independence which enabled him ever afterwards to write just as he liked, and secondly, because it exercised him in his own couplet, and so did him something like the same service which Dryden's practice in heroic plays had rendered to his master

But two poems which appeared early in the progress of the translation itself (in 1717), and long before the bulk of Pope's saturical and didactic work, are of much more importance. The Eligi on an Unfortunate Lady (a much embellished and 'poetised' version of the story of a certain Mrs Weston) and the Epistle from Eloisa to Abelard are not only pretty, original, and very ambitious productions, but have been relied upon by the poet's admirers to support his claims as not merely a brilliant satirist and expert in other applied departments of poetry, but a serious poet The first, which is by far the better, is almost Pope's only effort in pathos, the second is his No one can most important effort in passion deny that the Llegs at least comes very near to success, if it does not actually achieve it, in the way of exciting in the reader the feelings designed by the writer The only question is, whether the success is not attained rather by the rhetorical than by the poetic road. It is also very noticeable that some of the most effective passages (for instance, 11 17-22) are still very strongly Drydenian.

When the translation of Homer was completed, and its 'ten long years' were passed, when the edition of Shakespeare which Pope then undertook, and for which he was singularly ill-fitted, was also out of the way, it might have been a question what task the poet should next attempt. But, as it happened, his aptitudes, his weaknesses, and the curious tendency (fostered in him by his theory of poetry) to adopt suggestions rather than strike out an entirely new line, combined to supply him with most appropriate, if not in every respect praiseworthy, occupation for the nearly twenty remaining years He had from the first been involved. partly without, but much more by, his own fault, in acrimonious quarrels with 'Grub Street' critics, with estranged friends, and with those of 'the great' who, he thought, did not take him at his proper value He had also, though not himself a very accurate or profound thinker, shared the rationalising, and in the lower sense philosophis ing, tendencies of the age Suggestions of Swift -the one great genius-and of Bolingbrokethe most active and specious talent-among his friends put him between 1726 and 1732 on three great works or collections of works—the Dunciad, the Moral Essays (some of them written earlier), with the Essay on Man at their head, and the Satires and Epistles, partly imitated from Horace, partly original. According to a thrifty habit of his, he by degrees inserted in these, or added to them, fragments of verse composed at various times and with various purposes Some of these, though among the most brilliant evidences of his powers, are among the most unpleasant blots For the 'Character of Atticus' on his memory (in the Prologue to the Satires, quoted below at page 189) was a libel on a dead friend who had certainly done him much good, and had at least possibly never done him any wrong at all, and the 'Character of Atossa' was prepared for publication perhaps after he had received a great sum of money not to publish it, and certainly after he had for years been flattering and begging from the subject with whom (whether it was wholly drawn from her or not) it was sure to be identified Pope's moral character on some sides (not on all, for he was an admirable son, a faithful lover, sometimes a generous benefactor, and in regard to younger men of letters curiously devoid of the jealous, which he showed in other cases) is in that desperately happy condition of raggedness and blackness which cannot suffer from a fresh rent or an added stain. His intellectual and poetical position gained enormously from the work of these last years, in which (for the Rape, exquisite as it is, is only an exquisite trifle in rococo, and the Elegy a fine piece of verse rhetoric on a small scale) lie really showed what he could add to English poetry They are, of course, abundantly open to criticism, but after criticism has done her worst, there is very much more than enough left.

The Dunciad, which appeared in its first form in 1728, but was not completed or set in its final condition till just before Pope's death, appears to have been directly suggested by Swift as a satire on 'Dulness' (the name by which he himself refers to it), and connects itself very well with the old diversions of the 'Scriblerus Club,' in which, as far back as the palmy days of Queen Anne, the two friends, with Arbuthnot, Gay, Oxford, Bolingbroke, and others, had amused themselves by laughing at dunces. In some touches, and especially in the magnificent conclusion (another of the highest points reached by Pope's genius), it is worth of the suggestion But for the most part, according to Pope's habit, it resolves itself into a string of personal attacks on his literary and other enemies, connected, as far as they are connected at all, by mock epic 'machinery' not distantly related to that of the Rabe, and by a borrowing from Dryden of the idea of a monarchy But the occupants (for there was a of Dulness succession) of the throne were far from happily The first was Theobald, the Shakeselected spearian critic, who had aroused Pope's ire by detecting faults in his edition, and who, though no genius at original composition, was always an invaluably careful and sometimes a singularly acute hand at comment and emendation The substitution for him, in the later form, of the actor, dramatist, and poet laureate, Colley Cibber, was a worse blunder still, for Cibber, though he too had offended Pope, was neither dunce nor dullard in any sense, accepted or conceivable. The Moral Essays are open to different but equally damaging exception They were suggested by Bolingbroke, whose flimsy, anti-Christian optimism Pope in the first place did not fully understand, and in the second place was not in the least competent to expound and set in order philoso-Only the Satures and Epistles, whether imitated or not, escape these initial and general draw backs

All, however, alike display the maturest and most polished state of their author's talents couplet has had every one of its possible virtues developed to the very uttermost, and is absolutely at his command for the purposes to which he chooses to apply it. Furthermore, he has likewise acquired a knowledge of the world which is of the very first importance for those purposes This man of theworldliness, indeed, keeps him on all but the very rarest occasions from the heights of poetry, but it makes him perfectly at home on the middle slopes, and does not at all prevent his plunging into some of the depths, though they are mud-holes rather than abysses Everywhere, in the literary and social Impoons of the Dunciad, in the sometimes almost unbelievable excesses of personal spite there and elsewhere, in the superficial but admirably put philosophising about ruling passions and so forth, in the sharp but not evaggerated etchings of society and its foibles, in the satire on crazes and tastes and whims-nny, in the travesties of literary history and literary criticism which we find here and there-there is always the same absolute The composition may supremacy of expression be rambling (it is only a lover's delusion that Pope is a careful plotter), the facts may be wrong, the temper may be detestable, or all these things may be presented in various degrees of excellence But always the poet says just what he wants to say, just in the manner in which he wishes to say Pope's lyrical and miscellaneous pieces must not be passed over, but are of minor total as well as individual importance His Ode on St Cecilia's Day is a manifest following of Dryden's, and far inferior, the translation and the imitation of Hadrian's Animula Vagula are both very ingemous and pretty (see Vol I p 783), the epitaph on Gry is touching, and that on Newton rhetorically, if flashily, effective, the Song by a Person of Quality is one of the most delightful rullyings of poetical rubbish in the language, and the complimentary verses to Mrs Howard are charm The rest (of which The Universal Prayer, unkindly called by some The Devil's Prayer, is the chief) are no great things. Pope wrote prose very well, but almost entirely confined his evercises in it to annotations on his poems, and to an abundance of letters, which at their best are somewhat artificial, and in refashioning and publishing which he allowed himself the most astonishing and almost incredible devices of tortuous policy

One curious work of his, generally omitted in accounts of him, remains to be noticed. There are frequent mentions in Spence's Anecdotes of his fondness for the modern Italian-Latin poets, Politian, Molza, and others. But few of his biographers have said anything of the form which this fancy took, in a book issued late in his life—Selecta Poemata Italorum, Accurante A Pope (2 vols London, 1740). This, which was founded on an anonymous collection issued in 1684, has no introduction or notes, but is still one of the best anthologies of the matter on a moderate scale. And perhaps Pope's study of these writers may have had more to do with his poetical peculiarities than has been generally recognised.

From 'The Rape of the Lock.'

Not with more glories, in the ethereal plain, The sun first rises o'er the purpled main, Than issuing forth, the rival of his beams, Launched on the bosom of the silver Thames Fair nymphs and well drest youths around her shone, But every eye was fixed on her alone. On her white breast a sparkling cross she wore, Which Jews might kiss, and infidels adore. Her lively looks a sprightly mind disclose, Quick as her eyes, and as unfixed as those. Favours to none, to all she smiles extends, Oft she rejects, hut never once offends Bright as the sun, her eves the gazers strike, And, like the sun, they shine on all alike Yet graceful ease, and sweetness void of pride, Might liide her faults, if belles had faults to hide, If to her share some female errors fall, Look on her face, and you'll forget 'em all

This nymph, to the destruction of mankind, Nourished two locks, which graceful hung behind In equal curls, and well conspired to deck, With shining ringlets, the smooth ivory neck Love in these labyrinths his slaves detains, And mighty hearts are held in slender chains. With hairy springes we the birds betray, Slight lines of hair surprise the finny prey, Fair tresses man's imperial race ensnare, And beauty draws us with a single hair

The advent'rous baron the bright locks admired, He saw, he wished, and to the prize aspired. Resolved to win, he meditates the way, By force to ravish or by fraud betray, For when success a lover's toil attends, Few ask if fraud or force attained his ends.

For this, ere Phœbus rose, he had implored Propitious heaven, and every power adored, Bnt chiefly Love—to Love an altar huilt, Of twelve vast French romances, neatly gilt There lay three garters, half a pair of gloves, And all the trophies of his former loves, With tender billet doux he lights the pyre, And breathes three amorous sighs to raise the fire. Then prostrate falls, and begs with ardent eyes Soon to obtain, and long possess the prize, The powers gave ear, and granted half his prayer The rest the winds dispersed in empty air

But now secure the painted vessel glides, The sunbeams trembling on the floating tides While melting music steals upon the sky, And softened sounds along the waters die, Smooth flow the waves, the zephyrs gently play, Belinda smiled, and all the world was gay All but the Sylph, with careful thoughts oppressed, The impending woe sat heavy on his breast He summons straight his denizens of air, The lucid squadrons round the sails repair Soft o'er the shrouds aerial whispers breatlie, That seemed but zephyrs to the train beneath Some to the sun their insect wings unfold, Waft on the breeze, or sink in clouds of gold, Transparent forms, too fine for mortal sight, Their fluid bodies half dissolved in light, Loose to the wind their airy garments flew, Thin glittering textures of the filmy dew, Dipped in the richest fincture of the skies, Where light disports in ever mingling dyes, While every beam new transient colours flings, Colours that change whene'er they wave their wings. Amid the circle on the gilded mast, Superior by the head was Ariel placed, His purple pinions opening to the sun, He raised his azure wand, and thus begun

'Ye sylpbs and sylphids, to your chief give ear! Fays, fairies, genii, elves, and dæmons, hear! Ye know the spheres, and various tasks assigned By laws eternal to the acrial kind Some in the fields of purest ether play And bask and whiten in the blaze of day, Some guide the course of wandering orbs on high, Or roll the planets through the boundless sky, Some, less refined, beneath the moon's pale light Pursue the stars that shoot athwart the night, Or suck the mists in grosser air below, Or dlp their pinions in the painted bow, Or brew fierce tempests on the wintry main, Or o'er the glebe distil the kindly rain Others on earth o'er human race preside, Watch all their ways, and all their actions guide Of these the chief the care of nations own, And guard with arms divine the British throne

'Our humbler province is to tend the fair,
Not a less pleasing, though less glorious care,
To save the powder from too rude a gale,
Nor let the imprisoned essences exhale,
To draw fresh colours from the vernal flowers,
Io steal from rainbows ere they drop in showers
A brighter wash, to curl their waving hairs,
Assist their blushes, and inspire their airs,
Nay oft, in dreams, invention we bestow,
To change a flounce, or add a furbelow'

From Eloisa to Abelard'

In these deep solitudes and awful cells, Where heavenly pensive Contemplation dwells, And ever musing Melancholy reigns, What means this tumult in a vestal's veins? Why rove my thoughts beyond this last retreat? Why feels my heart its long forgotten heat? Yet, yet I love '—From Abelard it came, And Eloisa yet must kiss the name

Dear, fatal name ' rest ever unrevealed,
Nor pass these lips in holy silence sealed
Hide it, my heart, within that close disguise,
Where, mixed with God's, his loved idea lies O write it not, my hand—the name appears Already written—wash it out, my tears '
In vain lost Eloisa weeps and prays,
Her heart still dictates, and her hand obeys.

Kelentless walls! whose darksome round centains Repentant sighs, and voluntary pains. Ye rugged rocks, which holy knees have worn, Ye grots and caverns shagged with horrid thorn! Shrines, where their visits pale-eyed virgins keep, And pitying saints, whose statues learn to weep! Though cold like vou, unmoved and silent grown, I have not yet forgot myself to stone. All is not heaven's while Abelard has part, Still rebel nature holds out half my heart, Nor prayers nor fasts its stubborn pulse restrain, Nor tears for ages taught to flow in vain

Soon as thy letters trembling I enclose,
That well known name awakens all my voes.
Oh, name for ever sad, for ever dear!
Still breathed in sighs, still ushered with a tear
I tremble, too, where'er my own I find,
Some dire misfortune follows close behind.
Line after line my gushing eves o erflow,
Led through a sad variety of woe
Now warm in love, now withering in my bloom,
Lost in a convent's solitary gloom'
There stern rehyion quenched the unwilling flame,
There died the best of passions, love and fame

Yet write, oh, write me all, that I may join Griefs to thy griefs, and echo sighs to thine! Nor foes nor fortune take this power away, And is my Abelard less I ind than they? Tears still are mine, and those I need not spare, Love but demands what else were shed in praver No happier task these faded eyes pursue, To read and weep is all they now can do

Then share thy pain, allow that sad rehef, Ah, more than share it, give me all thy grief Heaven first taught letters for some wreteh's aid, Some banished lover, or some captive maid, They live, they speak, they breathe what love inspires, Warm from the soul, and faithful to its fires The virgin's wish without her fears impart, Excuse the blush, and pour out all the heart, Speed the soft intercourse from soul to soul, And waft a sigh from Indus to the pole.

Ah, think at least thy flock deserves thy care, Plants of thy hand, and children of thy prayer, From the false world in early youth they fled, By thee to mountains, wilds, and deserts led, You raised these hallowed walls, the desert smiled, And Paradise was opened in the wild

No r coping orphan saw his father's stores Our shrines irradiate, or emblaze the floors, No silver saints, by dying misers given, Here bribed the rige of ill requited heaven But such plan roofs as prety could raise, And only vecal with the Waler's pruse In these lone walls (their day a cternal bound), These moss grown domes with spiry turrets crowned, Where awful arches make a noonday night, And the dim windows shed a solemn light, Thy eyes diffused a reconciling my, And gleams of glory brightened all the day But now no face divine contentment wears, 'Its all blank sadress or continual tears. See how the force of others' prayers I try, O mous fraud of amorous charity! Lut why should I on others' prayers depend? Come thou, my father, brother, husband, friend! Ah, let thy handmaid, sister, daughter, move, And all those tender names in one, thy love! The darksome pines that o'er you rocks reclined, Wave high, and murmur to the hollow wind, The wand'ring streams that shine bety cen the hills, The grots that echo to the tink ling rills, The dying gales that pant upon the trees, The lakes that quiver to the curling breeze, No more these scenes my meditation aid, Or lull to rest the visionary maid But o'er the t vilight groves and dusky caves, Long sounding aisles, and intermingled graves, Llack Melancholy sits, and round her throws A deathlike silence and a dead repose Her gloomy presence saildens all the scene, Shides every flower, and darkens every green, Deepens the murmur of the falling floods, And breathes a browner horror on the woods

What scenes appear where'et I turn my view I The dear ideas, where I fly, pursue, Rise in the grove, before the altar rise, Stain all my soul, and wanton in my eyes. I waste the matin lamp in sighs for thee Thy image steals between my God and me, Thy voice I seem in every hymn to hear, With every bead I drop too soft a tear of When from the censer clouds of fragrance roll, And swelling organs lift the rising soul, One thought of thee puts all the pomp to flight, Priests, tapers, temples, swim before my sight, In seas of flame my plunging soul is drowned, While alters blaze, and angels tremble round

While prostrate here in humble grief I lie, kind virtuous drops just gathering in my eye, While praying, trembling in the dust I roll, And dawning grace is opening on my soul Come, if thou dar'st, all charming as thou art' Oppose thyself to heaven, dispute my heart Come, with one glance of those deluding eyes Blot out each bright idea of the skies, Tale back that grace, those sorrows, and those tears, Tale back my fruitless penitence and prayers, Snatch me, just mounting, from the blest abode, Assist the fiends, and tear me from my God'

No, fly me, fly me! far as pole from pole, Rise Alps hetween us! and whole oceans roll! Ah, come not, write not, think not once of me, Nor share one pang of all I felt for thee.

Thy oaths I quit, thy memory resign,
Forget, renounce me, hate whate'er was mine.
Fair eyes, and tempting looks (which yet I view!)
Long loved, adored ideas, all adieu!
O grace serene! O virtue beavenly fair!
Divine oblivion of low-thoughted care!
Fresh blooming liope, gay daughter of the sky!
And faith, our early immortality!
Enter, each mild, each amicable guest
Receive, and wrap me in eternal rest!

Elegy to the Memory of an Unfortunate Lady

What beck'ning ghost along the moonlight shade Invites my steps, and points to yonder glade? 'I's she!—but why that bleeding bosom gored? Why dimly gleams the visionary sword? Oh, ever beauteous, ever friendly! tell, Is it, in heaven, a crime to love too well? To bear too tender or too firm a heart, To act a lover's or a Roman's part? Is there no bright reversion in the sky For those who greatly think or hravely die?

Why bade ye else, ye powers! her soul aspire Above the vulgar flight of low desire? Ambition first sprung from your hlest abodes. The glorious fault of angels and of gods. Thence to their images on earth it flows, And in the breasts of kings and heroes glows. Most souls, 'tis true, but peep out once an age, Dull sullen prisoners in the body's cage. Dun lights of life, that burn a length of years, Useless, unseen, as lamps in sepulchres, Like Eastern kings, a lazy state they keep, And, close confined to their own palace, sleep

From these perhaps, are nature bade her die, Fate snatched her early to the pitying sky. As into air the purer spirits flow, And separate from their kindred dregs helow, So flew the soul to its congenial place, Nor left one virtue to redeem her race.

But thou, false guardian of a charge too good, Thou, mean deserter of thy brother's blood! See on these ruby lips the trembling breath, These cheeks now fading at the blast of death, Cold is that hreast which warmed the world before, And those love-darting eyes must roll no more. Thus, if eternal justice rules the ball, Thus shall your wives, and thus your children fall On all the line a sudden vengeance waits, And frequent hearses shall besiege your gates There passengers shall stand, and, pointing, say (While the long funerals blacken all the way), Lo! these were they whose souls the Innes steeled, And cursed with hearts unknowing how to yield. Thus unlamented pass the proud away, The gaze of fools, and pageant of a day ' So perish all whose breast ne'er learned to glow For others' good, or melt at others' woe.

What can atone, oli, ever injured shade! Thy fate unpitted, and thy rites unpaid? No friend s complaint, no kind domestic tear Pleased thy pale ghost, or graced thy mournful hier By foreign hands thy dying eyes were closed, By foreign hands thy decent limbs composed, By foreign hands thy humble grave adorned, By strangers honoured, and hy strangers mourned!

What though no friends in sahle weeds appear, Grieve for an hour, perhaps, then mourn a year, And bear about the mockery of woe

To midnight dances and the public show,
What though no weeping Loves thy ashes grace,
Nor polished marble emulate thy face,
What though no sacred earth allow thee room,
Nor hallowed dirge be muttered o'er thy tomh?
Yet shall thy grave with rising flowers be dressed,
And the green turf he lightly on thy breast
There shall the Morn her earliest tears bestow,
There the first roses of the year shall blow,
While angels with their silver wings o'ershade
The ground, now sacred by thy relies made

So peaceful rests, without a stone, a name, What once had heauty, titles, wealth, and fame How loved, how honoured once, avails thee not, To whom related, or by whom begot, A heap of dust alone remains of thee, Tis all thou art, and all the proud shall be!

Poets themselves must fall, like those they sung, Deaf the praised ear, and mute the tuneful tongue. Even he whose soul now melts in mournful lays, Shall shortly want the generous tear he pays, Then from his closing eyes thy form shall part, And the last pang shall tear thee from his heart, Life's idle husiness at one gasp be o'er, The Muse forgot, and thou beloved no more!

Happiness not in Riches but in Virtue know, all the good that individuals find, Or God and nature meant to mere mankind, Reason's whole pleasure, all the joys of sense, Lie in three words-Health, Peace, and Competence. But Health consists with temperance alone, And Peace, O virtue I Peace is all thy own. The good or bad the gifts of fortune gain, But these less taste them, as they worse obtain Say, in pursuit of profit or delight, Who risk the most, that take wrong means or right? Of vice or virtue, whether hlest or curst, Which meets contempt, or which compassion first? Count all the advantage prosperous vice attains, Tis but what virtue flies from and disdains And grant the had what happiness they would, One they must want, which is, to pass for good

O blind to truth, and God s whole scheme below, Who fancy bliss to vice, to virtue woe! Who sees and follows that great scheme the best, Best knows the blessing, and will most be blessed. But fools the good alone unhappy call, For ills or accidents that chance to all See Falkland dies, the virtuous and the just! See godlike Turenne prostrate on the dust! See Sidney bleeds and the martial strife! Was this their virtue, or contempt of life? Say, was it virtue, more though Heaven ne'er gave, Lamented Dighy! sunk thee to the grave? Tell me, if virtue made the son expire, Why, full of days and honour, lives the sire? Why drew Marseilles' good bishop purer breath, When nature sickened, and each gale was death? Or why so long (in life if long can be) Lent Heaven a parent to the poor and me?

Honour and shame from no condition rise, Act well your part, there all the honour lies. Fortune in men has some small difference made,
One flaunts in rags, one flutters in brocade,
The cobbler aproned, and the parson gowined,
The friar hooded, and the monarch crowned
'What differ more,' you cry, 'than crown and cowl?'
I'll tell you, friend 'a wise man and a fool.
You'll find, if once the monarch acts the monk,
Or, cobbler like, the parson will be drunk,
Worth makes the man, and want of it the fellow
The rest is all but leather or principle.

But by your father's worth if yours you rate, Count me those only who were good and great Go! if your ancient but ignoble blood. Has crept through scoundrels ever since the flood, Go! and pretend your family is young. Nor own your fathers have been fools so long. What can ennoble sots, or slaves, or cowards? Alas! not all the blood of all the Howards.

I ook next on greatness, say where greatness hes 'Where, but among the heroes and the wise?' Heroes are much the same, the point's agreed, From Macedonia's madm in to the Swede. The whole strange purpose of their lives to find Or make, an enemy of all mankind ! If parts allure thee, think how Bacon shined, The wisest, brightest meanest of mankind Or ravished with the whistling of a name, See Cromwell, damned to everlasting fame! If all united thy ambition call, From ancient story learn to scorn them all There, in the rich, the honoured, funed, and great, See the false scale of happiness complete 1 In hearts of kings, or arms of queens who lay, How happy ' those to ruin, these betray Mark by what wretched steps their glory grows. From dirt and sea weed as proud Venice rose, In each how guilt and greatness equal ran, And all that raised the hero, sunk the man Now Europe's laurels on their brows behold. But stamed with blood, or ill exchanged for gold Then see them broke with toils, or sunk in ease, Or infamous for plundered provinces. O wealth ill fated ! which no act of fame E er taught to shine, or sanctitied from shame! What greater bliss attends their close of life? Some greedy minion or imperious wife The trophied arches, storied halls invade, And haunt their slumbers in the pompous shade Alas 1 not dazzled with their noontide ray, Compute the morn and evening to the day, The whole amount of that enormous frinc, A tale, that blends their glory with their shame l

A tale, that blends their glory with their shame!

Know then this truth (enough for man to know),
'Virtue alone is happiness below')

The only point where human bliss stands still,
And tastes the good without the fall to ill,
Where only merit constant pay receives,
Is blest in what it takes, and what it gives,
The joy unequalled if its end it gain,
And if it lose, attended with no pain
Without satiety though e'er so blessed,
And but more relished as the more distressed
The broadest mirth unfeeling Folly wears,
Less pleasing far than Virtue's very tears
Good from each object, from each place acquired,
For ever exercised, yet never tired,

Never elated, while one man's oppressed,
Never dejected, while another's blessed,
And y here no wants, no wishes can remain,
Since but to wish more virtue, is to gain
(From the Friagen Man, Fpotle ir)

Dially was the Hon. Robert Dialty, third son of Lord Dialty, who died in 1724. M. de Belsance, Bishop of Markelles, distinguished him elf by his activity during the plague to Markelles in 1722. Printella was a species of woollen stuff, of which clergymena goans were often made. The allusion in the passage about the tare that blends their glory with their chame, is to the great Duke of Mail borough and his 'imperious du hest. The oftequated him a' ha hourst man's their bleat work of God, occurs in this Firsty.

Hope

Hope springs eternal in the human breast Man never is, but always to be blest The soul, uneary and confined from home, leests and expandes in a life to come (knowledge) and knowledge.

The Poor Indian.

Lo the poor Indian, whose untutored mind Sees God in clouds, or hears him in the wind, His soil proud Science never trught to stray Par as the solar walk or unilly was Net simple nature to his hope has given Behind the cloud topped full an humbler heaven, Some safer world in depth of woods embraced Soine happier i land in the waters wasts, Where slaves once more their nature land behold, No fien Is forment, no Christians that I for gold To be, contents his natural desire, He as I sino angel's wing no scraph's fire But thinks, admitted to that equal sky His furthful dog shall be ir him company (From the Firty on Man, Epotle 1)

Happiness.

O Happiness tour being's end and aim, Good, Plessure, Lase, Content, whateer the name That something still which prompts to' eternal's gli, For which we hear to live, or due to die, Which still so near us, yet beyout us hes, O erlooked, seen double by the fool and wise ! Plant of celestial seed 1 if dropped below, Say in what mortal soil thou deign st to grow? Fair opening to some court's propitious shire, Or deep with diamonds in the flaming mine? Twined with the wreaths Parnassian laurels yield, Or reaped in iron harvests of the field? Where grows '-where grows it not? If vain our toil, We ought to blame the culture, not the soil Fixed to no spot is Happiness sincere, 'Fis nowhere to be found, or everywhere, 'Tis never to be bought, but always free, And, fled from monarchs, St John, dwells with thee. Ask of the learned the way! The learned are blind, This bids to serve, and that to shun mankind, Some place the bliss in action, some in ease, Tho c call it pleasure, and contentment these Some, sunk to beasts, find pleasure end in pain, Some, swelled to gods, confess e'en virtue vain, Or Indolent, to each extreme they fall, To trust in everything, or doubt of all (From the Fasty on Min, Episile iv)

From the 'Essay on Criticism.'
Such shameless bards we have, and yet 'tis true,
There are as mind abandoned critics too.

The bookful block head, ignorantly read, With loads of learned lumber in his head, With his own tongue still edifies his ears, and always listening to lumself appears All books he reads, and all he reads assails, From Dryden's Fables down to Durfey's Tales With him, most authors steal their works, or buy, Garth did not write his own Dispensary Name a new play, and he's the poet's friend, Nay showed his faults-but when would poets mend? No place so sacred from such fops is barred, Nor is Paul's church more safe than Paul's churchyard Nay, fly to altars, there they'll talk you dead For fools rush in where angels fear to tread Distrustful sense with modest caution speaks, It still looks home, and short excursions makes, But rattling nonsense in full volleys breaks, And never shocked, and never turned aside, Bursts out, resistless, with a thund'ring tide.

But where's the man, who counsel can bestow,
Still pleased to teach, and yet not proud to know?
Unbiassed or by favour, or by spite,
Not dully prepossessed, nor blindly right,
Tho' learned, well bred, and tho' well bred, sincere,
Modestly bold, and humanly severe
Who to a friend his faults can freely show,
And gladly praise the merit of a foe.
Blest with a taste exact, yet unconfined,
A knowledge both of books and human kind
Gen rous converse, a soul exempt from pride,
And love to praise, with reason on his side

Such once were critics, such the happy few Athens and Rome in better ages knew. The mighty Stagirite first left the shore, Spread all his sails, and durst the deeps explore. He steered securely, and discovered far, Led by the light of the Meonian star. Focts, a race long unconfined, and free, Still fond and proud of savage liberty, Received his laws, and stood convinced 'twas fit, Who conquered nature, should preside o'er wit.

Horace still charms with graceful negligence, And without method talks us into sense, Will, like a friend, familiarly convey. The truest notions in the easiest way. He who, supreme in judgment as in wit, Might holdly censure as he holdly writ, Vet judged with coolness, they he sung with fire, this precepts teach but what his works inspire. Our crities take a contrary extreme, They judge with fury, but they write with the ine Nor suffers Horace more in wrong translations. By wits, than crities in as wrong quotations.

Armtotle was born in Stagira, and Homer was called Mizonides either because he was supposed to have been born at Smyroa in Miconia (or Lydia), or because he was the you of Mizon. In the last line by it to be understood before 'entics.

From 'The Prologue to the Satires'

P Shut, shut the door, good John! faugued I said, The up the knocker—say I'm sick I'm dead. The dog star riges! may, 'tis past a doubt, All Bedlam or Parnassus is let out here in each eye and papers in each land, They rave, recite, and madden round the land. What walls can guard me, or what shades can lade? They pierce my thickets, through my brot they glide.

By land, by water they renew the charge,
They stop the charnet and they board the barge.
No place is sacred, not the church is free,
Even Sunday shines no Sabbath day to me,
Then from the Mint walks forth the man of rhyme,
Happy to catch me just at dinner time.

Is there a parson much bemused in beer,
A mandlin poetess, a rhyming peer,
A clerk foredoomed his father's soul to cross,
Who pens a stanza when he should engross?
Is there who, locked from ink and paper, scrawls
With desperate charcoal round his darkened walls?
All fly to Twit'nam, and in humble strain
Apply to me, to keep them mad or vain.

Who shames a scribbler? Break one cobweb through, He spins the slight, self pleasing thread anew Destroy his fib or sophistry in vain! The creature's at his dirty work again, Throned in the centre of his thin designs, Proud of a vast extent of flimsy lines.

One dedicates in high heroic prose,
And ridicules beyond a hindred foes
One from all Grub Street will my fame defend,
And, more abusive, calls himself my friend
This prints my letters, that expects a brile,
And others roar aloud "Subscribe, subscribe"

There are who to my person pay their court I cough like Horace, and though lean, an short Ammon's great son one shoulder had too high, Such Ovid's nose, and, 'Sir' you have an eye!' Say for my comfort, languishing in bed 'Just so immortal Maro held his head,' And when I die, be sure you let me know Great Homer died three thousand years ago

Why did I write? what sin to nic unknown Dipped me in ink, my parents, or my own? As yet a child, nor yet a fool to fame, I lisped in numbers, for the numbers came. I left no calling for this idle trade, No duty broke, no father disobeyed. The muse but served to ease some friend, not wife, To help me through this long disease, my life, To second, Arbuthnot, thy art and care, And teach the being you preserved, to lear

A man's true ment 'tis not hard to find But each man's secret standard in his mind, That easing weight pride adds to emptiness, This, who can gratify? for who can guess? The bard whom pilfered Pastorals renown, Who turns a Persian tale for half a crown, Just writes to make his barrenness appear, And strains from hard bound brains eight lines a year. He who, still wanting, though he lives on theft, Steals much, spends little, yet has nothing left and he who now to sense, now nonsense learning, Means not, but blunders round about a meaning, And he whose fustion is so sublimely bad, It is not poetry, but prose run mad All these my mode t satire bade translate And owned that nine such poets made a Tite How did they fume, and stamp, and roar, and chafe! And swear, not Ad h on himself was safe.

Peace to all such that were there one whose fires. True gen us kin ile, and fair fame in pires, Blest with each talent and each art to please. And born to write, converse, and live with case Should such a man, too fond to rule alone, Bear, like the Turk, no brother near the throne, View him with scornful, yet with jealous eyes, And hate for aits that caused houself to ric. Damn with fault praise, assent with civil leer. And without succring, teach the rest to succr. Willing to wound and yet afraid to strike, Just hint a fault and he state d slike, Alike reserved to blame or to commend, A timorous foe and a suspicious friend, Dreading even fools, by flutterers be reged, And so obliging that he ne er obliged, Like Cito, sive his hitle senite lines, And sit attentive to his own applause. While with and Templars every sentence raile, And wonder with a foolish face of praise Who but must lough if such a man there be? Who would not weep if Atticus were he?

That not in fancy's maze he wandered long, But stooped to truth, and moralised his song, That not for fame but virtue's better end, He stood the furious foe, the timid friend, The damning critic, half approving wit, The coxcomb hit, or fearing to be hit. ## Song by a Person of Quality

Finttering spread thy purple pinions, Gentle Cupid, o'er my heart I a slave in thy dominions, Nature must give way so art

Mild Arcadians, ever hlooming, Nightly nodding o'er your flocks, See my weary days consuming, All beneath yon flowery rocks

Thus the Cyprian goddess weeping, Mourned Adonis, darling youth Him the boar in silence creeping, Gored with unrelenting tooth.

Cynthia, tune harmonious numbers, Fair Discretion, string the lyre, Soothe my ever waking slumbers Bright Apollo, lend thy choir

Gloomy Pluto, king of terrors, Armed in adamantine chains, Lead me to the crystal mirrors, Watering soft Elysian plains.

Monraful cypress, verdant willow, Gilding my Aurelia's brovs, Morpheus hovering o'er my pillow, Hear me pay my dying vows

Melancholy smoo h Mæander, Swiftly purling in a round, On thy margin lovers wander, With thy flowery chaplets crowned.

Thus when Philomela drooping, Softly seeks her silent mate, See the bird of Juno stooping, Melody resigns to fate.

On a Certain Lady at Court.

I know the thing that's most uncommon, (Envy, be silent, and attend')
I know a reasonable woman,
Handsome and witty, yet a friend.

Not warped by passion, awed by rumour, Not grave thro' pride, or gay through folly, An equal mixture of good humour And sensible soft melancholy

* Has she no faults then (Envy says), sir?' Yes, she has one, I must aver, When all the world conspires to praise her, The woman's deaf, and does not hear

Death of Villiers, Duke of Buckingham.

In the worst inn's worst room, with mat half hung The floors of plaister, and the walls of dung. On once a flock-bed, but repaired with straw, With tape tied curtains, never meant to draw, The George and Garter dangling from that bed Where tawdry yellow strove with dirty red, Great Villiers lies—alas' how changed from him, That life of pleasure, and that soul of whim! Gallant and gay, in Cliveden's proud alcove, The bower of wanton Shrewsbury and love,

Or just as gay, at council, in a ring
Of mimic statesmen, and their merry king
No wit to flatter, left of all his store!
No fool to laugh at, which he valued more.
There, victor of his health, of fortune, friends,
And fame, this lord of useless thousands ends.

For Buckingham's story, see Vol. I p. 783

The Dying Christian to his Soul.

Vital spark of heavenly flame, Qnit, O quit this mortal frame Trembling, hoping, lingering, flying— O the pain, the bliss of dying! Cease, fond Nature, cease thy strife, And let me languish into life!

Hark! they whisper, angels say, 'Sister spirit, come away!'
What is this absorbs me quite?
Steals my senses, shuts my sight,
Drowns my spirits draws my breath?
Tell me, my soul, can this be death?

The world reeedes—it disappears!
Heaven opens on my eyes! my ears
With sounds scraphic ring
Lend, lend your wings! I mount! I fly!
O Grave! where is thy victory?
O Death! where is thy sting?

This imitation of the Initiala vagula blandula verses attributed to the dying (heathen) Emperor Hadrian, was obviously in part moulded by Thomas Flaiman's ode, quoted at Vol. I p. 783.

From Pope's 'Bliad'

The troops exulting sat in order round, And beaming fires illumined all the ground, As when the moon, refulgent lamp of night! O'er heaven's pure azure spreads her sacred light, When not a breath disturbs the deep screne, And not a cloud o'ercasts the solemn scene. Around her throne the vivid planets roll, And stars unnumbered gild the glowing pole, O'er the dark trees a yellower verdure shed, And tip with silver every mountain's head, Then shine the vales, the rocks in prospect rise, A flood of glory hursts from all the skie, The conscious swains, rejoicing in the sight, Eye the blue vault, and bles the useful light. So many flames before proud Ilion blaze, And lighten glimmering Nanthus with their rays, The long reflections of the distant fires Gleam on the walls and tremble on the spires A thousand piles the dusky horrors gild, And shoot a shady lustre o'er the field Full fifty guards each flaming pile attend, Whose ambered arms by fits thick flashes send Loud neigh the coursers o'er their heaps of corn, And ardent warriors wait the rising morn

On Sickness and Death

To SIR RICHARD STEELE - July 15, 1712.

You formerly observed to me that nothing made a more ridiculous figure in a man's life than the disparity we often find in him siek and well, thus, one of an unfortunate constitution is perpetually exhibiting a miser able example of the weakness of his mind and of his body in their turns. I have had frequent opportunities of late to consider myself in these different news and, I hope, have received some advantage by it, if what Waller says be true, that

'The soul's dark cottage, battered and decryed,

Lets in new light through chinks that Time has made ' Then surely sickness, contributing no less than old age to the shaking down this scaffolding of the body, may discover the inward structure more plainly Sickness is a sort of early old age at teache us a distidence in our earthly state, and inspires us with the thoughts of a future, better than a thousand volumes of philosophers and divines. It gives so warning a concussion to tho c props of our vanity, our strength and youth, that we think of fortifying ourselves within, when there is so little dependence upon our outworks. Youth at the very best is but a betraver of human life in a gentler and smoother manner than age it is like a stream that nourishes a plant upon a bank, and causes it to flourish and blossom to the sight but at the same time is un dermining it at the root in secret. My youth has dealt more fairly and openly with me, it has afforded several prospects of my danger, and given me an advantage not very common to young men, that the attractions of the world have not dazzled me very much, and I begin, where most people end, with a full conviction of the emptiness of all sorts of ambition, and the unsatisfactory nature of all human pleasures. When a smart fit of sickness tells me this scurvy tenement of my body will fall in a little time, I am even as unconcerned as was that honest Hibernian, who, being in bed in the great storm some years ago, and told the house would tumble over his head, made answer 'Whit care I for the house? I am only a lodger! I fancy it is the best time to die when one is in the best lumiour and so excess sively weak as I now am, I may say with conscience, that I am not at all uneasy at the thought that many men. whom I never had any esteem for, are likely to enjoy this world after me. When I reflect what an inconsider able little atom every single man is, with respect to the whole ereation, methinks it is a shame to be concerned at the removal of such a trivial animal as I am morning after my exit, the sun will rise as bright as ever, the flowers smell as sweet, the plants spring as green, the world will proceed in its old course, people will laugh as licartily, and marry as fist as they were used to do The memory of man-as it is elegantly expressed in the Book of Wisdom-passeth awiv as the remembrance of a guest that tarrieth but one day There are reasons enough, in the fourth chapter of the same book, to make any young man contented with the prospect of death. 'For honourable age is not that which standeth in length of time, or is measured by number of years But wisdom is the gray hair to men, and an unspotted life is old age. He was taken away speedily, lest wiekedness should alter his understanding, or deceit beguile his soul,' &c -I am, your, &c.

Pope was at this time only twenty four—that is, if we assume the letter to have been actually sent to Steele but it seems to be merely a literary essay—part of the fabricated correspondence.

Death of Two Lovers by Lightning

To Lady Maky Worter Montact - Sifter Ser 1 (1717)

I have a mind to fill the rest of this paper with an accident that happened just under my eves, and has made a great impression upon me. I have just pavel part of this summer at an old commute seat of my Led Harcourt, which he lent me. It overlooks a commen field, where, under the shade of a haycock, sat two lover, as constant as ever were found in romance, beneath a spreading beech. The name of the one-ict it sound as it will-was John Hewet, of the other, Sarah Drew John was a well set man about five and twenty, Sarah, a brown woman of eighteeu John bad for several months horne the labour of the day in the same field with Sarah, when she milked, it was ha morning and evening charge to bring the cons to her pail. Their love was the talk, but not the scandal, of the whole neighbourhood, for all they a med at was the blameless possession of each other in marriage It was but this very morning that he had obtained her parents' consent, and it was but till the next week that Perhaps this very day, they were to wait to be happy in the intervals of their work, they were talking of their wedding clothes, and John was now matching several kinds of poppies and field flowers to her complexion, to make her a present of knots for the day they were thus employed—it was on the last of July-2 terrible storm of thunder and lightning arose, and drove the labourers to what shelter the trees or hedges afforded. Sarah, frighted and out of breath, sunk on a haycock, and John-who never separated from her-sat by her side, having raked two or three lieaps together to secure Immediately there was heard so loud a crack as if hea en hal burst asunder The labourers, all solicitous for each other's safety, called to one another those that were nearest our lovers, hearing no answer, stepped to the place where they lay they first saw a little smoke, and after, this faithful pair-John with one arm about his Sarah's neck, and the other held over her face, as if to screen her from the lightning were struck dead, and already grown stiff and cold in this tender posture. There was no mark or dis colouring on their bodies, only that Sarah's eyebro i was a little singed, and a small spot between her breasts. They were buried the next day in one grave, in the parish of Stanton Hagcourt in Oxfordshire, where my Lord Harcourt, at my request, has crected a monument over them. Of the following epitaplis which I made, the entites have chosen the godly one I like neither, but wish you liad been in Eng land to have done this office better. I think it was what you could not have refused me on so moving an occasion

When Eastern lovers feed their funeral fire,
On the same pile their faithful fair expire,
Here pitying Heaven that virtue mutual found,
And blasted both that it might neither wound
Hearts so sincere the Minighty saw well pleased,
Sent his own lightning, and the victims seized

I hink not, by rigorous judgment seized, A pair so faithful could expire Victims so pure Heaven saw well pleased, And snatched them in celestral fire

Live well, and fear up sudden fate
When God calls virtue to the grave,
Alike 'tis justice, soon or late,
Mercy alile to kill or save
Virtue unmoved can hear the call,
And face the flash that melts the ball.

Upon the whole, I caunot think these people unhappy. The greatest happiness next to hving as they would have done, was to die as they did. The greatest honour people of this low degree could have, was to be remembered on a little monument, unless you will give them another—that of being honoured with a tear from the finest eyes in the world. I know you have tenderness, you must have it, it is the very emanation of good sense and virtue, the finest minds, like the finest inetals, dissolve the easiest.

An Ancient English Country-seat.

To I am Mar Wortley Mo Tage

DEAR MADAM—The not possible to express the least part of the joy your return gives me, time only and experience will convince you how very sincere it is. I excessively long to meet you, to say so much, so very much to you, that I believe I shall say nothing. I have given orders to be ent for the first inmute of your arrival—which I be, you will let them know at Mr. Jervas. I am four-core miles from London, a hort journes compared to that I so often thought at least of undertaking, rather than the without seeing you again.

Though the place I am in is such as I vould not quit for the town, if I aid not value vou more than any, have everybody else there, and you will be convinced how little the town has engaged my affections in your absence from it, when you know what a place this is which I prefer to it, I shall therefore describe it to you at large, as the true picture of a genuine ancient country seat

You must expect nothing regular in my description of a house that seems to be built before rules were in fashion the whole is so disjointed, and the parts so detached from each other, and yet so joining again, one cannot tell how, that-in a poetical fit-you would imagine it had been a village in Auphion's time, where twenty cottages had taken a dance together, were all out, and stood still in amazement ever since. A stranger would be grievously disappointed who should ever think to get into this house the right way. One would expect, after entering through the purch, to be let into the hall, alas ' nothing less you find yourself in a brew house. I rom the parlour you think to step into the drawing room, but, upon opening the iron nailed door, you are convinced, by a flight of birds about your carand a cloud of dust in your eyes, that it is the pincon On each side our porch are two chimneys, that wear their greens on the outside, which would do as well within, for whenever we make a fire, we let the smoke out of the windows. Over the parlour window bangs a sloping balcony, which time has turned to a very convenient penthouse The top is crowned with a very venerable tower, so like that of the church just by, that the jackdaws build in it as if it were the true steeple

The great hall is high and spacious, flanked with long tables, images of ancient hospitality, ornamented with monstrous horns, about twenty broken pikes, and a matchlock musket or two, which they say were used in the civil wars. Here is one vast arched windo v, beauti full, darkened with divers scutcheons of painted alter There seems to be great propriety in this old manner of blazoning upon glass, ancient families being like ancient windows, in the course of generations seldoin free from cricks. One shining pane bears date 1286 The youthful face of Dame Llinor owes more to this single piece than to all the glasses she ever consulted in her life Who can say after this that glass is frail, when it is not half so penshable as human beauty or glory? For in another pane you see the memory of a I night preserved whose marble nose is mouldered from his monument in the church adjoining. And vet, must not one sigh to reflect that the most authentic record of so ancient a family should he at the merey of every boy that throws a stone? In this hall, in former days, have dined guttered knights and courtly dames, with usher sewerand sineschals and yet it was but the other might that an owl flew in litther, and mistook it for a barn

This hall lets you up tand down) over a very high threshold, into the pailour. It is furnished with historical tapestry, whose marginal fringes do confess the moisture of the air. The other contents of this room are a broken bellied virginal, a couple of crippled velvet chairs, with two or three mildewed picture of mouldy ancestors, who look as dismally as if they came fresh from hell with all their brim tone about em. These are carefully set at the further corner for the windows being everywhere broken, make it so convenient a place to dry poppies and mustard cold in, that the room is appropriated to that use.

Next this parlour hes, as I said before, the pigeon house, hy the side of which runs an entry that leads, on one hand and t'other, into a bed chamber, a buttery, and a small hole called the chaplain's study. Then follow a brew house, a little green and gilt parlour, and the great stairs, under which is the dury. A little further on the right, the servants' hall, and hy the side of it, up six steps, the old lady's closet, which has a lattice into the said hall, that, while she said her prayers, she might east an eye on the men and maids. There are upon this ground floor in all twenty four apartments, hard to be distinguished by particular names, among a high I must not forget a chamber that has in it a large antiquity of timber, which seems to have been either a bedstead or a cider press.

Our best room above is very long and low, of the exact proportion of a bindhox, it has hangings of the finest work in the world, those, I mean, which Arachne spins out of her own bowels indeed, the roof is so decayed, that after a favourable shower of rain, we may, with God's blessing, expect a crop of mushrooms between the chinks of the floors

All this upper story has for many years had no other inhabitants than certain rats, whose very age renders them worthy of this venerable mansion, for the very rats of this ancient sent are gray. Since these have not quitted it, we hope at least this house may stand during the small remainder of days these poor animals have to live, who are now too infirm to remove to another they have still a small subsistence left them in the few remaining hooks of the library

I had never seen half what I have described but for an old starched gray headed steward, who is as much an antiquity as any in the place, and looks like an old family picture walked out of its frame. He failed not. as we passed from room to room, to relate severa. memoirs of the family, but his observations were par ticularly curious in the cellar he shewed where stood the triple rows of butts of sack, and where were ranged the bottles of tent for toasts in the morning he pointed to the stands that supported the iron hooped hogsheads of strong heer, then stepping to a corner, he lugged out the tattered fragments of an unframed picture 'This,' says he, with tears in his eyes, 'was poor Sir Thomas, once master of all the drink I told you of he had two sons (poor young masters!) that never arrived to the age of his beer, they both fell ill in this very cellar, and never went out upon their own legs.' He could not pass by a broken bottle without taking it up to shew us the arms of the family on it. He then led me up the tower, by dark winding stone steps, which landed us into several little rooms, one above another, one of these was nailed up, and my guide whispered to me the occasion of it. It seems the course of this noble blood was a little interrupted about two centuries ago by a freak of the Lady Frances, who was here taken with a neighbouring prior, ever since which the room has been made up, and hranded with the name of the adultery chamber The ghost of Lady Frances is upposed to walk here some prying inaids of the family formerly reported that they saw a lady in a fardingale through the keyhole, hut this matter was hushed up, and the servants forbid to talk of it.

I must needs have tired you with this long letter, but what engaged me in the description was a generous principle to preserve the memory of a thing that must itself soon fall to ruin, nay, perhaps, some part of it before this reaches your hands indeed, I owe this old house the same sort of gratitude that we do to an old friend that harbours us in his declining condition, nav. I have found this an even in his last extremities excellent place for retirement and study, where no one who passes by can dream there is an inhabitant, and even anybody that would visit me, dares not venture under my roof You will not wonder I have translated a great deal of Homer in this retreat, any one that sees it will own I could not have chosen a fitter or more likely place to converse with the dead As soon as I return to the living, it shall he to converse with I hope, therefore, very speedily the best of them to tell you in person how sincerely and unalterably I am, madam, your most faithful, obliged, and obedient servant I beg Mr Wortley to believe me his most humble servant

The house from which Pope dated this and the preceding letter was the mansion of Stanton Harcourt, here described with fantasic additions and alterations, here Pope did translate part of the Iliad

To Bishop Atterbury, in the Tower

May 17 1723.

Once more I write to you, as I promised, and this once, I fear, will be the last ! The curtain will soon be drawn between my friend and me, and nothing left but to wish you a long good night. May you enjoy a state of repose in this life not unlike that sleep of the soul which some have believed is to succeed it, where we he utterly for etful of that world from which we are gone, and ripening for that to which we are to go If you retain Iny memory of the past, let it only image to you what has pleased you best, sometimes present a dream of an absent friend, or bring you back an agreeable conversation But, upon the whole, I hope you will think less of the time past than of the future, as the former has been less kind to you than the latter infal libly will be Do not envy the world your studies, they will tend to the benefit of men against whom you can have no complaint, I mean of all posterity and, per haps, at your time of life, nothing else is worth your care. What is every year of a wise man's life but a censure or critic on the past? Those whose date is the shortest, live long enough to laugh at one half of it, the boy despises the infant, the man, the boy, the philosopher, both, and the Christian, all now begin to think your manhood was too much a puerility, and you will never suffer your age to be but a second infancy The toys and bauhles of your child hood arc hardly now more below you than those toys of our riper and our declining years, the drums and rattles of ambition, and the dirt and bihbles of avance. At this time, when you are cut off from a little society, and made a citizen of the world at large, you should bend your talents, not to serve a party or a few, but all man Your genius should mount above that mist in which its participation and neighbourhood with earth long involved it, to shine ahroad, and to heaven, ought to be the business and the glory of your present situation Remember it was at such a time that the greatest lights of antiquity dazzled and hlazed the most, in their retreat, in their exile, or in their death. But why do I talk of dazzling or blazing?—it was then that they did good, that they gave light, and that they became guides to mankind

Those aims alone are worthy of spirits 'ruly great, and such I therefore hope will be yours. Resentinent, indeed, may remain, perhaps cannot be quite extinguished in the noblest minds, but revenge never will harbour there. Higher principles than those of the first, and better principles than those of the latter, will infallibly influence men whose thoughts and whose hearts are enlarged, and cause them to prefer the whole to any part of mankind, especially to so small a part as one's single self.

Believe me, my lord, I look upon you as a spirit entered into another life, as one just upon the edge of immortality, where the passions and affections must be much more exalted, and where you ought to despise all little views and all mean retrospects. Nothing is worth your looking back, and, therefore, look forward, and make, as you can, the world look after you. But take care that it be not with pity, but with esteem and admiration.

I am, with the greatest sincerity and passion for your fame as well as happiness, your, &c.

Atterbury went into exile a month or two after this, and never returned to Englan! His farewell letter to Pope from the Tower is given above at page 152.

Pope was one of the authors of the Memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus, and in them lavished much, wit on subjects which are now mostly of little interest. He ridiculed Burnet's History of my Own Times with infinite humour in Memoirs of P P, Clerl of this Parish, and he contributed several papers to the Guardian. His prose works contain also a collection of Thoughts on Various Subjects, such as these

There never was any party, faction, seet, or cabal whatsoever, in which the most ignorant were not the most violent, for a bee is not a busier animal than a blockhead. However, such instruments are necessary to politicians, and perhaps it may be with states as with clocks, which must have some dead weight hanging at them, to help and regulate the motion of the finer and more useful parts.

When men grow virtuous in their old age, they only make a sacrifice to God of the devil's leavings.

He who tells a lie is not sensible how great a task be undertakes, for he must be forced to invent twenty more to maintain one.

Get your enemies to read your vorks in order to mend them for your friend is so much your second self, that he will judge too like you.

There is nothing wanting to make all rational and disinterested people in the world of one religion but that they should talk together every day

A short and certain way to obtain the character of a reasonable and wise man is, whenever any one tells you his opinion, to comply with him

The character of covetousness is what a man generally acquires more through one niggardliness or ill grace in little and inconsiderable things than in expenses of any consequence. A very few pounds a very would ease that man of the seardal of avarice.

Recipe for an Epic Poem-from the Guardian.

It is no small pleasure o me, who am zealous in the intensets of learning, to think I may have the honour of leading the town into a very new and uncommon read.

of criticism. As that kind of literature is at prent carried on, it consists only in a knowledge of mechanic rules which contribute to the structure of different sorts of poetry, as the receipts of good housewives do to the making puddings of flour, oranges, plums, or any other ingredients. It would, methinks, make these my instructions more easily intelligible to ordinary readers if I discoursed of these matters in the style in which ladies learned in economics dictate to their pupils for the improvement of the kitchen and larder. I shall begin with Epic Poetry, because the critics agree it is the greatest work human nature is capable of

For the Fuble.—Take out of any old poem, history-book, romance, or legend—for instance, Geoffrey of Monmouth, or Don Belianis of Greece—those parts of story which afford most scope for long descriptions—put these pieces together, and throw all the adventures you fancy into one take. Then take a hero whom you may choose for the sound of his name, and put him into the midst of these adventures—there let him work for ty clve books, at the end of which, you may take him out ready prepared to conquer or to marry, it being necessary that the conclusion of an Epic Poem be fortunate.

To make an Episode—Take any remaining adventure of your former collection, in which you could no way involve your hero, or any unfortunate accident that was too good to be thrown away, and it vill be of use, applied to any other person who may be lost and evaporate in the course of the work, without the least damage to the composition.

For the Moral and Illegory—These you may extract out of the lable afterwards at your lessure—Be sure you strain them sufficiently

For the Manners—For those of the liero, take all the best qualities you can find in all the best celebrated heroes of antiquity, if they will not be reduced to a consistency, lay them all in a heap upon him. But be sure they are qualities which your patron would be thought to have, and to prevent any mistake which the world may be subject to, select from the alphabet those capital letters that compose his name, and set them at the head of a dedication before your poem. However, do not absolutely observe the exact quantity of these virtues, it not being determined whether or not be necessary for the hero of a poem to be an hone to man.—For the under characters gather them from Homer and Virgil, and change the names as occasion serves.

For the Machines — take of deities, male and female, as many as you can use, separate them into two equal parts, and keep Jupiter in the middle. Let Juno jut him in a ferinent, and Venus mollify him. Remember on all occasions to make use of volatile Mercury. If you have need of devils, draw them out of Milton's Paradise, and extract your spirits from Fasso. The use of these machines is evident, for since no fijic Poem can possibly subsist without them, the wilk to way is to reserve them for your greatest neces at each your cannot extricate your hero by any licituar means, or yourself by your own wits, seek relief from Heaven, and the gods will do your business very readily. This is according to the direct prescript in of Horace in his 1rt of Petry.

- "Nee deus intersit, nist dignus vindice rodus Incident--"
- *Never presume to make a god appear
  But for a business worths of a god '-Roko riso

That is to say, a poet should never call upon the gods for their assistance but when he is in great perplexity

For the Descriptions—For a Tempest—Take Eurus, Zephyr, Auster, and Boreas, and east them together in one verse add to these, of rain, lightning, and of thunder (the loudest you can), quantum sufficient Mr. your clouds and billows well together till they form, and thicken your description here and there with a quiel and Brew your tempest well in your head before you set it a blowing

I or a Battle—Pick a large quantity of images and descriptions from Homer's Illiads, with a spice or two of Virgil, and if there remain any overplus, you may lay them by for a skirmish. Season it well with similes, and it will make an excellent battle

For a Burning Form—If such a description be necessary, because it is certain there is one in Virgil, Old Froy is ready burnt to your hands. But if you fear that would be thought borrowed, a chapter or two of the Theory of the Conflagration, well circumstanced, and done into verse, will be a good succedancim

As for Similes and Metaphors, they may be found all over the creation, the most ignorant may gather them, but the danger is in applying them. For this, advise with your book eller

For the Language—(I mean the dietion.) Here it will do well to be an imitator of Milton, for you will find it easier to imitate him in this than any thing clse. Hebrusms and Greeisms are to be found in him without the trouble of learning the languages. I how a painter, who like our poet, had no genius, make his daubings be thought originals by setting them in the smoke. You may, in the same manner, give the venerable air of antiquity to your piece, by darkening it up and down with Old Linglish. With this you may be easily furnished upon any occasion by the dictionary commonly printed at the end of Chaucer.

I must not conclude without cautioning all writers vithout genius in one material point, which is, never to be afruid of having too much fire in their works. I should advise rather to take their warmest thoughts, and spread them abroad upon paper, for they are observed to cool before they are read

The first edition of Pope (1751) by his friend Bishop Warburton, was an answer to Lolingbroke's altack on Pope's memory Warton's (1791) was virtually a reply to Warburton's, Bowles and Roscoe each published an edition of his works, but all other editions have been super eded by that of Elwin and Courthope, with a Life of the poet by Courthope in the last volume (10 vols 1871-89).

John Dennis (1657-1734) was known as 'the critic,' and some of his critical disquisitions show an icute but narrow and coarse mind. The son of a prosperous London saddler, he had received a learned education at Harrow and Cambridge, and was well read in ancient and modern literature. He took his place among the men of wit and fishion, and brought a rancorous pen to the assistance of the Whigs. But his intolerable vanity, irritable temper, intemperance, and fullure to attain literary success led him into feuds which rendered his vhole life a scene of warfare. His critiques on Addison's Cato and Pope's Homer are well known. He viote nine plays, for one of vhich—a tragedy called. Ippus and Luginia (1708)—he invented a new species of thunder, which was approved of in the theatres The play was not successful, and being afterwards present at a representation of Macheth, and hearing his own thunder made use of, he growled, 'See how these rascals use me. they will not let my play run, and yet they steal my thunder!' Many ludicrous stories are told of his self-importance, which amounted to a disease. Southey has praised his critical powers, and Mr Gosse, who speaks highly of his earlier work, has noted his 'fervent and judicious eulogy of Milton,' but Dennis is remembered mainly for his bitter attacks on the new school of poetry in his time, and for his quarrels with Pose, whom he assailed as a 'stupid and impudent hunch backed Pope took ample vengeance.

Charles Gildon (1665-1724), born at Gilling ham in Dorsetshire, was a Catholic bred at Douar who became a deist, and was converted back to Protestant orthodoxy. He was an industrious hack-writer, wrote unsuccessful plays, occasional poems, a Life of Defoe, and some critical books, including one on The Laws of Poetry. As he preferred Tickell as a translator, and Ambrose Philips as a pastoral poet, to Pope, he was severely handled in the Duncial and Moral Essays.

Edmund Smith (1672-1710) was, according to Dr Johnson, 'one of those lucky writers who have without much labour attained high reputation, and who are mentioned with reverence rather for the possession than the exertion of uncommon abilities,' but the reputation and the reverence have vanished, and little is remembered but his name and the fact that he wrote an artificial play, Phadra and Hippolytus, on Racine's model, which had the honour of a prologue by Addison and an epilogue by Prior, but was 'hardly heard the third night' Johnson sympathised with the public rather than with Addison, but highly praised Smith's Latin ode on the death of the orientalist, Dr Pococke, and his (English) elegy on John Philips. Handsome, slovenly 'Rag' Smith (for so he was known to his contemporaries) was the son of a London merchant called Neale, but assumed the name of a relative by whom he was brought up, he was expelled from Christ Church, Oxford, for his irregular life, and died of a dose of physic taken in defiance of the doctor

John Hughes (1677-1720), born at Marlborough, and educated at the same Dissenting academy as Dr Isaac Watts, is best known as author of a successful tragedy, The Siege of Damascus, and as a contributor to the Taller, the Spectator, the Guardian, and other serials Pope and Swift thought more highly of his character than of his poetry. But he is one of Johnson's poets, having written a number of Poems on Several Occasions, odes, &c., as well as the libretto for an English opera, Calypso and Telemachus, a masque, and several cantatas set to music by Handel and other einment musicians

He wrote to o volumes of a History of England, completed by another hand, and translated from French and Italian

William King (1663-1712) was admitted among Johnson's poets on the strength of Mully of Mountown, in honour of a cow at a friend's house near Dublin, The Art of Cookery, in imitation of Horace's 'Art of Poetry,' The Art of Love, after Ovid, and one or two other poems, mostly humorous But he was better known as a miscellaneous and controversial writer, an indolent and inefficient place holder, and a 'starving wit.' The son of a well-connected London family, he studied at Westminster and Christ Church, became DCL and advocate at Doctors' Commons, and was for a time Judge of the Admiralty Court in Ireland. succeeded Steele as Gazetteer, but could keep the post only a year and a half He took part in the controversy with Bayle against Bentley, supported the Tory and High Church interest in the Sacheverell and other cases, and wrote against Marl-His best-known works are Dialogues of the Dead (against Bentley), and a travesty, A Journey to London, in the character of a French man, in which the vein of jocularity is very thin Thus he tedtously enumerates trifling facts

I found the houses some of them stone entire, some of brick with free stone, as the Crown Tavern upon Ludgate Hill and the corner house of Birchen lane and several others Divers of the citizens houses have fort cochers to drive in a coach or a cart cither, and con sequently have courts within and mostly remises to set them up Such persons as have no port cochers, and consequently no courts or remises, set up their coaches at other places and let their horses stand at livery The cellar windows of most houses are grated with strong bars of iron to keep thieves out, and Newgate is grated up to the top to keep them in Which must be a vast expence There are beggars in London and people v hose necessities force them to ask relief from such as they think able to afford it There is a great deal of noise in this city, of public cries of things to be sold, and great disturbance from pamphlets and hawkers

Orpheus and Euridice is a burlesque overflowing with 'modernity,' and runs on in this fashion

This Orpheus was a jolly boy, Born long before the siege of Troy His parents found the lad was sharp, And taught him on the Irish harp, And v hen grown fit for marriage life, Gave him Luridice for wife, And they, as soon as match was made, Set up the ballad singing trade The cunning varlet cou'd devise, For country folks ten thousand lies, Affirming all those monstrous things Were done by force of harp and strings, Cou'd make a tyger in a trice Tame as a cat, and catch your mice, Cou'd make a lyon's courage flag, And straight cou'd animate a stag,

And by the help of pleasing ditties,
Make mill stones run, and build up cities,
Each had the use of fluent tongue,
If Dice scolded, Orpheus sung
And so by discord without strife,
Compos'd one harmony of life,
And thus, as all their matters stood,
They got an honest livelihood

Happy were mortals could they be I'rom any sudden danger free, Happy were poets could their song, The feeble thread of life prolong But as these two went strouling on, Poor Dice's scene of life was done, Away her fleeting breath must fly, Yet no one knows wherefore, or why This caus d'the general lamentation, To all that knew her in her station, How brisk she was still to advance The harper's gain, and lead the dance, In every tune observe her trill, Sing on, yet change the money still.

Another contemporary William King (1650–1729) was—though born in Aberdeenshire—Archbishop of Dublin, and a writer on divinity, a third (1685–1763), born at Stepney, and Principal of St Mary Hall, Oxford, was author of The Toast, a mockheroic satire levelled against his opponents in a troublesome lawsuit about a property in Galway

Aar on Hill (1685–1750), the son of a Wiltshire squire, was bred at Barnstaple and Westminster, and travelled with a tutor to Constantinople and He wrote numerous poems and a the Levant dozen plays, and cut a considerable figure among the literary men of the first half of the eighteenth century, not a few of whom were his debtors for encouragement and help, but he is best remembered for his controversy with Pope, the allusion to him in the Dunciad, for the spirit with which he met Pope's attack, and the victory he obtained in the ensuing correspondence. Only one of Hill's dramas, the tragedy of Zara, after Voltaire, can be said to have been popular. He was an ingenious, speculative man, projected a new way of making potash, extracted oil from beech mast, manufactured wine from a vineyard in Essex, and tried to develop the rafting of timber down the Spey for the navy, but was seldom successful in any of his schemes

Hill is not the contemptible poetaster he is often taken for, though in the cighty two closely printed, double-columned pages occupied by his poetical works in Anderson's British Poets there is much wearisome commonplace, as well as some felicity of diction and real poetry, and much of no little interest, in a form old fashioned enough to seem ungraceful, yet not archaic enough to be quaint. He praised Pope, encouraged Thomson with sound advice excellently versified, and enthusiastically greeted 'the unknown author of the beautiful new piece called Pamela.' He intervened warmly in prose and verse on behalf of Savage. He wrote the famous translation of Crashaw's lines on the miracle of Cana. In a panegyric of Peter the Great he laments British suspicion of Russia, foresees the Black Sea covered by the Russian navy, the East and West united and under Russian sway, Siberia occupied, and China and the Porte humiliated And before Ossian Macpherson was born we find Hill translating from (non-extant?) Gaelic poems and praising the Scuirs of Skye.

Ronald and Dorna-By a Highlander, to his Mistress.

From a Literal Translation of the Original

Come, let us climb Skorr urran's snowy top,
Cold as it seems, it is less cold than you
Thin through its snow these lambs its heath twigs crop,
Your snow, more hostile, starves and freezes too

What though I loved of late in Skie's fair isle, And blushed, and bowed, and shrunk from Kenza's eye? All she had power to hurt with was her smile, But 'tis a frown of your s for which I die.

Ask why these herds beneath us rush so fast
On the brown sea ware a stranded heaps to feed?
Winter, like you, withholds their wished repast,
And, robbed of genial grass, they browse on weed

Mark with what timeful haste Sheleila flows, To mix its widening stream in Donnan's lake, Yet should some dam the current's course oppose, It must perforce a less loved passage take

Lorn like your body for a spirit's claim,
Trembling I wait, insouled till you inspire
God has prepared the lamp, and bids it flame,
But you, fair Dorna, have withheld the fire.

High as you pine, when you begin to speak,
My lightening heart leaps hopeful at the sound,
But fainting at the sense, falls, void and weak,
And sinks and saddens like you mossy ground

All that I taste, or touch, or see, or hear,

Nature's whole breadth reminds me but of you,

Lv'n heaven itself would your sweet likeness wear,

If with its power you had its mercy too

To Mrs L-r, playing on a Bass Viol.

While o'er the dancing chords your fingers fly, And bid them live, till they have made us die, I rembling in transport at your touch they spring, As if there dwelt a heart in every string

Your voice soft rising through the lengthened notes, The married harmony united floats, I wo charms so join'd that they compose but one, Like heat and brightness from the self same sun.

The wishful viol would its wealth retain, And, sweetly conscious, hugs the pleasing pain, Linvious forbids the warbling joys to roll, And, murmuring inward, swells its sounding soul.

Proud of its charming power, your tuneful bow Floats o'er the chords majestically slow, Carelos and soft, calls out a tide of art, And in a storm of music drowns the heart.

So when that god, who gave you all your skill, Fo angel forms like yours intrusts his will, Calm they descend some new meant world to found, An I smiling see creation rising round!

A Song

Oh forbear to bid me slight her,
Soul and senses take her part,
Could my death itself delight her,
Life should leap to leave my heart
Strong though soft a lover's chain,
Charm'd with woe and pleas'd with pain.

Though the tender flame were dying,
Love would light it at her eyes,
Or, her tuneful voice applying,
Through my ear my soul surprise.
Deaf, I see the fate I shun,
Blind, I hear I am undone.

The Messenger

Go, happy paper, gently steal,
And soft beneath her pillow he
There in a dream my love reveal,
A love that awe must else conceal,
In silent doubt to die.

Should she to flames thy liope consign,
Thy suffering moment soon expires,
A longer pain, alas, is mine,
Condemined in endless woe to pine,
And feel unslackening fires.

But if inclined to hear and bless,
While in her heart soft pity stirs,
Tell her her beauties might compel
A hermit to forsake his cell,
And change his heaven for her's

Oh tell her were her treasures mine, Nature and art would court my aid; The painter's colonrs want her shine, The rainbow's brow not half so fine As her sweet eyelids shade!

By day the snn might spare his rays, No star make evening bright, Her opening eyes, with sweeter blaze, Should measure all my smiling days, And if she slept, 'twere night

Verses Written on Windows in Scotland.

Scotland, thy weather's like a modish wife,
Thy winds and rains forever are at strife
So termagant a while her thunder tries,
And, when she can no longer scold—she cries.

Tender handed stroke a nettle,
And it stings you for your pains,
Grasp it lile a man of mettle,
And it soft as silk remains.

'Tis the same with common natures— Use 'em kindly, they rebel But be rough as nutmeg graters, And the rogues obey you well

On Peter the Great

Perish the pride, in poor distinction shown, That makes man blind to blessings not his own Briton and Russian differ but in name In nature's sense all nations are the same. One world, divided, distant brothers share, And man is reason's subject every where.

Lewis Theobald (1688-1744) was one of the many contemporaries whom the sature of Pope invested with literary interest, but for their sorrows at Pope's hand some of their names would have long since passed into oblivion The bad poets outwitted him, as Swift predicted, and provoked him to transmit their names to posterity Theobald, the first hero of the Dunctad, procured the enmity of Pope by criticising his edition of Shakespeare, and editing a better edition himself (1733) versed in the Elizabethan writers, and in dramatic literature generally, he decidedly excelled Pope as a commentator. He is acknowledged to have made many most brilliant emendations of the folio text of Shakespeare-notably the famous 'and a babbled of green fields' in the Hostess's account of Falstaff's death in Hemy I' He also wrote some poetical and dramatic pieces, but they are feeble performances He was born at Sittingbourne, and bred an attorney

Thomas Yalden (1670-1736) was a poet commended by Johnson, whose verses fill over thirty closely printed, double columned pages in Anderson's British Poets His fither was a groom of the chamber to Prince Charles, and after the Restoration an exciseman at Oxford The son, admitted as a demy to Magdalen College, took orders, held cures in Warwickshire, Wiltshire, Devonshire, and Hampshire successively or together, and in 1713 was appointed chaplain to Bridewell Hospital He was imprisoned for a short time on suspicion of being concerned in Atterbury's schemes He wrote translations, imitations, paraphrases or pieces 'in allusion to' Homer, Hornce, Ovid, Isrinh, and others, 'Pindaric' odes on a variety of subjects, a collection of neatly turned fables with political reference, odes and hymns How the High Churchman of that day judged Milton may be seen from the verses, quoted below, which he wrote in his copy of Paradise Lost

These sacred lines with wonder we peruse, And praise the flights of a scraplic muse, Till thy seditious prose provokes our rage, And soils the beauties of thy brightest page. Thus here we see transporting scenes arise, Heaven's radiant host, and opening paradise, Then trembling view the dread abyss beneath, Hell's horned mansions, and the realms of death

Whilst here thy bold majestic numbers rise, And range th' embattled legions of the skies, With armies fill the azure plains of light, And paint the lively terrors of the fight, We own the poet worthy to rehearse Heaven's lasting triumphs in immortal verse Bnt when thy impious mercenary pen Insults the best of princes, best of men, Our admiration turns to just disdain, And we revoke the fond applicase again

Like the fall'n angels in their happy state, Thou shar'dst their nature, insolence and fate To harps divine, immortal lymns they sung, As sweet thy voice, as sweet thy lyre was strung As they did rebels to th' Almighty grow, So thou profan'st his image here below Apostate bard! may not the guilty ghost, Discover to its own eternal cost, That as they heaven, thou paradise hast lost!

His 'Hymn to Dirkness,' obviously written in rivalry of Cowley's 'Hymn to Light,' begins thus Darkness, thou first great parent of us all,

Thou are our great original

Since from thy universal womb

Does all thou shad'st below, thy numerous offspring come.

Thy wondrous birth is even to time unknown,
Or, like eternity, thou'dst none,
Whilst light did its first being owe Unto that awful shade it dares to rival now

Say, in what distant region dost thou dwell,
Fo reason inaccessible?
I rom form and duller matter free,
Thou soar'st above the reach of man's philosophy

Involved in thee, we first receive our breath,

Thou art our refuge too in death

Great monarch of the grave and womb,

Where'er our souls shall go, to thee our bodies come.

Johnson says the first seven verses are good, but the third, fourth, and seventh are the best of them, the tenth he pronounces 'exquisitely beautiful' a judgment more significant for Johnson than for Yalden! The seventh and tenth are

Though solid bodies do exclude the light,

Nor will the brightest ray admit

No substance can the force repel,

Thou reign'st in depths helow, dost in the centre dwell

Thou dost thy smiles impartially hestow,
And know'st no difference here below
All things appear the same by thee,
Though light distinction makes, thou giv'st equality

Johnson evidently valued the sense more than the manner, modern critics would find it difficult to see wherein the verses selected by Johnson for special commendation are less commonplace and antipoetic than the rest of the eighteen

Beinard de Mandeville (1670-1733), 3 vigorous and graphic writer, who squandered ex ceptional powers largely on paradoxical and antimoral speculations, was born at Dort in Holland, and, having studied at Leyden, came over to England, and settled in London as a medical practitioner His first publications were in rhyme. In 1705 he published a string of sarcastic verses entitled The Grumbling Hive, or Knaves Turned Honest, which he reprinted in 1714 with the addi tion of long explanatory notes, and an Inquis) into the Origin of Moral Virtue, giving to the whole the title afterwards so well known, The Fable of the Bees, or Private Vices Public Benefits To a later edition were added An Essay on Charity Schools and A Search into the Origin of Society Grumbling Hive is the only part where there is semblance of a fable, and from its first paragraph

Spain alone, it is true, might furnish us with wool to make the finest cloth, but what slill and prine, what experience and ingenuity, are required to dye it of those beautiful colours! How widely are the drugs and other ingredients dispersed through the universe that are to meet in one lettle! Alum, indeed we have of our own, argol we might have from the Khine, and vitriol from Hungary all this is in I prope. But then for salt petre in quantity we are forced to go as far as the I are Indies Cocheneal, unknown to the ancients, a not much nearer to us, though in a quite different part of the earth, we buy it 'tis true, from the Spaniards, but not being their product, they are forced to fetch it for us from the remotest corner of the new world in the West Indies. Whilst so many sailor are broiling in the sun and suchtered with heat in the east and we't of us, another set of them are freezing in the north to fetch potaslies from Ru ia

Virtues of the Great

This contradiction in the frame of man flytween professed principles and actual practice] is the reason that the theory of virtue is so well understood and the practice of it so rarely to be met with. If you ask me where to look for those beautiful shining qualities of prime ministers, and the great favourites of princes that are o finely painted in dedications, addresses, epitaplis, funeral sermons, and inscription, I answer, There and nowhere Where would you look for the excellency of a statue but in that part which you see of it? 'Tis the polished outside only that has the slift and labour of the sculptor to boast of, what is out of sight is untouched Would you break the head or cut open the heest to lool for the bruns or the heart you would call show your ignorance, and destroy the vorl mansulp. This has often made me compare the virtues of great men to your large china jars they make a fine show and are ornamental even to a clumney One would, by the bulk they appear in and the value that is set upon them, think they might be very useful, but look into a thousand of them, and you will find nothing in them but dust and cobuchs

Pomp and Superfluity

If the great ones of the clergy, as well as the latty, of any country whatever, had no value for earthly pleasures, and did not endeavour to gratify their appetites, why are envy and revenge so raging among them, and all the other passions improved and refined upon in courts of princes more than anywhere else, and why are their repasts, their recreations, and whole manner of living, always such as are approved of, coveted, and imitated by the most sensual people of the same country? If, despising all visible decorations, they were only in love with the embellishments of the mind, why should they borrow so many of the implements, and make use of the most darling toys, of the luxurious? Why should a lord trewurer, or a Inshop, or even the Grand Signior, or the Pope of Rome, to be good and virtuous and endersour the conquest of his passions, his coccess as for preater resenue, richer furniture, or 1 mo - numer our attendance as to per onal service than a private man? What arthe is it the exercise of which remove so much pump and superfluity as are to be teen by the men in power? In 1723 he obtained permission to return to Lingland family inlieratince was restored to litti, but he was excluded from the House of Lords - He commenced an active opposition to Walpole and wrote a number of political tracts against the Whig Ministry Disappointed in his hope of re entering political life, he retired again to I rance in 1735 and resided there seven years, writing now his most important contributions to literature—his Letters on the Study of History and a Lett r on the True Use of Retirement. In 1738, on a visit to England, he entrusted to Pope the MS of his Letters on the Spirit of Patriotism and his Idea of a Pairioi King Chesterfield said of the latter, Bolingbroke's most elaborate piece, that till he read it he did not know the extent and power of the English language. After the death of Pope. it was found that an impression of 1500 of the Patriot King had been printed, and this Bolingbroke affected to consider a hemous breach of trust. After he settled at Battersea in 1744, he prepared a 'correct' edition of the Patriot King The preface, believed to be by David Mallet, attacked Pope with coarse invective, and this began a bitter and acrimonious war of pamphlets. in which Warburton and others were involved Bolingbroke died in 1751, and Mallet-to whom he left all his manuscripts-published a complete edition of his works in five volumes. A series of essays on religion and philosophy, first published in this collection, showed the attitude to the Scriptures and the Christian faith which led to Dr Johnson's characteristic denunciation of Bolingbroke 'Sir, he was a scoundrel and a coward a scoundrel for charging a blunderbuss against religion and morality, a coward because he had not resolution to fire it off himself, but left half acrown to a beggarly Scotchman to draw the trigger after his death

'The Alcibiades of his time' (in Bagehot's phrise), he was idolised for the grice of his person, the charm of his manner, and the splendour of his talents. An admirable speaker and writer, he was not a great statesman. Even his enemies admitted the extraordinary power and charm of his oratory Chesterfield said his style was better than that of any other, and Chatham counselled his nephew to get Bolingbroke's works by heart. But he was the arch-intriguer of his time, profligate, selfish, and insincere Macaulay denounced him as a brilliant knave, Hallam was not less uncom plimentary, and the Tory Stanhope took the same In Walpole's eyes he was a perjured villain, and in Lady Mary Wortley Montagu's words, a vile His patriotism has of late found strenuous defenders A pronounced freethinker, he considered Christianity a fable, but held that a statesman ought to profess the doctrines of the Church of England Though he borrowed many thoughts from Shaftesbury, his philosophy is sensational on its psychological side, commonplace and far from profound It is largely reflected as an ethical theory of life in Pope's Essay on Man admittedly Pope was on this side the peer's pupil. The master hardly thought his pupil fully comprehended the system (if system it may be called) expounded, as Bolingbroke complacently says to Pope, 'when we saunter alone or, as we have often done, with good Arbuthnot and the jocose Dean of St Patrick's, among the multiplied scenes of your little garden.' Voltaire was much influenced by Bolingbroke, whose works, philosophical and politi cal, are models of polished, pointed, declaratory prose, often vivid, lively, and felicitous, but at times somewhat rambling and resembling rather spoken than written eloquence In one of his letters to Swift we find him thus moralising

The Decline of Life

We are both in the decline of life, my dear Dean, and have been some years going down the hill, let us make the passage as smooth as we can Let us fence against physical evil by care, and the use of those means which experience must have pointed out to us, let us fence against moral evil by philosophy We may, nay-if we will follow nature and do not work up imagination against her plainest dictates—we shall, of course, grow every year more indifferent to life, and to the affairs and interests of a system out of which we are soon to This is much better than stupidity. The decay of passion strengthens philosophy, for passion may decay. and stupidity not succeed Passions-says Pope, our divine, as you will see one time or other—are the gales of life, let us not complain that they do not blow a storm What hurt does age do us in subduing what we toil to subdue all our lives? It is now six in the morning, I recall the time—and am glad it is over—when about this hour I used to be going to bed sur feited with pleasure, or jaded with business, my head often full of schemes, and my heart as often full of anxiety. Is it a misfortune, think you, that I rise at this hour refreshed, serene, and calm, that the past and even the present affairs of life stand like objects at a distance from me, where I can keep off the disagree able, so as not to be strongly affected by them, and from whence I can draw the others nearer to me? Passions, in their force, would bring all these, nay even future contingencies, about my ears at once, and reason would but ill defend me in the scuffle

The Mind's Independence of Circumstances

Believe me, the providence of God has established such an order in the world, that of all which belongs to us, the least valuable parts can alone fall under the will of others. Whatever is best is safest, his most out of the reach of human power, can neither be given nor taken.

Such is this great and beautiful work of nature 24.25 -the world Such is the mind of man, which contem plates and admires the world, where it makes the noblest These are inseparably ours, and as long as we remain in one, we shall enjoy the other. Let its march, therefore, intrepidly, wherever we are led by the course of human accidents. Wherever they lead us, on what coast socrer we are thrown by them, we shall not find ourselves absolutely strangers We shall nicet with men and women, creatures of the same figure, endowed with the same faculties, and born under the same laws of nature We shall see the same virtues and vices flowing from the same general principles, but varied in a thou sand different and contrary modes, according to that nfinite variety of laws and customs which is established for the same universal end-the preservation of society We shall feel the same revolutions of seasons, and the sainc sun and moon will guide the course of our year The same azure vault, bespangled with stars, will be everywhere spread over our heads. There is no part of the world from whence we may not admire those planets, which roll, like ours, in different orbits round the same central sun, from whence we may not discover an object still more stupendous, that army of fixed stars hung up in the immense space of the universe, innumerable suns, I hose beams enlighten and cherish the unknown worlds which roll around them, and whilst I am ravished by such contemplations as these, whilst my soul is thus rused up to licaven, it imports me little what ground I tread upon (From Reflections upon Exile)

National Partiality and Prejudice

There is scarce any folly or vice more epidemical among the sons of men than that ridiculous and hurtful vanity by which the people of each country are apt to prefer themselves to those of every other, and to make their own customs, and manners, and opinions the standards of right and wrong, of true and false. The Chinese mandarins were strangely surprised and almost incredulous when the Jesuits showed them how small a figure their empire inade in the general map of the world

Now, nothing can contribute more to prevent us from being trinted with this vanity than to accustom ourselves early to contemplate the different nations of the earth in that vast map which history spreads before us, in their rise and their fall, in their barbarous and civi lised states, in the likeness and unlikeness of them all to one another, and of each to itself. By frequently renew ing this prospect to the mind, the Mexican with his cap and coat of feathers, sacrificing a human victim to his god, will not appear more savage to our eyes than the Spaniard with an hat on his head, and a gonilla round his neel, sacrificing whole nations to his ambition, his avarice, and even the wantonness of his cruelty I might slicw by a multitude of other examples how history pre pares us for experience, and guides us in it, and mnny of these would be both curious and important. I might lilewise bring several other instances wherein history serves to purge the mind of those national partialities and prejudices that we are apt to contract in our education, and that experience for the most part rather confirms than removes because it is for the most part confined, like our education But I apprehend growing too prolix, and shall therefore conclude this head by observing, that though an early and proper application to the study of history will contribute extremely to keep our minds free from a ridiculous partiality in favour of our own country, and a vicious prejudice against others, yet the same study will create in us a preference of affection to our own There is a story told of Abgarus. He brought several beasts taken in different places to Rome, they say, and let them loose before Augustus, every beast ran immediately to that part of the circus where a parcel of earth taken from his native soil had been laid Credat Judaus Apella This tale might pass on Josephus, for in him, I believe, I read it, but surely the love of our country is a lesson of reason, not an institution of nature. Education and habit, obligation and interest, attach us to It is, however, so necessary to be culti it, not instinct vated, and the prosperity of all societies, as well as the grandenr of some, depends upon it so much, that orators by their eloquence, and poets by their enthusiasm, have endeavoured to work up this precept of morality into a principle of passion. But the examples which we find in history, improved by the lively descriptions and the just applauses or censures of historians, will have a much better and more permanent effect than declamation, or song, or the dry ethics of mere philosophy

Complaints about the Shortness of Life Unreasonable

I think very differently from most men of the time we have to pass, and the business we have to do, in this world I think we have more of one, and less of the other, than is commonly supposed Our want of time, and the shortness of human life, are some of the principal common place complaints which we prefer against the established order of things, they are the grumblings of the sulgar, and the pathetic lamentations of the philos opher, but they are impertinent and impious in both The man of business despises the man of pleasure for squandering his time away, the mnn of pleasure pities or laughs at the man of business for the same thing, and yet both concur superciliously and absurdly to find fault with the Supreme Being for having given them so little The philosopher, who misspends it very often as much as the others, joins in the same cry, and authorises Theophrastus thought it extremely hard this impicty to die at minety, and to go out of the world when he had just learned how to live in it His master Aristotle found fault with nature for treating man in this respect worse than several other animals, both very unphilosophically! and I love Scneca the better for his quarrel with the Staginte on this head We see, in so many instances, a just proportion of things, according to their several rela tions to one another, that philosophy should lead us to conclude this proportion preserved, even where we do not discern it, instead of leading us to conclude that it is not preserved where we do not discern it, or where we think that we see the contrary To conclude otherwise It is to presume that the is shocking presumption system of the universe would have been more wisely contrived if creatures of our low rank immong intellec tual natures had been called to the councils of the Most High, or that the Creator ought to amend his work by the advice of the creature. That life which seems to our self love so short, when we compare it with the ideas we frame of eternity, or even with the duration of some other beings, will appear sufficient, upon a less partial view, to all the ends of our creation, and of a just propor tion in the successive course of generations. The term itself is long, we render it short, and the want we complain of flows from our profusion, not from our poverty

Let us leave the men of pleasure and of business, who are often candid enough to own that they throw away their time, and thereby to confess that they com plain of the Supreme Being for no other reason than this that he has not proportioned his bounty to their extravagance. Let us consider the scholar and the philosopher, who, far from owning that he throws any time away, reproves others for doing it, that solemn mortal who abstains from the pleasures, and declines the business of the world, that he may dedicate his whole time to the search of truth and the improvement of knowledge. When such an one complains of the short ness of human life in general, or of his remaining share in particular, might not a man more reasonable, though less solemn, expostulate thus with him 'lour com plaint is indeed consistent with your practice, but you would not possibly renew your complaint if you reviewed your practice. Though reading makes a scholar, yet every scholar is not a philosopher, nor every philosopher u wise man It costs you twenty years to devour all the volumes on one side of your library, you came out a great critic in Latin and Greek, in the oriental tongues. in history and chronology, but you was not satisfied You confessed that these were the litera milil sanantes, and you wanted more time to acquire other knowledge You have had this time, you have passed twenty years more on the other side of your liberty, among philos ophers, rabbis, commentators, schoolmen, and whole legions of modern doctors. You are extremely well versed in all that has been written concerning the nature of God, und of the soul of man, about matter and form, body and spirit, and space and eternal essences, and incorporeal substances, and the rest of those profound speculations You are a master of the controversies that have arisen about nature and grace, about predestination and freewill, and all the other abstruse questions that have made so much noise in the schools, and done so much hurt in the world. You are going on, as fast as the infirmitics you have contracted will permit, in the same course of study but you begin to foresee that you shall want time, and you male grievous complaints of the shortness of human life Give me leave now to asl you how many thousand years God must prolong your life in order to reconcile you to his wisdom and goodness? It is plain at least highly probable, that a life us long as that of the most aged of the patriarchs would be too short to auswer your purposes, since the researches and disputes in which you are engaged have been already for a much longer time the objects of learned inquiries, and remain still as imperfect and undetermined as they were ut first let me ask you again, and deceive neither yourself nor me, have you, in the course of these forty years, once examined the first principles and the fundamental facts on which all those questions depend, with an absolute indifference of judgment, and with a scrupulous exactness? with the same care that you have employed in examining the various consequences drawn from them, and the heterolox opinions about them. Have you not taken them for grunted in the whole course of your studies? Or, if you have looked now and then on the state of the proofs brought to maintain them, have you not done it as a mathematician looks over a demon stration formerly made—to refresh his memory, not to satisfy any doubt? If you have thus examined, it may appear marvellous to some that you have spent so much time in many parts of those studies, which have reduced you to this hectic condition of so much heat and weak news. But if you have not thus examined, it must be evident to all, nay to yourself on the least cool reflection, that you are still, not with standing all your learning, in a state of ignorance. For knowledge can alone produce knowledge, and without such un examination of axioms and facts, you can have none about inferences?

In this manner one might expostulate very reasonably with many a great scholar, many a profound philoso pher, many a dogmatical casuist. And it serves to set the complaints about want of time and the shortness of human life in a very ridiculous but a true light

Pleasures of a Patriot

Neither Moutaiene in writing his essays nor Descartes in building new worlds, nor Burnet in framing an antediluvian earth, no, nor Newton in discovering and establishing the true laws of nature on experiment and a sublimer geometry, felt more intellectual joys than he feels who is a real patriot, who bends all the force of his understanding, and directs all his thoughts and actions to the good of his country. When such a man forms a political scheme and adjusts various and seem ingly independent parts in it to one great and good design, he is transported by imagination, or absorbed in meditation, as much and as agreeably as they, and the satisfaction that arises from the different importance of these objects, in every step of the worl, is vastly in his It is here that the speculative philosopher's labour and pleasure end. But he who speculates in order to act, goes on and carries his scheme into execu His labour continues, it varies, it increases, but so does his pleasure too. The execution, indeed, is often traversed, by unforeseen and untoward errcumstances, by the perverseness or treachers of friends, and by the power or maliee of enemies, but the first and the last of these animate, and the docility and fidelity of some men make amends for the perverseness und treachers of Whilst a great event is in suspense, the netion warms and the very suspense, made up of hope and fear, maintains no unpleasing agitation in the mind the event is decided successfully, such a man enjoys pleasure proportionable to the good he has done-a pleasure like to that which is attributed to the Supreme Being on a survey of Ins works If the event is decided otherwise, and usurping courts or overhearing parties prevail, such a man has still the testimony of his con science, and a sense of the honour he has aequired, to soothe his mind and support his courage. For although the course of state affuirs be to those who meddle in them like a lottery, yet it is a lottery wherein no good man can be a loser he may be reviled, it is true, instead of being upplauded, and may suffer violence of many kinds I will not say, like Seneca, that the noblest spec tacle which God can behold is a virtuous man suffering and struggling with ufflictions, but this I will say, that the second Cato, driven out of the forum and dragged to prison, enjoyed more inward pleasure and maintained more outward dignity than they who insulted him, und who triumphed in the ruin of their country

Wise, not Cunning Ministers.

We may observe much the same difference between wisdom and cunning, both as to the objects they propose and to the means they employ, as we observe between the visual powers of different men. One sees distinctly the objects that are near to him, their immediate rela tions, and their direct tendencies and a sight like this serves well enough the purpose of those who concern themselves no further The cunning minister is one of he neither sees nor is concerned to see any further than his personal interests and the support of his administration require. If such a man overcomes any actual difficulty, avoids any immediate distress, or, without doing either of these effectually, gains a little time by all the low artifice which cunning is ready to suggest and baseness of mind to employ, he triumphs, and is flattered by his mercenary train on the great event, which amounts often to no more than this, that he go into distress by one series of faults, and out of it The wise minister sees and is concerned to see further, because government has a further con cern he sees the objects that are distant as well as those that are near, and all their remote relations, and even their indirect tendencies. He thinks of fame as well as of applause, and prefers that which to be enjoyed must be given, to that which may be bought He considers his administration as a single day in the great year of government, but as a day that is affected by those which went before, and that must affect those which are to follow He combines, therefore, and compares all these objects, relations, and tendencies, and the judgment he makes on an entire, not a partial survey of them, is the rule of his conduct. That seheme of the reason of state, which lies open before a wise minister, contains all the great principles of government, and all the great interests of his country so that, as he prepares some events, he prepares against others, whether they be likely to happen during his administration, or in some future time. Harrop (1884), Churton Collins (1826) and Hassall (1887) and the defence of his character for patriotism by W. Sichel (vol. 1. 1901). Ch. de-Remusat's character sketch (in L. Angleterie an A. VIIII me Sizele) is eminently judicial and there are German works on him by Von Noorden (1882) and Brosch (1883).

Isaac Watts (1674-1748) was born at South ampton, where his father kept a boarding-school and was in a small way a poet. The child of pious parents, he was trained for the ministry at an Independent academy in London, and he was for six years tutor in the family of Sir John Hartopp it Stole-Newington Here he was chosen (1699) assistant minister by the Independent congregation in Mark Lane, where three years after he succeeded to the full charge, but infirm health soon rendered him unequal to the performance of the full minis His health continuing to decline, ternal labours he went for change of air in 1712 into the house of Sir Thomas Abnev (Lord Vavor in 1700) at Theo balds, and as an inmate of that kindly household he spent the remainder of his life-thirty-six years While in this pleasant retreat he preached occasionally, and, in spite of his small stature and feeble health, he was accounted an admirable and effective preacher But he gave the most of his time to literary labour He produced a series of catechisms and educational manuals, as well as theological works and volumes of sermons treatises on Logic and on the Improvement of the Mind were long in constant use as handbooks. His poetry consists mainly but not wholly of devotional hymns, which by their simplicity and unaffected ardour secured the interest of many generations, and were never forgotten in mature life by those who committed them to memory as The Horæ Lyricæ (1705) and Hymns children and Spiritual Songs (1707) were followed by Divine and Moral Songs for Children (1715), Psalms of David Imitated (1719), and Reliquia Juveniles (1734, in prose and verse)

Watts's theology was marked by a charity and catholicity then unusual amongst the orthodox, and even exposed him to the charge of heresy at the hands of the stricter brethren A Calvinist, he yet shrank from the high doctrine of reprobation. He held the doctrine of the Trinity not essential to salvation, and was willing to admit Arians to communion, and it was even affirmed—on insufficient evidence—that in the end he had become a Unitarian His hymns provided a vehicle for the religious emotions of the English world till then (from theological prejudice or otherwise) unknown Among his five hundred hymns and versions there is many a metrical defect, and not a few verses of mere rhymed theology, yet a select number remain amongst the most cherished treasures of English devotion It is enough to name 'There is a land of pure delight,' 'Jesus shall reign where'er the sun,' 'When I survey the wondrous cross,' and 'Our God, our help in ages past.' The second of these is the first great missionary hymn, the third has been pronounced 'the most majestic hymn in English speech' Those who think of Watts as the author mainly of 'How doth the little busy bee,' 'Let dogs delight,' and a few similar edifying verses in the common measure rhyme do him a great injustice. Even in the Divine and Moral Songs for Children there is frequently something of the sweet simplicity of Blake, it the fervour is usually ethical rather than lyrical, Watts's blank verse comes very near Cowper's in feeling and rhythm, and there is at times a line or a touch that suggests even Wordsworth rhytlims of the irregular ode, of the Sapphic, of the heroic measure, are handled with no incon The poems quoted below are all siderable skill from the Hora Lyrica

Forbear, young muse, forbear,
The flowery things that poets say,
The little arts of simile
Are vain and useless here,
Nor shall the burning hills of old
With Sinai be compared,
Nor all that lying Greece has told,
Or learned Rome has heard,

Etna shall be named no more,

Ætna the torch of Sicily,

Not half so high

Her lightnings fly,

Not half so loud her thunders roar

Cross the Sicanian sea, to fright the Italian shore.

Behold the sacred hill Its trembling spire

Qual es at the terrors of the fire,

While all below its verdant feet

Stagger and reel under the Almighty weight

Pressed with a greater than feigned Atlas' load.

Infinity before,
It bowed, and shook beneath the burden of a God

Deep groaned the mount, it never bore

When the fierce north wind with his airy forces Rears up the Baltic to a foaming fury, And the red lightning with a storm of hail comes Rushing amain down,

How the poor sailors stand amazed and tremble <sup>1</sup> While the hoarse thunder, like a bloody trumpet, Roars a loud onset to the gaping waters,

Quick to devour them.

Such shall the noise be, and the wild disorder, (If things eternal may be like these earthly,) Such the dire terror v hen the great Archangel Shakes the creation,

Tears the strong pillars of the vault of heaven, Breaks up old marble, the repose of princes See the graves open, and the bones arising, Flames all around them

From To Sarissa'-An Epistle

Farewell, ye waxing and ye waning moons, That we have watched behind the flying clouds On night's dark hill, or setting or ascending Or in meridian height. Then silence reigned O'er half the world, then ye beheld our tears, Ye witnessed our complaints, our Lindred groans, (Sad harmony!) while with your beamy liorns Or richer orb ye silvered o'er the green Where trod our feet, and lent a feeble light To mourners. Now ye have fulfilled your round, Those hours are fled, farewell. Months that are gone Are gone for ever, and have borne away Each his own load Our woes and sorrows past, Mountainous voes, still lessen as they fly So billows in a stormy sea, Wave after wave (a long succession) roll Beyond the ken of sight The sailors safe Look far a stern till they have lost the storm, And shont their boisterous joys.

We are a little kingdom, but the man That chains his rebel will to reason's throne, Forms it a large one, while his royal mind Makes heaven its conneil, from the rolls above Draws its own statutes, and with joy obeys 'Tis not a troop of well appointed guards Create a monarch, not a purple robe Dyed in the people's blood, not all the crowns

Or dazzling tiars that bend about the head,
Though gilt with sun beams and set round with stars,
A monarch he that conquers all his fears,
And treads upon them, when he stands alone,
Makes his own camp, four guardian virtues wait
His nightly slumbers, and secure his dreams
Now dawns the light, he ranges all his thoughts
In square battalions, bold to meet the attacks
Of time and chance, himself a numerous host,
All eye, all ear, all wakeful as the day,
Firm as a rock, and moveless as the centre.

DR ISAAC WATTS

(From the Portrait by Sir G Kneller in the National Portrait Gallery)

In all its charming, or its frightful shapes. He that unshrinking, and without a groan Bears the first wound, may finish all the war With mere courageous silence, and come off Conqueror for the man that well conceals The heavy strokes of fate, he bears them well He, though the Atlantic and the Midland seas With adverse surges meet, and rise on high Suspended 'twixt the winds, then rush amun Mingled with flames, upon his single head, And clouds, and stars, and thunder, firm he stands, Secure of his best life, unhurt, nnmoved, And drops his lower nature, born for death Then from the lofty eastle of his mind Sublime looks down exulting, and surveys The ruins of creation (souls alone Are heirs of dying worlds), a piercing glance Shoots upwards from between his closing lids, To reach his birth place, and without a sigh resisting nature, and melt the hardest souls to the love of virtue. The affairs of this life, with their reference to a life to come, would shine bright in a dramatic de scription, nor is there any need of any reason why we should always borrow the plan or history from the ancient Jews or primitive martyrs, though several of these would furnish out noble materials for this sort of poesy but modern scenes would be better understood by most readers, and the application would be much more easy The anguish of inward guilt, the secret stings and racks and scourges of conscience, the sweet retiring hours and seraphical joys of devotion, the victory of a resolved soul over a thousand temptations, the inimitable love and passion of a dying God, the awful glories of the last tribunal, the grand decisive sentence, from which there is no appeal, and the consequent transports or horrors of the two eternal worlds these things may be variously disposed, and form many poems. How might such performances, under a divine blessing, call back the dying mety of the nation to life and beauty? make religion appear like itself, and confound the blasphemies of a profligate world, ignorant of pious pleasures

But we have reason to fear that the tuncful men of our day have not raised their ambition to so divine a pitch, I should rejoice to see more of this celestial fire I indling within them, for the flashes that breal out in some present and past writings betray an infernal source This the incomparable Mr Cowley, in the latter end of his preface, and the ingenious Sir Richard Blackmore, in the beginning of his, have so pathetically described and lamented, that I rather refer the reader to mourn with them, than detain and tire him here. These gentle men in their large and laboured works of poesy have given the world happy examples of what they wish and encourage in prose, the one in a rich variety of thought and fancy, the other in all the shining colours of profuse and florid diction.

If shorter sonnets vere composed on sublime subjects, such as the Psalms of David and the holy transports interspersed in the other sacred virtings, or such as the moral odes of Horace and the ancient lyricks, I per suade myself that the Christian preacher vould find abundant aid from the poet in his design to diffuse virtue and allure souls to God If the heart were first inflamed from Heaven, and the muse were not left alone to form the devotion and pursue a cold scent, but only called in as an assistant to the worship, then the song would end where the inspiration ceases, the whole composure would be of a piece, all meridian light and mendian ferrour, and the same pious flame would be propagated and kept glowing in the heart of him that Some of the shorter odes of the two poets now mentioned, and a few of the Rev Mr Norris's Essays in verse, are convincing instances of the success of this proposal

It is my opinion, also, that the free and unconfined numbers of Pindar or the noble measures of Milton without rhyme would best maintain the dignity of the theme as well as give a loose to the devout soul, nor check the raptures of her faith and love. Though in my feeble attempts of this kind I have too often fettered my thoughts in the narrow metre of our Psalm translators, I have contracted and cramped the sense, or rendered it obscure and feeble, by the too speedy and regular returns of rhyme

The 'large and laboured works of poesy above described are Cowley's Davidets (see Vol. I p. 643) and Blackmore's two poems on Arthur (see Vol. II p. 107). For Mr Norris, see below at page 259. There are Lives of Watts by Dr Gibbons Dr Johnson, Southey, Milner, and E. Paxton Hood (1875). Since 1753 there have been more than half a-dozen collective editions of his works that of 1824 was in 6 vols. 410

Charles Leslie (1650-1722), author in 1698 of the famous Short and Lasy Method with the Deists, was born in Dublin, the sixth son of John Leslie (1571-1671), the centenarian Bishop of Raphoe and Clogher, who was of Aberdeenshire Educated at Enniskillen and Trinity College, Dublin, Charles Leslie studied law in London, but in 1680 took orders. As chancellor of the cathedral of Connor, he distinguished himself by several disputations with Catholic divines, and by the boldness with which he opposed the pro-papal designs of King James Nevertheless at the Revolution he adopted a decisive tone of Jacobitism, from which he never swerved through Removing to London, he was chiefly en gaged for several years in writing controversial works against Quakers, Sociaians, and deists, of which, however, none are now remembered except the little treatise above named, and his Gallienus Redivirus (1695), a chief authority for the Massacre of Glencoe. He also wrote many occasional tracts in behalf of the House of Stuart In 1711 he repaired to St Germains, and in 1713 to Bar-le Duc. The Chevalier allowed him to have a chapel fitted up for the English service, and was even expected to lend a favourable ear to his arguments against popery, but in 1721 Leslie returned to Ireland in disgust, and soon after died at his house of Glaslough in County Monaghan His works (7 vols 1832) place their author high amongst controversial writers

John Potter (c. 1674-1747) contributed little to English literature, but as a very eminent English classical scholar deserves a brief record Wakefield, and educated at University College, Oxford, he became professor of divinity at Oxford in 1708, Bishop of Oxford in 1715, and in 1737 Archbishop of Canterbury He published, besides notes on Plutarch and St Basil, the Archwologia Graca, or Antiquities of Greece (1698), which was practically the standard work till after the middle of the nineteenth century, also editions of Lyco phron (1697) and Clemens Alexandrinus (1715), and in English, a Discourse on Church Government, and other theological treatises, several of them against Hoadly, who complimented Potter as being his most formidable antagonist

James Bramston (c. 1694-1744) wrote two satirical poems, much admired in their day and included in Dodsley's Collection The Art of Polities, described as 'in imitation of Horace's Art of Poetry' (1729), and The Man of Taste (1733), 'occasioned by Pope's Epistle on that Subject.' He also produced an imitation of Philips's Splendid Shilling, called The Crooked Sixpince In 1708

Bramston was admitted at Westminster School, in 1713 he was elected to a studentship at Christ Church, Oxford, and in 1723–25 he became vicar of Lurgashall and Harting in Sussex. His two principal poems are good essays in the style of Pope's and Young's satires. The following is the conclusion of his Art of Politics.

Parliamenteering is a sort of itch, That will too oft unwary knights bewitch Two good estates Sir Harry Clodpole spent, Sate thrice, but spoke not once, in Parliament Two good estates are gone—who 'll take his word? Oh, should his uncle die, he'll spend a third, He'd buy a house his happiness to crown, Within a mile of some good borough town, Tag rag and bobtail to Sir Harry's run, Men that have votes, and women that have none, Sons, daughters, grandsons with his Honour dine, He keeps a publick house without a sign Cobblers and smiths extol th' ensuing choice, And drunken tailors boast their right of voice Dearly the free born neighbourhood is bought, They never leave him while he's worth a great, So leeches stick, nor quit the bleeding wound, Till off they drop with skinfuls to the ground

His Man of Taste is ironically made thus to expaniate on his likes and dislikes

Swift's whims and jokes for my resentment call,
For he displeases me that pleases all
Verse without rhyme I never could endure, Uncouth in numbers, and in sense obscure
To him as nature when he ceased to see,
Milton's an universal blank to me
Confirmed and settled by the nation's voice,
Rhyme is the poet's pride and people's choice,
Always upheld by national support,
Of market, university, and court
Thomson, write blank, but know that for that reason,
These lines shall live when thine are out of season
Rhyme binds and beautifies the poet's lays,
As London ladies owe their shape to stays

In the same poem he parodies

Musick has charms to soothe a savage beast, And therefore proper at a sheriff's feast.

And many of the couplets are sprightly

To give is wrong, but it is wronger still, On any terms to pay a tradesman's bill

I'll please the maids of honour if I can, Without black velvet britches, what is man?

Oxford and Cambridge are not worth one farthing, Compared to Haymarket and Convent garden

This is true taste, and whose likes it not Is blockhead, coxcomb, puppy, fool, and sot.

standard work thenceforward till it was superseded by Rapin's The 'historic method' has long since braished some of the elements which in Echard's dry were available for enlivening the records of the past. After the battle of Worcester 'Cromwell in his letter to the Parliament tells them,' says Echard, 'that the dimensions of this Mercy were above his thoughts, and that it was a Crowning Mercy'. There was, however, another side to the story, Echard thought, and adds accordingly this tale of

Cromwell and the Devil

But others accounted it an infernal judgment, con cerning which we have a strange story in the last part of the History of Independency, which the author says he received from a person of quality, viz. 'It was believ'd, and that not without some good cause, that Cromwell the same morning that he defeated the king's army at Worcester, had conference personally with the devil, with whom he made a contract, that to have his will then, and in all things else for seven years from that day, he should, at the expiration of the said years, have him at his command, to do at his pleasure, both with his soul and body. This is also related in other printed books, but we have received a more full account never yet publish'd, which is here inserted as a thing more wonderful than probable, and therefore more for the diversion than satisfaction of the reader. It is a rela tion or narrative of a valuant officer call'd Lindsev, an intimate friend of Cromwell's, the first captain of his regiment, and therefore commonly called Colonel Lindser, which is to this effect 'On the third of September in the morning, Cromwell took this officer to a wood side not far from the arms, and bid him alight, and follow him into that wood, and to take particular notice of what he saw and heard After they had both alighted, and secur'd their horses, and walk'd some small way into the wood, Lindsey began to turn pale, and to be seiz'd with horror from some unknown cause which Cromwell ask'd him how he did, or how he felt himself He answer'd, that he was in such a trembling and consternation, that he never felt the like in all the conflicts and battels he had been engaged in, but whether it proceeded from the gloominess of the place, or the temperament of his body, he knew not now, stud Cromwell, what, troubled with vapours? come forwards, man! They had not gone above twenty yards, before Lindsey on a sudden stood still, and cry'd out, by all that's good, he was seiz'd with such un accountable terror and astonishment, that it was im possible for him to stir one step farther Cromwell call'd him faint hearted fool, and bid him stand there and observe, or be witness, and then advancing to some distance from him, he met with a grave elderly man with a roll of parchment in his hand, who deliver'd it to Cromwell, who engerly perus'd it. Lindsey, a little recover'd from his fear, heard several loud words be tween them particularly Cromwell said, this is but for seven years, I was to have had it for one and twenty, and it must and shall be so. The other told him post tively, it could not be for above seven, upon which Cromwell cry'd with great fierceness it should however But the other peremptorile be for sourteen years declar'd it could not possibly be for any longer time; and if he would not take it so, there were others who would accept of it. Upon which Cromy ell at last took the pareliment, and returning to Lindsey with great journ his countenance, he cry d, now, I indsey, the battel is our own! I long to be engaged. Returning out of the wood, they role to the army, Cromwell with a resolution to engage as soon as possible, and the other with a design of leaving the army as soon. After the first charge Lindsey deserted his post, and role away with all possible speed, day and night, till he came into the county of Norfoll, to the house of an Intimate friend, one Mr Thoro good, minister of the parish of crome ell as soon as he mis'd him, sent all ways after him, with a promise of a great reward to any that should bring him alive or dead.' Thus far the narrative of I indeed himself, but something further is to be remember d, to complete and confirm the story

When Mr Thorov good say his friend Lindsey come into he wird, his horse and himself just tired, in a sort of a mare, said, How now, Colonel we hear there is hl a to be a battel shortly, a but, fled from your colours? A battel<sup>1</sup> said the other, yes there has been a battel, and I am sure the king is beaten, but if ever I strike a stroak for Cromwell again, may I perish eternally. For I am sure he has made a league with the devil, and the devil will have lum in due time. Then desiring his protection from Cromvell's inquisitors, he went in and related to him the v hole story, and all the circumstances, concluding with these remarkable words, that Cromwell would certainly dye that day seven years that the lattel was fought. The strangeness of the relation caus'd Mr. Thorowgood to order his son John, then about twelve years of age, to write it in full length in his common place book, and to take it from I indsex's own mouth This common place book, and lil ewise the same stors written in other books, I am assured is still preserved in the family of the Thorougoods But how far I indser is to be believed, and how far the story is to be accounted meredible, is left to the reader's fulli and judgment, and no to any determination of our own

Simon Ockley (1678-1720), orientalist and historian, was born at Exeter of good Norfolk stock, studied at Queen's College, Cambridge, and as vicar of the small living of Swavesev in the counts of Cambridge carned repute as the most eminent Arabist in England-insomuch that in 1711 he was made professor of Arabic at Cam bridge. No doubt Ockley's authorities absurdly exaggerated the extent of the destruction in the account they give and lie repeats of

The inhabitants of Mexanders were then polled, and upon this the whole of Igypt followed the for tine and example of its nictropolis, and the inhabitants coin pounded for their live, fortunes, and free exercise of their religion, at the price of two ducats a head yearly This head money was to be paid by all without distinct tion, except in the case of a man holding land, farm, or vineyards, for in such cases he paid proportionally to the yearly value of what he held. This tax brought in a most prodigious revenue to the calipli-Mer the Saracens were once arrived to this pitch, it is no wonder if they went further, for what would not such a revenue do in such hands? For they knew very well how to husband their money, being at that time sumption in nothing but their places of public worship. Their diet was plain and simple. Upon their tables appeared neither wine nor any of those dainties, the products of modern luxury, which pall the stomach and enfectle the constitution. Their chief drink was water, their food principally milk, rice, or the fruits of the earth

The Arabians had as yet applied themselves to no manner of learning nor the study of anything but il cir vernicular poetry, which Jons before Mohammed stine, they understood very well after their was and prodol themselves upon. # Joseph Addison was born on 1st May 1672 at Milston, Amesbury (Wilts), where his father, the Rev Lancelot Addison (1632-1703), afterwards Dean of Lichfield was rector. His mother was Jane, daughter of Dr Nathaniel Gulston and sister of William Gulston, Bishop of Bristol He passed from Amesbury School to Salisbury School, thereafter, in 1683, to the Grammar School of Lichfield, whither the family land removed on his father's appointment to the Deanery, and, later, to Charterhouse, where his future friend, Richard Steele, was a pupil In 1687 he was admitted a commoner of Queen's College Oxford, but in 1689 his success with some Latin verses (Inauguratio Regis Gululmi) procured his elec tion to a demyship at Magdalen College took his Master's degree in 1693, and five years later obtained a Fellowship at his college

In his undergraduate efforts Addison confined himself to Latin in verse, in the Inauguratio, already referred to, and the Gratulatio fro exoptato serumssimi Regis Gulielmi in Hibernia reditu (1690), and in prose, in a short dissertation, De Insignioribus Romanorum Poetis (1692), which was frequently reprinted together with a continuation translated by one of Curll's hacks from the English of an ingunious Major Pack. These pieces, and his contributions of occasional verse to the two volumes of Music Anglicana (1691, 1699), are interesting solely as formative evidence of Addison's political bias and literary method. We cannot share the enthusiasm of his contemporaries for the Pas Gulielmi (1697), which the judicial

'Rig' Smith held to be 'the best poem since the Aneid,' but we can admit its elegance, as we may concede the humour of the Machina Gesticulantes (a propos of Powell's funous puppet show) or the devotional spirit of the Resurrectio. In this Latin miscellary we have a forecast as complete as juvenile wit will allow, of the later faculty and graces of Mr Spectitor.

Mox fundamenta futurae Sub trasit pietor tabulae

-Kesurrectic 11 9-10.

Addison's first English poem was a short picce To Mr Disden (2nd June 1693), which secured the fivour of the poet and through him, or Congrese, or both, an introduction to the Whig leaders Somers and Montigu and to the bookseller Licob Lonson Dryden thought so highl of Addison's translation of the Lourth Georgic that he referred to it in his critical Postscript to the Reader ("after his Bees, my latter swarm is scarcely worth the hiving's and he honoured his young friend by printing his Listar on the Georgies (1603) as an introduction to his own translation of Virgil Addison continued to reside at Oxford and appears to have been preparing to take holy orders but he was dissuaded from the intention by his political friends, who had dicovered in him a useful literary ally in the con He commended himself further flict of parties to Somers and Montagu by his praise of the latter in a verse Account of the Greatest English Poets (1094), and by his dedication to the former of A Poem to His Majesty (1695), and by their united influence he obtained, in 1699 a pension of three hundred pounds a year for purposes of trivel and general preparation in public affore

His Grand Tour-which included France, Itali, Austria Germany and Holland, and extended over four years—was not the conventional escapade of the 'gentlemen that were just come wild out of their country' (Letter to Stanyan, Blois, February 1700) In Dr Johnson's phrase, the proceeded in his journey to Italy, which he surveyed with the eves of a poet? And the good Abbe Philippeaux at Blois admitted, with implied astonishment, that during his year at Blois his friend had had no amour, and added, 'I think I should have known it if he had had any ' Incidental references in his letters show that he was making some historical inquiries about treaties and other matters, but his stronger likings lay in scholarly associations with the places which he visited, or in the esthetic problems which their variety suggested From Genera he addressed his Letter from Italy (February 1702) to Montagu, now Lord Halifax-a prelude, in his happiest verse to the more elaborate prose Re marks on Several Parts of Italy, which he pre pared in 1705 from notes made during his tour In these, as well as in the Dialogues or Medals, which he wrote during his visit to Vienna (1702), he shows his predisposition to that amrable reflection which characterises the more perfect work of the Spectator The Letter from Italy, in which his technique is perbaps at its best, was much admired by Pope, and frequently quoted and imitated by him The undated Discourse on Arcient and Modern Learning, which has been reasonably ascribed to him, may have been written about this time.

The death of William III and his patrons' loss of office deprived Addison of his travelling pension Shortly after his return (September 1703)

he was elected a member of the Kit-Cat Club, by means of which he extended his acquaintance with the leading Whigs Halıfax still stood by him, and had an opportunity of recommending him to Godolpbin and of securing a Commissionership of Appeals for him, as a reward for a panegyric on the victory of Blenheim (August 1704) In this poem, The Campaign, which describes the progress of Marlborough's plan, his marches and sieges, we are reminded of the literary manner of the Letter from Italy Addison reframed wisely from the 'flute and trumpet' style of his Ode for St

-Cecilia's Day (1699), and although he laid himself open to the gibe that he had produced a 'gazette in rhyme,' he won by the very calmness and plainness of his verse the political and personal success which was desired From the publication of the Campaign till the fall of the Whigs in 1710 Addison was absorbed in politics, in the duties of an Under Secretary of State (1706), of Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1709), of Keeper of Records, of a member of Parliament, or of a party-writer in such ventures as the short tract on The Present State of the War (1707) or The Whig Examiner (Nos I-V, 14th September to 12th October 1710) His only literary work was the unfortunate attempt to write an English opera on the subject of Rosamond (March 1707), and some friendly collaboration with Steele in his Tender Husband He had already, from May 1709, contributed some papers to his friend's Tatler, but it was not till the following year that his political leisure gave him the opportunity of writing the essays upon which his reputation now chiefly rests. On the death of Queen Anne public affairs again engrossed his attention

All the work of this short period (1710-1714) is, with the exception of the tragedy Cato, in prose, and in the form of short essays, and Cato is hardly an exception, for though finished and produced at Drury Lane in 1713, it had been planned and almost entirely written during his Continental tour He contrabuted over sixty papers to the Tatler between 26th May 1709 and 2nd January 1711, when Steele brought the successful sheet to a sudden close, not because he, or his friend, had become to the public, as to Swift, 'cruel, dull, and dry,' but probably because Steele felt his Whiggism somewhat ungracious to Harley, who had generously allowed him to remain in his post

JOSEPH ADDISON

at the Stamp Office Swift really sneered at its politics, for there was no falling off in the paper, especially in the character-sketches of the Political Upholsterer Tom Folio, 'the broker in learning,' or Ned Softly, 'the very pretty poet,' which Addison contributed Steele readily acknowledged Addison's assistance. 'I fared like a distressed Prince who calls in a powerful Neighbour to his aid, I was undone by my Auxiliary, when I had once called him in, I could not subsist without Dependance on him' It is probable that the stoppage of the Tatler was hastened because the two friends had already made their plans for the daily sheet of The Spectator, which they issued within two months (1st March 1711) The new enterprise must be considered, as its promoters intended it to be, a continuation of the Tatler

Many of its apparently original characteristics, such as The Club, with its types of quidnuncs, on the topics of social satire, had been elaborated in the Fatler-2 continuity of literary purpose which will be best appreciated by the reader who makes the most careful study of the allusions and personalia of the two publications The success of these social and critical studies doubtless prompted the editor and his 'auxiliary' to avoid politics, but they made no serious promise to confine their 'Censorship of Great Britain' to the doings of the coffee house, the tea table, and the theatre, and, indeed, towards the end of the journal, they occasionally deviated into ingenious speculations which must have pleased their Whig subscribers The Spectator was continued till 6th December 1712, and ran to five hundred and fifty five numbers, of which Addison and Steele wrote over five hundred, in about equal proportions A supplementary set (Nos 556-635) appeared between 18th June and 20th December 1714. In this the majority of the contributions is by Addison, who edited them when they were reissued as the eighth volume of the Octavo, or First Collected, Edition of the Spectator

Between 28th May and 22nd September 1713 Addison wrote over fifty papers for The Guardian, which Steele had started within three months of his sudden stoppage of the Spectator proper Addison fully maintained the intention of Mr Nestor Ironside to 'have nothing to manage with any person or party,' and, even after his editor had 'blazed into faction' in the famous Dunkirk letter (No 128), continued his Oriental allegories and his discourses on Female Dress, Pride, and the Wisdom of the Ant And when Steele, after his disastrous adventure with The Englishman-a rabid political sequel to the Guardian, which he, more suo, had suddenly suppressed-returned to the manner of Mr Spectator in the short-lived Lover, Addison obliged him with two papers, Nos. 10 and 39 (March, May 1714) He also contributed about this time two papers to The Reader (Nos 3 and 4), another of Steele's literary sheets last year of his literary period (1713) was occupied in preparing a first portion of a treatise Of the Christian Religion, which remains unfinished, and in the less congenial task of combiting the libels of Pope, who, prompted by jealousy, had made a series of unscrupulous attacks. Into the circumstances of this famous quarrel, which involved Dennis, Ambrose Philips, and Tickell, if not all the habitués of Button's, it is unnecessary to enter here (see the articles on Pope and Tickell in this volume, and Mr Courthope's Addison in 'English Men of Letters,' Chap vii )

On the death of Queen Anne, Addison was appointed Secretary to the Lords-Justices who managed public affairs till the coming of George I After the king's arrival, he was nominated for the second time as Chief Secretary for Ireland He found his duties light, and composed and produced his comedy of The Drummer, which had but in in Whig politics caused by the Rising of the Fifteen forced Addison to undertake a special party defence in The Irrecholder, for which lie was rewarded (December 1716) with a Commissionership of Tride and Plantations Yet even in the fifty five papers of this partisan journal (23rd December 171) to 29th June 1716) he pled the Whig cause with his wonted good-humour, and found opportunities to discuss the vagaries of the Female Sex, French Anglophobia, the Treatment of Authors, or his old topic of Wit and Humour His methods of political persuasion, as illustrated in the case of the Tory Toshunter (No 47), were perhaps more successful than those of the most ardent members of his party, such as Steele, who preferred to drub the Jacobites into allegiance.

The Freeholder was Addison's last literary undertaking, if we except two minor political ess is -the ascribed Arguments about the Altera tion of Trunnial Liections of Parliament (con tributed to Boyer's Political State, April 1716) and two numbers of the Old Whig (19th March and and April 1719) in reply to Steele's attack in The Pleberan on Sunderland's Peerage Bill 3rd August 1716 he married Sarah, Countess of Warwick, by whom he had one daughter Pope's spiteful reference to his 'marry ing discord' (Epistle to Di Arbuthuot, 393) has been too readily accepted by posterity, without proof, and in the He was ap face of indirect contrary evidence pointed a Secretary of State on 16th April 1717, but was compelled to resign, on 14th March of the next year, on account of broken health political quarrel with Steele's Plebrian lie shows a diminished vigour, to which his impetuous friend, in ignorance of his physical condition, referred in no kindly manner, in his fourth paper (6th April 1719) 'The Pleberan has been obliged to object to the Old Whig one of the infirmities of age, viz slowness, and he must now take notice of another, though lie does it with great reluctance, that is, want of memory, for the old gentleman seems to have forgot, &c Addison was already threatened with dropsy, as a sequel to an incurable asthma, and, two months later (17th June 1719), succumbed to the disease at Holland House, Kensington

Addison's literary reputation, unlike that of other English classics, rests less upon the ment of individual pieces or of his work taken as a whole than upon its historical importance as an influence on letters and manners. There is nothing more fatal to his deservedly high position than to judge him by a few, even the best, of his verses and essays, and any selection of typical passages, such as are here printed, though it may show certain salient qualities of style, must full to justify the opinion of later criticism. The same is true of the cumulative effect obtained by the perusal of his entire work. Consideration merely of such things as his industry or the agreeable uniformity of his craftsnianship will not cyplain his positive value in the history of English literature.

Addison's importance is in a sense extra-literary, for, though he takes up a definite attitude to the esthetic principles of his time, he is interested not so much in their discussion as academic theory as in their adjustment to life. He realises in a fuller as well as in a more practical way than his contemporaries did the two fundamental ideas of the classical doctrine of taste-the one of restraint, 'temperance,' selection in the literary purpose, the other of arrangement, propriety, harmony of all the parts of the literary scheme. He expresses these in the 'correctness' of his prose, in his conception of the short essay, in his bracing of the couplet as it had been left by Dryden, in the unity of plan in the miscellaneous papers of the Spectator, in the conscious effort to avoid the overelaboration of the characters of the Club or the too ready indulgence of his public in one particular vem of fun or homily Thus far he is at one with the critical purpose of the Augustans, who, from Pope downwards, confined it to literature, and there almost exclusively as a discipline in technique. But he extended the application to manners, on the one hand exposing the improprieties of society, party-politics, mere scholarship, or popular religion, which arise from the enthusiasm of disorderly emotions, and on the other hand shoving the relationship of each and all of these special ques tions of reform-literary, social, and moral-to the broader issues of Classicism This range of criticism, which gives him a unique place among his contemporaries, was not understood by them Steele came to resent his persistent dislike of the official Whig as of the official Tory, and Swift was irritated by the Spectator's gossip about fans and patches Both failed to see the logic of Addison's position, or to foresee the immediate effect in bringing a better philosophy of life 'to dwell at clubs and assemblies, at tea tables and in coffee houses' After all, this difference between Addison and them was only one of method, or rather of degree he was in more direct opposition to the tone of his age in his refusal to share its pessimism, or to find delight in those gargantuan coarsenesses of art and conduct which sort so uncouthly with the elegances and punctilios of the It is easy to explain this divergence by a constitutional amiability and delicacy, but its cause is perhaps more truly to be found in the logical necessity to his balanced mind of completing the expression of a theory which had already commended itself in purely literary matters temporary vriters, including Pope, never tire of speaking of Good Sense, True Wit, Good Breeding, The Ingenious Gentleman, but none of them has realised so fully as Addison has done the complex meaning of these terms, and given soul to that later 'Euphues' whom the eighteenth century would fain have made a mere literary prig

Addison expounded his doctrine and convinced his readers by methods which that doctrine implied-by observing a studied moderation in his attacks and by never losing sight of the general principle involved. Like Swift and Pope he had his mission against Dulness, but he did not anathematise her votaries as yahoos and dunces He laid claim in his 'spectatorial' office to be 'something of a humorist,' and he had abundance of gentle irony and wit, but it was his tolerance rather which coaved public opinion to accept his censorship He discovered literary possibilities in subjects hitherto untouched, and by his condescension to the intelligence of the middle class he not only stimulated its efforts at self-advancement, but obtained the privilege of imposing at one and the same time his canons of taste and In this unity of æsthetic and rules of conduct moral ideas Addison is in close kinship with the Platonic and Aristotelian conception of critical method Its general terms offended many, who hinted that he prostituted literature when he brought down philosophy from its academic licaven to inhabit among quidnuncs and lady's-men, and later criticism, under the influence of the doctrine of art for art's sake, has too readily forgotten that while the Addisonian method may or may not be the true concern of the nineteenth century, it was in its own place and time a more just, complete, and effectual aid to the appreciation of æstlietic principles even in their most formal aspects like bad critical perspective has condemned Addison as unoriginal and trite. The same has been said of Pope, and indeed of eighteenth-century letters generally, but we forget that what appears to us to be commonplaces was then either newfound wisdom, or, if known, was 'ne'er so well expressed.' Addison insinuated himself so deli cately into the literary purpose of his successors, that they, and their successors, oblivious of the facts and in their desire for a stronger expression, were inclined to consider him a master of platitude Had he had more fire and some of the gall of his friends, lie might have had more persistent admiration Didactic as he was, he never dared to preach. and, though he thereby gained the confidence of his own age, the very ease of his method of convincing made it easy for posterity to be ungrateful

It is somewhat remarkable that in many estimates of Addison the most generous allowance is made for his strictly critical reflections on such subjects as Wit or the Sublime, or his appreciations of Paradise Lost and Chevy Chase. It is almost a tradition to say that we are indebted to him for Milton and the romantic ballads, and it is sometimes an argument with those writers who are never happy in their judgment of the eighteenth century that Addison's attitude to such things as The Children in the Wood shows a critical insight greatly superior to that of his time. It would be more correct to say that it is our partisan interest in these romantic matters which tempts us to read into these 'occasional' observations what Addison would not have said or cared to say critical papers, if anywhere, he is open to the charge of being commonplace and unoriginal He retails the axioms of the French critics, and seldom adds anything illuminative of their application to English literature He borrows, and often without acknowledgment, from Le Bossu, the Daciers, Bouhours, and Boileau, more amply than Sidney did from the Renascence critics, or Dryden had already done from the same French writers These passages stand apart from the rest of his work, not merely by the fact that most of them had been written in an early period and were interpolated in the Spectator when editorial copy ran short, but because they lack the spontaneity and appropriateness of the social essays were accepted in England and in Germany as a critical standard, since they had the prima facie recommendation of being embedded in Addison's most popular work, and such topics were new, and therefore attractive, to that larger reading public which had begun, under his guidance, to discuss the miscellaneous problems of taste. To the modern student, however, they are of least consideration in an estimate of Addison's literary position-less important than his fastidious interest in the preparation of a prose style, or in his treatment of the short essay If some credit be due to him for giving a certain practical value to subjects which had been hitherto exclusively academic, it is but part of that wider acknowledgment of his general intellectual purpose, which was more catholic than exhaustive, and was concerned more in teaching what to avoid than what to take for dogma.

Italy's Misfortune

Fain would I Raphael's godlike art rehearse,
And show the immortal labours in my verse,
Where from the mingled strength of shade and light
A new creation rises to my sight,
Such heavenly figures from his pencil flow,
So warm with life his blended colours glow
From theme to theme with secret pleasure tost, Amidst the soft variety I'm lost
Here pleasing airs my ravisht soul confound
With circling notes and labyrinths of sound,
Here domes and temples rise in distant views,
And opening palaces invite my muse.

How has kind Heaven adorned the happy land, And scattered blessings with a wasteful hand! But what avail her unexhausted stores, Her blooming mountains, and her sunny shores, With all the gifts that heaven and earth impart, The smiles of nature, and the charms of art, While proud Oppression in her valleys reigns, And Tyranny usurps her happy plains? The poor inhabitant beholds in vain The reddening orange and the swelling grain, Joyless he sees the growing oils and wines, And in the myrtle's fragrant shade repines, Starves, in the midst of nature's bounty curst, And in the loaden vineyard dies for thirst.

A Battle-Piece

But, O my muse, what numbers wilt thou find To sing the furious troops in battle joined! Methinks I hear the drum's tumultuous sound The victor's shouts and dying groans confound, The dreadful burst of cannon rend the skies. And all the thunder of the battle rise. 'Twas then great Marlborough's mighty soul was proved, That, in the shock of charging hosts unmoved, Amidst confusion, horror, and despair, Examined all the dreadful scenes of war, In peaceful thought the field of death surveyed, To fainting squadrons sent the timely aid, Inspired repulsed battalions to engage, And taught the doubtful battle where to rage. So when an angel by divine command With rising tempests shakes a guilty land, Such as of late o'er pale Britannia past, Calm and serene he drives the furious blast, And, pleased the Almighty's orders to perform, Rides in the whirlwind, and directs the storm.

But see the haughty household troops advance I The dread of Europe, and the pride of France. The war's whole art each private soldier knows, And with a general's love of conquest glows, Proudly he marches on, and, void of fear, Laughs at the shaking of the British spear Vain insolence! with native freedom brave, The meanest Briton scorns the highest slave, Contempt and fury fire their souls by turns, Each nation's glory in each warrior burns, Each fights, as in his arm the important day And all the fate of his great monarch lay A thousand glorious actions, that might claim Triumphant laurels and immortal fame, Confused in clouds of glorious actions lie, And troops of heroes undistinguished die. O Dormer, how can I behold thy fate, And not the wonders of thy youth relate! How can I see the gay, the brave, the young, Fall in the cloud of war and he unsung ' In joys of conquest he resigns his breath, And, filled with England's glory, smiles in death.

The ront begins, the Gallie squadrons run, Compelled in crowds to meet the fate they shun, Thousands of fiery steeds with wounds transfixed Floating in gore, with their dead masters mixt, Midst heaps of spears and standards driven around, Lie in the Danube's bloody whirlpools drowned, Troops of bold youths, born on the distant Saône, Or sounding borders of the rapid Rhone, Or where the Seine her flowery fields divides, Or where the Loire through winding vineyards glides, In heaps the rolling billows sweep away, And into Scythian seas their bloated corps convey From Blenheim's towers the Gaul, with wild affright, Beholds the various havoe of the fight, His waving banners, that so oft had stood Planted in fields of death, and streams of blood, So wont the guarded enemy to reach, And rise trimmphant in the fatal breach, Or pierce the broken foe's remotest lines, The hardy veteran with tears resigns

Unfortunate Tallard! Oh, who can name The pangs of rage, of sorrow, and of shame, That with mixt tumult in thy bosom swelled <sup>1</sup>
When first thou saw'st thy bravest troops repelled, Thine only son pierced with a deadly wound,
Choked in his blood, and gasping on the ground,
Thyself in bondage by the victor kept!
The chief, the father, and the captive wept.
An English muse is touched with generous woe,
And in the unhappy man forgets the foe
Greatly distrest <sup>1</sup> thy loud complaints forbear,
Blame not the turns of fite, and chance of war,
Give thy brave foes their due, nor blush to own
The fatal field by such great leaders won,
The field v hence famed Eugenio bore away
Only the second honours of the day

With floods of gore that from the vanquisht fell, The marshes stagnate, and the rivers swell Mountains of slain lie heaped upon the ground, Or 'midst the roarings of the Danube drowned, Whole captive hosts the conqueror detains In painful bondage and inglorious chains, Ev'n those who 'scape the fetters and the sword, Nor seek the fortunes of a happier lord, Their raging King dishonours, to complete Marlborough's great work, and finish the defeat.

From Memminghen's high domes, and Augsburg's walls,
The distant battle drives the insulting Gauls,
Freed hy the terror of the victor's name,
The rescued states his great protection claim,
Whilst Ulm the approach of her deliverer waits,
And longs to open her obsequious gates

(From The Campaign)

Lieutenant Colonel Philip Dormer of the 1st Footquards, was killed at Blenheim. Marshal Tallard was tal en prisoner at Blen heim, and was kept in England till 1712. Prince Eugene often signed his name Eugenio. Two of the lines given above in the form Tickell made the standard, ran in the original > Midst heaps of broken spears and standards lie, And in the Danube's bloody whirlpools die.

Cato

Cato It must be so-Plato, thou reason'st well!-Else whence this pleasing hope, this fond desire, This longing after immortality? Or whence this secret dread, and inward horror, Of falling into nought? Why shrinks the soul Back on herself, and startles at destruction? Tis the divinity that stirs within us, Tis heaven itself, that points out an hereafter, And intimates eternity to man Eternity 1 thou pleasing, dreadful thought ! Through what variety of untried being, Through what new scenes and changes must we pass! The wide, the unbounded prospect lies before me, But shadows, clouds, and darkness rest upon it Here will I hold. If there's a power above us (And that there is all nature cries aloud Through all her works), he must delight in virtue, And that which he delights in must be happy But when? or where?—This world was made for Cæsar I'm weary of conjectures-This must end 'em

[Laying his hand on his sword
Thus am I doubly armed my death and life,
My bane and antidote are both before me
This in a moment brings me to an end,
But this informs me I shall never die
The soul, secured in her existence, smiles
At the drawn dagger, and defies its point.

The stars shall fade away, the sun himself Grow dim with age, and nature sink in years, But thou shalt flourish in immortal youth, Unhurt amidst the war of elements,

The wrecks of matter, and the crush of worlds.

What means this heaviness that hangs upon me? This lethargy that creeps through all my senses? Nature, oppressed and harassed out with care, Sinks down to rest. This once I'll favour her, That my awakened soul may take her flight. Renewed in all her strength, and fresh with life, An offering fit for heaven—Let guilt or fear Disturb man's rest—Cato knows neither of 'em, Indifferent in his choice to sleep or die. [Enter PORTILS. But, high! how a this, my son? why this intrusion? Were not my orders that I would be private? Why am I disobeved?

Portius Alas! my father!
What means this sword? this instrument of death?
Let me convey it hence!

Cato Rash youth, forbear 1

Por Oh let the prayers, the entreaties of your friends,
Their tears, their common danger, wrest it from you.

Cato Wouldst thou betray me? wouldst thou give me up A slave, a captive, into Cossar's hands?
Retire, and learn obedience to a father,
Or know, young man 1—

Por Look not thus sternly on me, You know I'd rather die thau disober you.

Cato 'Tis well' again I'm master of myself Now, Cresar, let thy troops beset our gates, And bar each avenue, thy gathering fleets O'erspread the sea, and stop up every port, Cato shall open to himself a passage, And mock thy hopes—

Por Oh, sir! forgive your son, Whose grief hangs heavy on him! Oh my father! How am I sure it is not the last time I e'er shall call you so! Be not displeased, Oh be not angry with me whilst I weep, And, in the anguish of my heart beseech you To quit the dreadful purpose of your soul!

Cato Thou hast been ever good and dutiful [Embracing Weep not, my son All will be well again. him The righteous gods, whom I have sought to please, Will succour Cato, and preserve his children

Por Your words give comfort to my drooping heart.

Cato Portlus, thou may'st rely upon my conduct Thy father will not act what misbecomes him
But go, my son, and see if aught be wanting Amoug thy father's friends, see them embarked,
And tell me if the winds and see's befrieud them
My soul is quite weighed down with care, and asks
The soft refreshment of a moment's sleep

O Marcia, O my sister, still there's hope!
Our father will not cast away a life
So needful to us all, and to his country
He is retired to rest, and seems to cherish Thoughts full of peace. He has despatched me hence With orders that bespeak a mind composed,
And studious for the safety of his friends.
Marcia, take care that none disturb his slumbers

In every view, in every thought I tremble!

Cato is stern, and awful as a god,

—I'm sick to death—Oh when shall I get loose

From this vain world, the abode of guilt and sorrow—And yet methinks a beain of light breaks in On my departing soul—Alas! I fear I've been too hasty—Oye powers, that search The heart of man, and weigh his immost thoughts,

If I have done amiss, impute it not!—
The best mny err, but you are good, and—oh!

Luc There fied the greatest soul that ever warmed

A Roman breast O Cato! O my friend!
Thy will shall be religiously observed
But let us bear this nwful corpse to Cæsar,
And lay it in his sight, that it may stand
A fence betwirt us and the victor's wrath,
Cato, though dead, shall still protect his friends

From hence, let fierce contending nations know What dire effects from civil discord flow 'Tis this that shakes our country with alarms, And gives up Rome a prey to Roman arms, Produces fraud, and cruelty, and strife, And robs the guilty world of Cato's life. (From Act v)

Cowley

Great Cowley then (a mighty genius) wrote, O'er run with wit, and lavish of his thought His turns too closely on the reader press, He more hid pleased us, had he pleased us less. One glittering thought no sooner strikes our eyes With silent wonder, but new wonders rise As in the milky way a shining white
O er flows the beavens with one continued light,
That not a single star can show his rays,
Whilst jointly all promote the common blaze
Pardon, great Po.t, that I dare to name
The unnumbered beauties of thy verse with blame,
Thy fault is only wit in its excess,
But wit like thine in any shape will please
What muse but thine can equal hints inspire,
And fit the deep-mouthed Pindar to thy lyre,
Pindar, whom others in a laboured strain
And forced expression, imitate in vain?
Well pleased in thee he soars with new delight, [flight
And plays in more unbounled verse, and takes a nobler Blest man! whose spotless life and charming lays

Employed the tuneful prelate in thy praise.

Blest man! who now shalt be for ever known.

In Sprit's successful labours and thy own.

An Ode

The spacious firmament on high, With all the blue ethereal sky, And spangled heavens, a shining frame, Their great Original proclaim. The unwearied sun from day to day Does his Creator's power display. And publishes to every land. The work of an Almighty hand.

Soon as the evening shades prevail,
The moon takes up the wondrous tale,
And nightly to the listening earth
Repeats the story of her birth
While all the stars that round her burn,
And all the planets, in their turn,
Confirm the tidings as they roll,
And spread the truth from pole to pole

What though, in solemn silence, all Move round the dark terrestrial ball? What though nor real voice nor sound Amid their radiant orbs be found? In reason's ear they all rejoice, And utter forth a glorious voice, For ever singing, as they shine, 'The hand that made us is Divine.

Italian Poetry

The Italian poets, besides the celebrated smoothness of their tongue, have a particular advantage above the writers of other nations in the difference of their poetical and prose language. There are, indeed, sets of phrases that in all countries are peculiar to the poets, but among the Italians there are not only sentences but a multitude of particular words that never enter into common discourse. They have such a different turn and polishing for poetical use, that they drop several of their letters, and appear in another form, when they come to be For this reason the Italian opera ranged in verse seldom sinks into a poorness of language, but, amidst all the meanness and familiarity of the thoughts, has something beautiful and sonorous in the expression Without this natural advantage of the tongue, their present poetry would appear wretchedly low and vulgar, notwithstanding the many strained allegories that are so much in use among the writers of this nation. The English and French, vito always use the same words in verse as in ordinary conversation, are forced to raise their language with metaphors and figures, or, by the pompousness of the whole phrase, to wear off any little ness that appears in the particular parts that compose it. This makes our blank verse, where there is no rliyme to support the expression, extremely difficult to such as are not masters in the tongue, especially when they write on low subjects, and 'tis probably for this reason that Milton has made use of such frequent transpositions, Latinisms, antiquated words and phrases, that he might the better deviate from vulgar and ordinary expressions

The comedies that I saw at Venice, or indeed in any other part of Italy, are very indifferent, and more lewd than those of other countries Their poets have no notion of genteel comedy, and fall into the most filthy double meanings imaginable, when they have a mind to make their audience merry. There is no part generally so wretched as that of the fine gentleman, especially when he conver-es with his mistress, for then the whole dialogue is an insipid mixture of pedantry and romance But 'tis no wonder that the poets of so jealous and reserved a nation fail in such conversations on the stage, as they have no patterns of in nature. There are four standing characters which enter into every piece that comes on the stage, the Doctor, Harlequin, Pantaloon, and Coviello The Doctor's character comprehends the whole extent of a pedant, that with a deep voice and a magisterial air breaks in upon conversation, and drives down all before him everything he says is backed with quotations out of Galen, Hippoerates Plato, Virgil, or any author that rises uppermost, and all answers from his companion are looked upon as impertinencies or interruptions Harlequin's part is made up of blunders and obsurdities he is to mistake one name for another, to forget his errands, to stumble over queens, and to run his head against every post that stands in his way is all attended vith something so comical in the voice and gestures, that a man who is sensible of the folly of the part can hardly forbear being pleased with it. Pantaloon is generally an old cully, and Coviello a sharper

I have seen a translation of the Cid, acted at Boloma [Bologna], which would never have taken, had they not found a place in it for these buffoons. All four of them appear in masks that are made like the old Roman fersonae, as I shall have occasion to observe in another place The French and Italians have probably derived this custom of showing some of their characters in masks from the Greek and Roman theatre. The old Vatican Terence has at the head of every scene the figures of all the persons that are concerned in it, with the particular disguses in which they acted, and I remember to have seen in the Villa Mattheio an antic statue masked, which was perhaps designed for Gnatho in the Eunuch, for it agrees exactly with the figure he makes in the Vatican One would wonder, indeed, how so polite a people as the Romans and Athenians should not look on these borrowed faces as unnatural. They might do very well for a Cyclops, or a satyr, that can have no resemblance in human features, but for a flatterer, n miser, or the lile characters, which abound in our own species, nothing is more ridiculous than to represent their lools by a printed vizard. In persons of this nature the turns and motions of the face are often as agreeable as any part of the action. Could we suppose that a mask represented never so naturally the general humour of a character, it can never suit with the variety of passions that are incident to every single person in the whole course of a play. The grimace may be proper on some occasions, but is too steady to agree with all. The rabble, indeed, are generally pleased at the first entry of a disguise, but the jest grows cold even with them too when it comes on the stage in a second scene.

On Quack Doctors

I do not remember that in any of my lucubrations I have touched upon that useful science of physic, notwith standing I have declared myself more than once a pro-I have indeed joined the study of astrology fessor of it with it, because I never knew a physician recoinmend himself to the public who had not a sister art to em bellish his knowledge in medicine It has been com monly observed in compliment to the ingenious of our profession, that Apollo was god of verse as well as physic, and in all ages the most eelebrated practitioners of our country were the particular favourites of the Muses Poetry to physic is indeed like the filding to a plll, it makes the art shine, and eovers the severity of the doctor with the agreeableness of the companion very foundation of poetry is good sense, if we may allow Horace to be a judge of the art

"Seribendi recta sapare est at principium et fons." And if so, we have reason to believe that the same man who writes well can prescribe well, if he has applied lumself to the study of both. Besides, when we see a man making profession of two different sciences, it is natural for us to believe he is no pretender in that which we are not judges of, when we find him skilful in that which we understand. Ordinars quacks and charlatans are thoroughly sensible how necessary it is to support themselves by these colliteral assistances, and therefore always by their claim to some supernumerars accomplishments which are wholly foreign to their profession About twenty years ago, it was impossible to walk the streets without having an advertisement thrust into your hand, of a doctor 'who was arrived at the knowledge of the green and red drugon, and had discovered the female fern seed.' Nobody ever knew what this meant, but the green and red dragon so amused the people that the doctor lived very comfortably upon them the same time there was pasted a very hard word upon every corner of the streets. This, to the best of my remembrance, was TETRACHIMICOGON, which drew great shoals of spectators about it, who read the bill that it introduced with unspeakable curiosity, and when they were sick, would have nobody but this learned man for their physician

I once received an advertisement of one 'who had studied thirty years by candle light for the good of his countrymen'. He might have studied twice as long by day light, and never have been taken notice of but elucubrations cannot be over valued. There are some who have gained themselves great reputation for physic by their birth, as the 'seventh son of a seventh son' and others by not being born at all, as the 'unborn doctor,' who, I hear, is lately gone the way of his patients, having died worth five hundred pounds for annum, though he was not 'born' to a halfpenny

My ingenious friend Dr Saffold succeeded my old con temporary Dr Lilly in the studies both of physic and astrology, to which he added that of poetry, as was to be seen both upon the sign where he lived, and in the bills which he distributed. He was succeeded by Domor Case, who existed the verter of his predeces or out of the sign post, and substituted in their stead two of his own, which were as follow.

'Within this Place Lives Dortor Case.'

He is end to have possimore by this distinct than "Ir Dryden did by all his work." There would be no end of enumerating the several imaginary perfections and un accountable artifices by which this tribe of men on are the minds of the vulgar, and gain crowds of admirers. I have seen the whole front of a mountebrul's stage from one end to the other freed with patents, certificates, medals, and grant seal, by which the several princes of I urope have to tified their particular respect and essem for the do-tor. I very great man with a sounding the has been his patient. I believe I have seen twenty mountebrul's that have given play to the Czar of Muscovy. The Great Dulle of Fuscany escapes no better. The I lector of Brandenburg was likewise a very good patient.

This great condescen ion of the doctor draws upon him much food will from his audience, and it is ten to one, but if any of them he troubled with an acting tooth, his ambition will prompt him to get it drawn by a person who has had so many princes, lings, and emperor under his hands

I must not leave this subject without of serving that, as physicians are apt to deal in poetry, apchecance endeavour to recommend themselves in oratory, and are therefore without entroversy the most cloquent per 123 in the whole Pritish nation. I would not willingly discourage any of the arts, especially that of which I am nilumble professor, but I must confess, for the good of my native country, I could will there mught be a suspension of physic for some years, that our kingdom, which has been so much exhausted by the wars, might have leave to recruit itself.

As for mostly, the only physic which has brought recorde to almost the age of man, and which I present to all my friends, is abstinence. This is certainly the best physic for prevention, and very often the most effectual against a present distemper. In short, my recipe is,

'Take nothing

Were the body politic to be physicled like particular persons, I should venture to prescribe to it after the same manner I remember when our whole island was shaken with an earthquake some years ago, there was an impudent mountebank who sold pills, which (as he told the country people) were very good against an earth quake. It may perhaps be thought as absurd to presembe a diet for the allaving popular commotions and national ferments. But I am verily persuaded that if in such a case a whole people were to enter into a course of abstinence, and cat nothing but water gruel for a fort night, it would abate the rage and animosity of parties, and not 'n little contribute to the cure of n distracted Such a fast would have a natural tendency to the procuring of those ends for which a fast is usually proclaimed. If any man has a mind to enter on such a voluntary abstinence, it might not be improper to give him the caution of Pythagorus in particular Abstine a fabis, 'Abstain from beans' that is, say the interpreters, meddle not with elections—beans having been made use of by the voters among the Athenians in the choice of magistrates

(The Tatler, No. 240.)

Lilly the astrologer died in 1681, Thomas Saffold, who left off wearing to become n quack-doctor, died in 1691, refusing all medicines but his own pills, John Case throve on astrology from 1680 to about 1700

On The Spectator'

It is with much satisfaction that I hear this great city inquiring day by day after these my papers, and receiving my morning lectures with a becoming seriousuess and My publisher tells me that there are already three thousand of them distributed every day so that if I allow twenty readers to every paper, which I look upon as a modest computation, I may reckon about threescore thousand disciples in London and Westminster, who I hope will take care to distinguish them selves from the thoughtless herd of their ignoraut and unattentive brethren Since I have raised to myself so great an audience, I shall spare no pains to make their instruction agreeable, and their diversion useful which reasons I shall endeavour to enliven morality with wit, and to temper wit with morality, that my readers may, if possible, both ways find their account in the speculation of the day Aud to the end that their virtue and discretion may not be short, transient, intermitting starts of thought, I have resolved to refresh their memories from day to day, till I have recovered them out of that desperate state of vice and folly into which the age is fallen. The mind that lies fallow but a single day, sprouts up in follies that are only to be killed by a constant and assiduous culture It was said of Socrates that he brought Philosophy down from heaven, to inhabit among men, and I shall be ambitious to have it said of me, that I have brought Philosophy out of closets and libraries, schools and colleges, to dwell in clubs and assemblies, at tea tables and in coffee houses

I would therefore in a very particular manner recommend these my speculatious to all well regulated families that set apart an hour of every morning for tea and bread and butter, and would earnestly advise them for their good to order this paper to be punctually served up, and to be looked upon as a part of the tea equipage.

Sir Francis Bacon observes that a well written book, compared with its rivals and antagonists, is like Moses's scrpent, that immediately swallowed up and devoured those of the Egyptians. I shall not be so vain as to think that where the Spectator appears the other public prints will vanish, but shall leave it to my readers' consideration whether is it not much better to be let into the knowledge of one's self than to hear what passes in Miscovy or Poland, and to amuse ourselves with such writings as tend to the wearing out of ignorance, passion, and prejudice, than such as naturally conduce to inflame lattereds and make enmittes irreconcilable?

In the next place, I would recommend this paper to the daily perusal of those gentlemen whom I cannot but consider as my good brothers and allies, I mean the fraternity of Spectators, who live in the world without having anything to do in it, and, either by the affluence of their fortines or laziness of their disportions, have no other business with the rest of mankind but to look upon them. Under this class of men are comprehended all contemplative tradesmen, titular physicians, follows of the Royal Society, Templars that are not given to be contentious, and statesmen that are out of business, in short, every one that considers the vorld as a theatre and desires to form a right judgment of those who are the actors on it

There is another set of men that I must likewise lay a claim to, whom I have lately called the blanks of society, as being altogether unfurnished with ideas, till the business and conversation of the day has supplied them I have often considered these poor souls with an eye of great commiseration, when I have heard them asking the first man they have met with, whether there was any news stirring? and by that means gathering together materials for thinking. These needs persons do not know what to talk of, till about twelve a clock in the morning, for by that time they are pretty good indges of the weather, know which way the wind sits, and whether the Dutch mail be come in. As they he at the mercy of the first man they meet, and are grave or impertinent all the day long, according to the notions which they have imbibed in the morning, I would ear nestly entreat them not to stir out of their chambers till they have read this paper, and do promise them that I will daily instil into them such sound and wholesome sentiments as shall have a good effect on their conversa tion for the ensuing twelve hours.

But there are none to whom this paper will be more useful than to the female world. I have often thought there has not been sufficient pains token in finding out proper employments and diversions for the fair ones Their amusements seem contrived for them, rather as they are women than as they are reasonable creatures. and are more adapted to the sex than to the species. The toilet is their great scene of business, and the right adjusting of their livir the principal employment of their lives. The sorting of n suit of ribbons is reckoned n very good morning's work, and if they make an excursion to a mercer's or a toy shop, so great a fatigue makes them unfit for anything else all the day after. Their more serious occupations are sewing and embroiders, and their greatest drudgers the preparation of jellies and sweet meats. This, I say, is the state of ordinary women, though I know there are multitudes of those of a more elevated life and conversation, that move in an exalted sphere of knowledge and virtue that join all the beauties of the mind to the ornaments of dress, and inspire a kind of two and respect, as well as love, into their male beholders. I hope to increase the number of these by publishing this daily paper, which I shall always endeavour to make an innocent if not an improving entertainment, and by that means at least divert the minds of my female readers from greater trifles same time, as I would fain give some finishing touches to those which are already the most beautiful pieces in human nature. I shall endeavour to point out all those imperfections that are the blemishes, as well as those virtues which are the embellishments, of the sex. In the meanwhile I hope these my gentle renders, who have so much time on their hands, will not grudge throwing away a quarter of an hour in a day on this paper, since they may do it without any hindrince to business

I know several of my friends and well wishers are in great pain for me lest I should not be able to keep up the spirit of a paper which I oblige myself to furnish every day but to make them easy in this particular, I will promise them faithfully to give it over as soon as I grow dull. This I know will be matter of great raillery to the small wits, who will frequently put me in mind of my promise, desire me to keep my word, assure me that it is high time to give over, with many other pleasantries of the life nature, which men of a little smart genius caunot forbear throwing out against their best friends, when they have such a handle given them of being with. But let them remember that I do hereby enter my cavent against this piece of raillers.

Of Mived Wit

Mr Locke has an admirable reflection upon the difference of wit and judgment, whereby he endeavours to show the reason why they are not always the talents of the same person. His words are as follow. 'And hence, perhaps, may be given some reason of that common observation, that men who have a great deal of wit and prompt incinoric, have not always the clearest judgment or deepest reason. For wit lying mo t in the assemblage of ideas, and putting those together with quiel ness and variety, wherein can be found any to emblance or congruity, thereby to male up pleasant pictures and agreeable visions in the fancy, judament on the contrary, his quite on the other side, in separating care fully one from another ideas wherein can be found the least difference, thereby to avoid being misked by similitude, and by affinity to take one thing for another This is a way of proceeding quite contriry to inclaphor and allusion, wherein for the most part hes that entertainment and pleasantry of wit which strile so lively on the fancy, and is therefore so acceptable to all

This is, I thinl, the best and most philosophical account that I have ever met with of wit, which gener ally, though not always, consists in such a resemblance and congruity of ideas as this author mentions. I shall only add to it, by way of explanation, that every resemblance of ideas is not that which we call wit infless it be such an one that gives delight and surprise to the reader. these two properties seem essential to wit, more partieu larly the last of them. In order, therefore, that the resemblance in the ideas be wit, it is necessary that the ideas should not be too near one another in the nature of things, for where the likeness is obvious, it gives no surprise to compare one man's singing to that of another, or to represent the whiteness of any object by that of milk and snow, or the variety of its colours by those of the rainbow, cannot be called wit, unless besides this obvious resemblance there he some further con gruity discovered in the two ideas, that is expuble of giving the reader some surprise. Thus when a poet tells us the bosom of his mistress is as white as snow, there is no wit in the comparison, but when he adds, with a sigh, that it is as cold too, it then grows into wit Every reader's memory may supply him with innumer able instances of the same nature. For this reason, the slmilitudes in heroic poets, who endersour rather to fill the mind with great conceptions than to divert it with such as are new and surprising, have seklom anything in them that can be called wit. Mr Locke's account of wit, with this short explanation, comprehends most of the species of wit, as metaphors, similatides, allegories, enigmas, mottos, parables, fables, dreams, visions, dramatic writings, burlesque, and all the methods of allusion as there are many other pieces of wit (how remote socier they may appear at first sight from the foregoing de crip ion) which then examination will be found to a de with it

As true wit pen rally con ists in the to emblance and concruits of idea, fall out thirdly consists in the recombinate and congruity contains of single letter as in many raise, chi and some hippogram and acrosses, ome time of syllabile, as in rall a and dogored results, some time of syllabile, as in point in liquidades, and contains of words as in point in liquidades, and contains of whole in one or poont, and into the squites of age, and a, or alternative may, come carry the notation with so far, as to a cribe it even to external it in cris, and to look upon a minutes and in, notes part it that can be comble the tone, posture, or face of anyther.

As true vit con a somether resemblence of aleas, and false wit in the resemblance of ord, a conductore foregoing in traces, then a problem limit of his which e nerts parly in the reamble nee of pleas and pauly In the re-emblance of weri which for do in ion' ale, I shall sall must wit. This kind of vita that which beinds in to ley more than in wis a dothat ever a rete. Mr. Waller has like a con green real of it. Mr Drylen is ver spring if it. Million full a genial much about Speace a in the same can's with Milton. The Italian, even in their care pours, Mon n ir Poil au, Alio formel hæ it to full of i all upon the ones at piech has every once rejected e well scorn. If we lisk ofter mist not aming the Greek virter, ve shall find it nowhere I it in the q Bramma its. There are, in tent is in strole of it in the little piech recribed to Music the h by the es well a many other many, better it elf to be a malem composition. If velon into lele in writer, ve fiel none of this mixt wit in Viral Lucieties or Comiss. very little in Homes, but a great deal of it in Ord, and scarce anythin of a in Martial

Out of the imminerable bruiches of most wit I seed choose one instruce which may be met with in all the The passen of love in its na are writers of this ela s has been thought to re-emble tire for shich tenson the words fire and flame are made as effection and love The witty poets, therefore have taken an alventage from the doubtful meaning of the word fre to make an infinite number of writering. Cowler observing the cold regard of In this ress's eves, and at the same time their power of producing love in him con dere them as burning the is made of ice and, if ding him celf able to live in the greatest extremities of love, concludes the torrid zone to be habitable. When his mistress has read his letter written in juice of leinon by holding it to the fire, he desires her to read it over a second time by love > When she weeps, he wishes it were inward heat that distilled those drops from the limber she is ab ent, he is beyond eighty, that is thatty degrees nearer the pole than when she is with him. His am bitious love is a tire that naturally mounts upwards his happy love is the beams of heaven, and his unhappy When it does not let him sleep, it love flames of hell is a flame that sends up no smoke, when it is opposed by counsel and advice, it is a fire that rages the more by the wind's blowing upon it. Upon the dving of a tree in which he had cut his loves, he observes that his written flames had burnt up and withered the tree When he resolves to give over his passion he tells us that one burnt like him for ever dreads the fire heart is an I that that instead of Vulcan's shop, encloses Cupid's forge in it. His endervouring to drown his love in wine is throwing oil upon the fire. He vould in initate to his mistres, that the fire of love, like that of the sun (which produces so many living creatures), should not only warm but beget. Love in another place cooks pleasure at his fire. Sometimes the poets heart is frozen in every breast, and sometimes seorched in every eve. Sometimes he is drowned in tears, and burnt in love, like a ship set on fire in the middle of the cere.

The reader may observe in every one of these instances that the poet mixes the qualities of fire with those of love, and in the same sentence, speaking of it both as a passion and as real fire, surprises the reader with those seeming resemblances or contradictions that make up all the wit in this kind of writing Mixt wit, therefore, is a composition of pun and true wit, and is more or less perfect as the resemblance lies in the ideas or in the words, its foundations are laid partly in falschood and partly in truth, reason puts in her claim for one half of it, and extravagance for the other. The only province, therefore, for this 1 ind of wit is epigram, or those little occasional poems that in their own nature are nothing clse but a tissue of epigrams. I cannot con clude this head of mixt wit without owning that the admirable poet out of whom I have taken the examples of it, had as much true wit as any author that ever writ, and, indeed, all other talents of an extraordinary ⊈enius.

It may be expected, since I am upon this subject, that I should take notice of Mr Dryden's definition of wit. which, with all the deference that is due to the judgment of so great a man, is not so properly a definition of wit as of good writing in general. Wit, as he defines it, is 'a propriety of words and thoughts adapted to the subject. If this be a true definition of wit, I am apt to think that Euclid was the greatest wit that ever set pen to paper it is certain there never was a greater propriety of words and thoughts adapted to the subject than what that author has made use of In his Elements. I shall only appeal to my reader if this definition agrees with any notion he has of wit. If it be a true one, I am sure Mr Dryden was not only a better poet, but a greater wit, than Mr Cowley, and Virgil a much more facetious man than either Ovid or Martial

Bouliours, whom I look upon to be the most penetrat ing of all the French critics, his taken pains to show that it is impossible for any thought to be beautiful which is not just and has no its foundation in the nature of things, that the basis of all wit is truth, and that no thought can be valuable of which good sense 15 not the ground work. Boilean has endeavoured to in culcate the same notion in several parts of his writings, bods in prose and verse. This is that natural way of writing, that beautiful simplicity, which we so much admire in the compositions of the ancients, and which nolody deviates from but those who want strength of genius to make a thought shine in its own natural beauties. Poets who want this strength of genius to give that majestic simplicity to nature, which we so much admire in the works of the ancients, are forced to hunt after fereign ornament, and not to let any piece of wit, of wha kind soever, escape them. I look upon these writers as Goths in poetrs, who, like tho e in architecture, not being able to come up to the beautiful sim plicity of the old Greeks and Komans, have endeavoured to supply its place with all the extravagance of an irregular fancy Mr Dryden makes a very handsome observation on Ovid's writing a letter from Dido to Eners, in the following words 'Ovid (says lie, speal ing of Virgil's fiction of Dido and Lucas) tales it up after him, even in the same age, and makes an aucient herome of Virgil's new created Dido, dictates a letter for her, just before her death, to the ungrateful fugitive, and, very unluckily for lumself, is for measuring a sy ord with a man so much superior in force to him on the same subject. I think I may be judge of this, because I have translated both. The famous author of the Art of Love has nothing of his own the borrows all from a greater master in his own profession, and, which is worse, improves nothing which he finds fails lum, and being forced to his old shift, he lins recourse to witticism This passes, indeed, with his soft admirers, and gives him the preference to Virgil in their esteem 1

Were not I supported by so great an authority as that of Mr Dryden, I should not venture to observe, that the taste of most of our English poets, as well as readers, is extremely Gothic He quotes Monsieur Segrais for a threefold distinction of the readers of poetry in the first of which he comprehends the rabble of readers, whom he does not treat as such with regard to their quality, but to their numbers and the coarseness of their taste. His words are as follow 'Segrais has distinguished the readers of poetry, according to their capacity of judging, into three classes (He might have said the same of writers too, if he had pleased) In the lowest form he places those v hom he calls Les Petits Esprits, such things as are our upper gallery audience in a play house, who like nothing but the husk and rind of wit, prefer a quibble, a conceit, an epigram, before solid sense and elegant expression, these are mob readers. If Virgil and Martial stood for Parliament men, we know plready who would carry it. But though they make the greatest appearance in the field, and cry the loudest, the best out is, they are but a sort of French Huguenots or Dutch boors, brought over in herds but not naturalized, who have not lands of two pounds per annun in Parnassus. and therefore are not privileged to poll. Their authors are of the same level, fit to represent them on a mounte bank's stage, or to be masters of the cercinomies in a bear garden yet these are they who have the most admirers. But it often happens, to their mortification, that as their renders improve their stock of sense (as they may by reading better books, and by conversation with men of judgment) they soon forsake them

I must not dismiss this subject without ob erving, that as Mr Loele, in the passage above mentioned, lins discovered the most fruitful source of wit, so there is another of a quite contrary nature to it, which does life wise brunch itself out in o several kinds. I or not only the re-emblance, but the opposition of idear, does very often produce vit as I could show in several little points, turns, antitheses, that I may possibly enlarge upon in some future specula ion.

Sir Roger at the Play

My friend Sir Roger de Coverley, when we last met together at the club, told me that he had a great muid to see the new tragedy with me, as uring me at the same time that he had not been nt a play the c twenty years 'The Inst I saw, savs Sir Roger, 'was the Committee, which I should not have gone to neither, had not I been told before hand that it was a good Church of He then proceeded to inquire of me I ngland comedy who this Distressed Mother was and upon hearing that she was Hector's widow, he told me that her husband was a brave man, and that when he was a school box he had read his life at the end of the dictionary asked me, in the next place, if there would not be some danger in coming home late, in case the Mohoeks should "I assure you" says he, "I thought I had fallen into their hands last night for I ob creed two or three lusty black men that followed me half way up Fleet Street, and mended their pace behind me in proportion as I put on to go away from them must know (continued the length with a mile) I fancied they had a mind to hunt me for I remember an honest gentleman in my neighbourhood, who was served such a trick in King Charles the Second's time, for which reason he has not ventured himself in town ever since. I might have shown them very good sport, had this been their design, for as I am an old fox hunter, I should have turned and dodged, and have placed them a thousand triel's they had never seen in their lives before Sir Roger added, that if these gentlemen had any such intention, they did not succeed very well in it 'for I threw them out (says he) at the end of Norfolk Street, where I doubled the corner, and got shelter in my lodgings before they could imagine v hat was become of However (says the knight), if Captain Sentra will make one with us to morrow night, and if you will both of you call upon me about four o clock, that we may be at the house before it is full, I will have my own coach in readiness to attend you for John tells me he has got the fore wheels mended '

The captain, who did not ful to meet me there at the appointed hour, bid Sir Roger fear nothing for that he had put on the same sword which he had made use of at the battle of Steenkirk Sir Roger's servants and among the rest my old friend the butler, had, I found, provided themselves with good oaken plants, to attend their master upon this occasion. When we had placed him in his coach, with myself at his left hand, the captain before him, and his butler at the head of his footmen in the rear, we convoyed him in safety to the play house where, after having marched up the entry in good order. the captain and I went in with him and seated him betwixt us in the pit As soon as the house was full, and the candles lighted, my old friend stood up and looked about him with that pleasure which a mind sersoned with humanity naturally feels in itself at the sight of a multitude of people who seem pleased with one another, and partake of the same common entertainment I could not but fancy to myself, as the old man stood up in the middle of the pit that he made a very proper centre to a tragie audience Upon the entering of Pyrrhus, the knight told me that he did not believe the King of France himself had a better strut indeed, very attentive to my old friend's remarks, because I looked upon them as a piece of natural criticism, and was well pleased to hear him at the conclusion of almost every scene telling inc that he could not imagine how the play would end. One while he appeared much concerned for Andromache, and a little while after as much for Hermione, and was extremely put ried to think what would be come of Pyrrhus.

When Sir Koyer saw Andromache's ob tinate referal to her lover's importunities, he whispered me in the ear that he was sure she would never have him, to which he added with a more than ordinary veharence, "You cannot miagine, sir, what it is to have to do with a widow. Upon Pyrrhus his threatening ofterwards to leave her, the Empht shook his head, and mutered to lumself. Ay, do if you can? This part do elt so mich upon my friend's imagination, that at the closs of the third act, as I was thirking of something else, he while percel in my car 'These widov quir, are the most per verse erecture in the world. I'it pray (says le) year that are a critic in this play according to your drama c rules, as you call them? Shoult your people in trapely always tall to be under onl? Why there is not a single sentence in this play that I do not know the meaning of

The fourth act very lockily began before I had time to give the old gen leman an answer. 'Well,' says the knight, sitting down with great satisfaction. I suppose we are now to see Hector's ghost. He then rerewed his nitionion, and from time to time, fell a praise give wildow. He made indeed a hittle mistake as to are of her pages whom, a his firs entering he took for Asimany but he quickly set himself right in it tigar ticular, though, at the same time, he owned he should have been very glad to have seen the little boy, 'who' says he, 'must needs be a very fine child by the account that is given of him. I pon Hermione's going of with a member to Pyrrhus, the audience gave a loud clap to which his Rieger added, 'On my word, a rotal evolung laggage'.

As there was a very remarkable silence and sulfaces in the audience thiring the v hole action, it was natural for them to take the opportunity of the intervals between the acts to express their opinion of the phycis, and of Sir koger hearing a clus er of their respective part them praise Orestes, struck in with them, and toll them that he thought his friend Palales was a very sens bie man. As they were afterwards applauling Parthus, Sir Roger put in a second time, 'And les me tell von (savs he), though he speaks but little, I like the o'd fellow in whi kers as well as any of them.' Captain Senta seeing two or three wags who sat near us lean with an attentive car towards Sir Roger, and fearing lest ther should smoke [make fun of] the knight, plucked him by the clbow, and whispered something in his ear that lasted till the opening of the fifth act. The knight was worder fully attentive to the account which Oreses gives of Pyrrhus his death, and at the conclusion of it told me it was such a bloody piece of work that he was glad it was not done upon the stage Seeing afterwards Ore-tes in his raving fit, he grew more than ordinary serious, and took occasion to moralize (iii his way) upon an evil conscience, adding that 'Orestes, in his madness, looked as if he saw something?

As we were the first that came into the house, so we were the last that went out of it—being resolved to have a clear passage for our old friend, whom we did not care to venture among the justing of the crowd—Sir Roger went out fully satisfied with his entertainment, and we guarded him to his lodgings in the same manner that we brought him to the play house, being highly pleased, for my own part, not only with the performance of the excellent piece which had been presented, but with the satisfaction which it had given to the good old man.

(The Spectator, No 335)

The Committee, one of Sir Robert Howard's plays (see Vol. I p. 727), was very popular after the Restoration on necount of its political bias. See Pepps's Diary, 12th June 1663. The Distressed Mother (a version of Racine's Andromague) by Ambrose Philips was acted on 17th March 1712 and printed in 1713. Steele wrote the Prologue, and Addison and Budgell the Epilogue. It was builesqued by Fielding in his Covent Garden Tragedy (1732).

Nature and Art

If we consider the works of nature and art, as they are qualified to entertain the imagination, we shall find the last very defective in comparison of the former, for though they may sometimes appear as beautiful or strange, they can have nothing in them of that vastness and im mensity, which afford so great an entertainment to the mind of the beholder. The one may be as polite and delicate as the other, but can never show herself so august and magnificent in the design. There is some thmg more bold and masterly in the rough careless strokes of nature than in the nice touches and embellish The beauties of the most stately garden ments of art or palace lie in a narrow compass, the imagination im mediately runs them over, and requires something else to gratify her, but in the wide fields of nature, the sight wanders up and down without confinement, and is fed with an infinite variety of images, without any certain stint or number For this reason we always find the poet in love with a country life, where nature appears in the greatest perfection, and furnishes out all those scenes that are most apt to delight the imagination

'Scriptorum chorus omnis amat nemus et fugit urbes ' —HORACE.

'Hie secura quies, et nescia fallere vita,
Dives opum variarum, hie latis otia fundis,
Speluncae, vivique lacus, hie frigida Tempe, Mugitusque boum, mollesque sub arbore somn '
—VIRGIA

But though there are several of these wild scenes that are more delightful than any artificial shows, yet we find the works of nature still more pleasant the more they resemble those of art for in this case our pleasure rises from a double principle, from the agreeableness of the objects to the eye, and from their similitude to other objects we are pleased as well with comparing their beauties as with surveying them, and can represent them to our minds either as copies or originals. Hence it is that we take delight in a prospect which is well laid out, and diversified with fields and meadows, woods and rivers, in those accidental landscapes of trees, clouds, and cities, that are sometimes found in the veins of marble, in the curious fret work of rocks and grottos, and, in a word, in anything that hath such a variety or regularity as may seem the effect of design, in what we call the works of chance.

If the products of nature rise in value, according as they more or less resemble those of art, we may be sure that artificial works receive a greater advantage from their resemblance of such as are natural, hecause here the similitude is not only pleasant, but the pattern more perfect. The prettiest landscape I ever saw was one drawn on the walls of a dark room, which stood opposite on one side to a navigable river, and on the other to a park. The experiment is very common in optics. Here you might discover the waves and fluctua tions of the water in strong and proper colours, with the picture of a ship entering at one end, and sailing by degrees through the whole piece. On another there appeared the green shadows of trees, waving to and fro with the wind, and herds of deer among them in minia tire, leaping about upon the wall. I must confess, the novelty of such a sight may be one occasion of its pleasantness to the imagination, but certainly the chief reason is its near resemblance to nature, as it does not only, like other pictures, give the colour and figure, but the motion of the things it represents

We have before observed that there is generally in nature something more grand and august than what we meet with in the curiosities of art. When therefore ve see this imitated in any measure, it gives us a nobler and more exalted kind of pleasure than what we receive from the nicer and more accurate productions of art this account our English gardens are not so entertaining to the fancy as those in France and Italy, where we see a large extent of ground covered over with an agreeable mixture of garden and forest, which represent everywhere an artificial rudeness, much more charming than that neatness and elegancy which we meet with in those of our own country It might, indeed, be of ill consequence to the public, as well as unprofitable to private persons, to alienate so much ground from pasturage and the plough in many parts of a country that is so well peopled and cultivated to a far greater advantage. But why may not a whole estate be thrown into a kind of garden by frequent plantations, that may turn as much to the profit as the pleasure of the owner? A marsh overgrown with willows, or a mountain shaded with oaks, are not only more beautiful but more beneficial than when they lay hare and unadorned Fields of corn make a pleasant prospect, and if the walks were a little taken care of that he between them, if the natural embroidery of the meadows were helped and improved by some small additions of art, and the several rows of hedges set off hy trees and flowers that the soil was capable of receiving, a man might make a pretty landscape of his own possessions

Writers who have given us an account of Chiua tell us the inhabitants of that country laugh at the planta tions of our Europeans, which are laid out by the rule and line, because, they say, any one may place trees in equal rows and uniform figures. They choose rather to show a genius in works of this nature, and therefore always conceal the art by which they direct themselves. They have a word, it seems, in their language, by which they express the particular beauty of a plantation that thus strikes the imagination at first sight, without dis covering what it is that bas so agreeable an effect. Our British gardeners, on the contrary, instead of humouring nature, love to deviate from it as much as possible. Our trees rise in cones, globes, and pyramids We see the marks of the scissors upon every plant and bash not know whether I am singular in my opinion, hut for my own part I would rather look upon a tree in all its luxurancy and diffusion of boughs and branches, than when it is thus cut and trimmed into a mathematical figure, and cannot but fancy that an orchard in flower looks infinitely more delightful than all the little laby-rinths of the most finished parterre. But we our great modellers of gardens have their magazines of plants to dispose of, it is very natural for them to tear up all the beautiful plantations of fruit trees, and contrive a plan that may most turn to their own profit, in taking off their evergreens and the life moveable plants with which their shops are plentifully stocked

(The Sec Liter, No. 414)

For similar treatment of this topic, see Pope's Meral Lisays, Epist, is The earlier or formal (or Duich ) style made feshion able by the gardeners London & Wise (Spitter No c), was succeeded by a freer tyle which was popularized by the gardeners Pridgeman & Kent and was praised by Walpole and by Pepe who "Iwisted and Iwirled his garden at Twickenham. This later type became known en the Continent through the Due de Niverrois trinslation of Walpole's Issir on Metern Girlerine as the gardu à l'an laise

On Nakod Bosoms

There are many little enormities in the world, which our preachers would be very glad to see removed, but at the same time dark not meddle with them, for fear of betraving the dignity of the pulpit Should they recom mend the tucker in a pathetic discourse, their audiences would be apt to laugh out. I knew a parish where the top woman of it used always to appear with a pateli upon some part of her forchead the good man of the place preheled at it with great zeal for almost a twelve month, but instead of fetching out the spot which he perpetually aimed at, he only got the name of Parson Patch for his pains. Another is to this day called by the name of Doctor Copknot for reasons of the same I remember the elergy, during the time of Cromwell's usurpation, were very much talen up in reforming the female world, and showing the vanity of those outward ornaments in which the sex so much delights. I have heard a whole sermon against a white wish, and have known a coloured ribbon made the mark of the unconverted The elergy of the present age are mot transported with these indiscrect fervours, as know ing that it is hard for a reformer to acoul ridicule when he is severe upon subjects which are rather apt to produce mirth than seriousness. I or this reason. I look upon myself to be of great use to these good men, while they are employed in extirpating mortal sins and crimes of a ligher nature, I should be glad to rally the world out of indecencies and venial transgressions. While the Doctor is curing distempers that have the appearance of danger or death in them, the Merry Andrew has his separate packet for the meagrams and the tooth ache

Thus much I thought fit to premise before I resume the subject which I have already handled, I mean the naked bosoms of our British ladies. I hope they will not take it ill of me, if I still beg that they will be covered. I shall here present them with a letter on that particular, as it was yesterday conveyed to me through the hon's mouth It comes from a Quaker, and is as follows

English Fickleness

If we may believe the observation which a made of us by foreigners, there is no nation in Lurop. so much given to change as the Inglish. There are some also ascribe this to the fickleness of our climate, and olders to the freedom of our government. From one or both of these causes their writers derive that variety of humours which appears among the people in general, and that inconsistency of character which is to be found in almost every particular person. But as a man should always be upon his guard against the vices to which he is most exposed, so we should take more than ordinary care not to lie at the merey of the weather in our moral conduct, nor to make a capricious use of that liberts which we enjoy by the happiness of our civil constitution

This instability of temper ought in a particular manner to be checked, when it shows itself in political affairs, and disposes men to wander from one scherie of government to mother, since such a fickleness of behaviour in public measures cannot but be attended with very fatal effects to our country

In the first place, it hinders any great undertaking, which requires length of time for its accomplishment, from being brought to its due perfection any instance in history which better confirms this observation, than that which is still fresh in every one's memory. We engaged in the late war with a design to reduce an exorbitant growth of power in the most dangerous enemy to Great Britain. We gained a long and wonderful series of victories, and had scarce any thing left to do but to reap the fruits of them, when on a sudden our patience failed us, we grew tired of our undertaking, and received terms from those who were upon the point of giving us whatever we could have demanded of them.

This mutability of mind in the English makes the ancient friends of our nation very backward to engage with us in such alliances as are necessary for our mutual defence and security. It is a common notion among foreigners that the English are good confederates in an enterprise which may be despatched within a short compass of time, but that they are not to be depended upon in a work which cannot be finished without constancy and perseverance. Our late measures have so blemished our national credit in this particular, that those potentates who are entered into treaties with his present Majesty have been solely encouraged to it by their confidence in his personal firmness and integrity

I need not, after this, suggest to my reader the ignominy and reproach that falls upon a nation which distinguishes itself among its neighbours by such a wavering and unsettled conduct.

This our inconsistency in the pursuit of schemes which have been thoroughly digested, has as bad an influence on our domestic as on our foreign affairs. We are told that the famous Prince of Conde used to ask the English ambassador, upon the arrival of a mail, 'Who vas Secretary of State in England by that fost?' as a piece of raillery upon the fickleness of our politics. But what has rendered this a misfortune to our country is that public ministers have no sooner made themselves masters of their business than they have been dismissed from their employments, and that this disgrace has befallen very many of them, not because they have deserved it, but because the people love to see new faces in high posts of honour

It is a double misfortune to a nation which is thus given to change, when they have a sovereign at the head of them that is prone to fall in with all the turns and veerings of the people. Sallust, the gravest of all the Roman historians, who had formed his notions of regal anthority from the manner in which he saw it exerted among the barbarous nations, makes the following remark. Plerumque regiae voluntates, utin thementes, six mobiles, saepe ipsae siln advorsae. 'The wills of kings, as they are generally vehement, are lilewise very fickle, and at different times opposite to themselves'. Were there any colour for this general observation, how much does it redound to the honour of such princes who are exceptions to it!

The natural consequence of an unsteady government is the perpetuating of strife and faction among a divided people. Whereas a king who persists in those schemes which he has laid, and has no other view in them but the good of his subjects, extinguishes all hopes of advancement in those who would grow great by an opposition to his measures, and insensibly unites the contending parties in their common interest.

Queen Elizabeth, who makes the greatest figure among our English sovereigns, was most eminently remarkable for that steadiness and uniformity which ran through all her actions, during that long and glorious reign kept up to her chosen motto in every part of her life, and never lost sight of those great ends, which she proposed to herself on her accession to the throne, the happiness of her people and the strengthening of the Protestant interest. She often interposed her royal anthority to break the cabals which were forming against her first ministers, who grew old and died in those stations which they filled with so great abilities By this means slie baffled the many attempts of her foreign and domestic enemies, and entirely broke the whole force and spirit of that party among her subjects which was popishly affected, and which was not a little formidable in the beginning of her reign

The frequent changes and alterations in public proceedings, the multiplicity of schemes introduced one upon another, with the variety of short lived favourites that prevailed in their several turns under the government of her successors, have by degrees broken us into those unhappy distinctions and parties, which have given so much uneasiness to our kings, and so often endangered the safety of their people.

I question not but every impartial reader hath been beforehand with me in considering on this occasion the happiness of our country under the government of his present Majesty, who is so deservedly famous for an inflexible adherence to those counsels which have a visible tendency to the public good, and to those persons who heartly concur with him in promoting these his generous designs

A prince of this character will be dreaded by his enemies, and served with courage and zeal by his friends, and will either instruct us by his example to fix the unsteadiness of our politics, or by his conduct hinder it from doing us any prejudice

Upon the whole, as there is no temper of mind more unmanly in a private person, nor more permicious to the public in a member of a community, than that changeableness with which we are too justly branded by all our neighbours, it is to be hoped that the sound part of the nation will give no further occasion for this reproach, but continue steady to that happy establish ment which has now taken place among us obstinacy in preindices which are detrimental to our country, ought not to be mistaken for that virtuous resolution and firmness of mind which is necessary to our preservation, it is to be wished that the enemies to our constitution would so far indulge themselves in this national humour, as to come into one change more, by falling in with that plan of government which at present they think fit to oppose. At least we may expect they will be so wise as to show a legal obedience to the best of kings, who profess the duty of passive obedience to the worst. (The Frecholder, No. 25.)

Sir Richard Steele.

Steele (1672-1729) has described himself as 'an Englishman born in Dublin,' and his biographicrs, after some balancing of contradictory authorities, have established the date of his birth in the month of March 1672. Of his parentage little is known His mother is said to have been Irish, of a Wesford family, his father appears to have been a lawyer, probably an attorney, in Dublin. What is essential in the facts of his origin is that, like Swift, Goldsmith, Sterne, Burke, and Sheri dan, he was one of that brilliant band of Anglo Irish writers to whom English literature in the eighteenth century owed so much

The elder Steele died while his son was yet a child, and the memory the grief stricken household inspired the editor of the Tather long afterwards to a description which is one of his most admired pathetic prssages uncle of the name Gascoigne, secretary to the Duke of Ormonde. Lord - Lieutenant of Ireland, took in interest in the fatherless boy, and sent him to school and college in England In 1684, through the Duke's nomination, Steele was admitted to the Charterhouse, where, as he lumself tells us, he 'suffered very much for two or three false concords,' after the Spartan manner of the place and time. A more notable and profitable experience was the beginning of his almost lifelong friendship with Addison, which may probably be fixed in the years when the two were schoolboxs together in cloisters which Thackeray has glorified as 'Greyfriars' After five years at the Charterhouse, Steele went up to Oxford as an exhibitioner, matriculating there at Christ Church in the beginning of 1690, but removing from that college to Merton in the following year The sole noteworthy incident of his Oxford days was the composition of a comedy, which, on the advice of a critical fellow-student, was (no doubt wisely) committed to the flames

In 1694 the martial itmosphere of the times, charged with glory and gunpowder from the Boyne and Steinfirl and Linden, seems to have fired Steele's brain, for, life Coleridge a century afterwards, lie disappeared from college and enlisted is a private soldier in the Life Guards. It was as 'a gentleman of the army' that he next year published a set of verses on the death of Oueen Mary, entitled The Procession—a figid effusion of fervid lovalty, but notable in the

SIR RICHARD STLILL
(From the Portrait by Jonathan Richards in the National Portrait Callery)

Lucis's regiment of Fusiliers. He must have become also one of the recognised wats of Will's Coffee liouse, for in 1700 we find him, along with Vanbrugh, Garth, and others, replying to a ponderous satire of Sir Richard Blackmore's, and addressing himself particularly to the defence of his friend Addison

In the very 1701 appeared his Christian Here, a tract of some eighty or ninety pages, essaying to prove that 'no principles but those of religion are sufficient to make a great man'. It was written, he tells us, at first for his own private use, 'to fix upon his own mind a strong impression of virtue and religion in opposition to a stronger propensity towards unwarrantable pleasures,' en couraged by the temptations incident to his position as 'an Ensign of the Guards,' a way of life exposed to much irregularity. Practically, it is a somewhat crude rehearsal of the moralisings of the Tatler and Spectator, illustrated by 'a view of some eminent heathen, by a distant admiration of the life of our Saviour, and a near examination of that of His Apostle St Paul,' and concluding with a kind of topical parallel, or rather contrast, between Louis XIV and William III Naturally there was much saturical criticism of the discrepancy between this preaching and the preacher's own conducta conduct of which the imperfection was habitually only too frankly owned by Steele himself 'Everybody, he says, speaking of himself in the third person, 'measured the least levity in his words and actions with the character of a Christian Hero, while one or two of his acquaintance thought fit to misuse him and try their valour upon him? Perhaps it was this 'misuse' that brought about his only recorded duel-an occurrence of rather uncertain date, but apparently belonging, by a most awkward coincidence, to this very time. In justice to the fallible 'Christian Hero,' however, it must be remembered that the only version of this rather vague story represents him as drawn into the quarrel with great reluctance, as accepting his adversary's challenge most unvillingly, and running him through in a well-meant effort to disarm him. It has to be added that in after-years, in the Tatler and the Spectator, Steele was incessant in his ridicule and denunciation of the duel.

The same year which saw the publication of the Christian Hero witnessed the appearance—on the stage at all events-of Steele's first play, The Funeral, or, Grief a la Mode This was followed in 1703 by The Lying Lover, in 1705 by The Tender Husband, and in 1722 by The Conscious These four comedies, though they do not give Steele a high place among our dramatic authors, render him an important figure in the history of the English stage. In 1697 Jeremy Collier's famous diatribe had given utterance to the general disgust at the indecencies of Wycherley and Congreye, and in the first year of the new century a very salutary reactionsalutary at least so far as concerned the morals of the drama-began to set in In this reaction Steele was a principal agent, and he became, indeed, the founder of that 'Sentimental Comedy' which, in the early Georgian times, supplanted the Restoration comedy of wat and intrigue. true that from the modern standpoint of manners and morals his plays seem anything but faultless, containing, as they do, not only frequent examples of coarseness in language, but also some dubious situations and scenes These, however, are but superficial defects, which no way impair the essential soundness of the morality inculcated by the author or diminish the force of the contrast which his comedies present to their immediate With Steele the patient or deluded predecessors husband is no longer the butt of ridicule, nor do breaches of the marriage tie furnish the material of his plots. On the contrary, his theme is the honourable and futliful love of youths and maidens his heroines, whether sentimental or worldly, are never immodest, his heroes at the worst are only foolish and reckless young sparks, while at the best they tend to be priggish

It is noteworthy that in every one of the four plays the dénouement involves the foiling of some mercenary matrimonial design and the substitution of a true-love match in its stead, and that in two of them the evils of the duel are exposed. The moral purpose is, indeed, only too apparent, and it is not surprising that the Lying Lover was 'damned,' as Steele himself confesses, 'for its piety'. The comic vein is seen mainly in such minor characters as Humphrey Gubbin, a kind of earlier Tony Lumpkin, and Biddy Tipkin, in whom there is a clear suggestion of Sheridan's Lydia Languish.

There are but scanty notices of Steele's life during the time when the first three of his plays were written He himself asserted that his name in 1702 was down in King William's last 'tablebook' for promotion, but the king's death deferred any such advancement for some years. Chemical experiments in search of the philosopher's stone seemed to have consumed some of his time and money, and he is believed to have been one of the earliest members of the Kit-Cat Club he married a Mrs Margaret Stretch, a widow with some West Indian property, who, however, died not long after the marriage. In 1706 the office of Gentleman Waiter to Prince George of Denmark, the consort of Queen Anne, was bestowed upon him, and in May of the next year he obtained the then important post of Gazetteer, or editor of the London Gazette In September 1707 he was married again, this time to a Welsh lady of some fortune, named Mary Scurlock, who plays rather an important part in his biography thence-She was evidently a somewhat peevish and capricious beauty, who delighted in finding fault with her not impeccable liusband, and Steele seems to live led very much the same kind of life with his 'dear Prue,' as he called her, as his hero, the great Duke of Marlborough, had with the terningant Duchess A collection of his letters, written to her both before and after marriage, which was published by Nichols the antiquary in 1787, gives a very intimate revelation of his character It shows him the most affectionate and generous of men, guilty of too frequent convivial excesses, after the manner of the time, 'hopelessly sanguine, restless, and impulsive,' and well nigh as great a spendthrift as Sheridan or Goldsmith In spite of what must have been a fairly good income, he was always in debt, and sometimes in the hands of the bailiffs, but it would seem that Macaulay's picture of him 'dicing himself into a spunging-house and drinking himself into a fever' is somewhat of an exaggeration

It was doubtless partly the journalistic opportunities possessed by Steele in his character of Gazetteer that suggested to him the project of The Tatler, with which the periodical literature of England takes its rise. English journalism, of course, is older than the Tatler by more than half a century, beginning, as it practically does (for one need hardly go back to Nathaniel Butters), with the 'Mercuries'-Mercurius Aulicus, Politi cus Britaniacus, Anti-Britannicus, Pragmaticus, and so on-that came forth in shoals at the out break of the great Civil War. In the reign of Oueen Anne there were in London plenty of newspapers, or rather meagre news sheets, in addition to the official Gazettees, which endea voured to report the politics-and especially the foreign politics-of the day The crized uphol sterer, for example, whom Addison sketched in some of the later issues of the Tatler land his poor brain turned by much speculation on the movements of Marlborough and Prince Eugene and the King of Sweden, as reported in the Postman, the Post-Bos, the Daily Cou rant, the Supplement, and the Inglish Post Besides these there was Defoe's Remen, started in 1704, which may be described as the first of our organs of opinion on politics, giving, as it did, political criticism in addition to have news And, listly, the obliging sheets which undertool, after the example of John Dunton's Athemar Mercury (1690-97), to resolve 'all the most mee and curious questions proposed by the ingenious of either sex, had started that line of journalis tic development which is still continued in the 'answers to correspondents' in provincial weekly newspapers

The Tatler, however, was altogether different from these, and represented a departure which in the end was to issue, not in the modern newspaper, but in the magazine lts descent from the news sheets is shown by the scrips of political tidings which Steele borrowed from the Gazette for its earlier numbers, but its essential purpose from the first was the description and criticism of polite society in London notice prefixed to the opening numbers, Steele describes himself as writing 'for the use of politic persons, who are so publick spirited as to neglect their own affairs to look into transactions of state? Something is to be offered whereby 'such worthy and well affected members of the commonwealth may be instructed, after their reading, what to think,' and there is to be something also 'which may be of entertainment to the fur sex,' in honour of whom the title of the paper is declared to be The contents of the numbers are dated, according to their subjects, from the various social resorts about town 'All accounts of gallantry, pleasure, and entertunment,' for example, are under the article of White's Chocolate-House, Poetry under that of Will's Coffee House, Learn ing under the title of Grecian, Foreign and Domestick News from St James's Coffee-House' This last kind of intelligence was inserted to give solur ballast and actuality to the paper, but, being evidently found superfluous, it was gradually excluded, and the Jather became entirely a description and criticism of the manners and morals of the day

The first number-r double columned folio sheet-oppeared on the 12th of April 170% and its successors came out regularly three times a weel on Fuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturday, at the price of a penny, until the and of I means 1711. They were written in the character of an imaginary Isan Bickerstaff, a hinesofent oll buchelor, a hole name, in the preceding year, had lieen made famous by Swift's employment of r in his mystification of the estrologer Partings. Steele was now on terms of friendship tith Swift, who for about eighteen months had been in London on each rished business, and a fer of the papers in the Intler are from the Vicars A fir more important contributor caustic pen i as Addition, whose assistance was related the by Steele with characteristic and evaggerated generosity. The forty two papers known or be hered to have been written by him court's doubtless, some of the finest thoughts and most finished virting in the Tatler yet Steele spoke rather as a friend than a critic when he said, 'I fired like a distressed prince who calls in a powerful neighbour to his aid. I was undore b my auxiliary, when I had once called him in I could not subsist vithout dependent on here! Other contributors—has only to a ver this is extent-were Congrese Hughes, Ambrose Philips and Harrison. Of the two hundred and errent one numbers, Steele wrote about one hurdred and eights eight himself, and it entitude in cooperation with Addison, and he was editerally responsible, as we should now say, for the vhole

The contents of the Tatler, which were immediately republished in successive volumes as Ine Luculrators of Isate B kerstaff Lsq., we as various as the aspects of the life it professed to describe and criticise. In its numbers a dramatic criticism is followed by an imaginary character sketch of a pair of beauties, a pathetic love story or scene of domestic life is found alongside a gentle sature on fopperies in dress and conversation, a serious discourse on the evils of gaming and duciling is relieved by a picture of some odd frequenter of the coffee houses or the In his self-imposed role of observer and censor of polite society, Mr Bickerstuff takes note of every social foible and vice and humour from the 'nice conduct of a clouded cane' or the exor bitant circumference of a hooped petticoat to the evils of loveless marriages for an establishment, and from the insipid affectations of the visiting day and the noise utterance of responses in church to the arts of the well bred cheat and The treatment of these the brutality of the bully subjects is, is a rule, much less formal and elaborate than in the Spectator, where every paper is a substantive essay, usually on a set theme. In its later days, indeed, the Tatler assumed this form, but its earlier numbers each dealt with three or four subjects, which of course were lightly and never exhaustively handled. As a consequence, while the Spectator has a more solid literary value, the Tatler gives us perhaps the more lively picture of the varied life of the period. Turning over its pages, one can see Betterton in Love for Love, and Wilkes as Sir Harry Wildair, and watch Tom Modely and Will Courtly tapping their snuff-boxes at White's or ogling Chloe and Clarinda in Pall Mall ladies, patched and powdered, trip to and from their sedan-chairs and coaches, the preacher at St Paul's or St Clement Dane's holds forth for or against Dr Sacheverell, at the Grecian the Templars discuss tragedy and epic according to the rules of Aristotle and Bossu, the Mohocks scour the ill-lit streets at night. The bluff country squire amuses the coffee-house by calling for a morning draught of ale and Dyer's newsletter, at the rich man's table the poor parson rises ruefully before the dessert, and in the long stage-coach journey to Bristol or Exeter the travellers are bored and jolted into a state of sullen ennul mitigated only by dread of the highwayman's pistol Through it all, too, there comes an echo of the great events of the time-the tramp of the armies of Marlborough and Vendôme, and the distant thunder of the cannon of Malplaquet and Pultowa.

Steele's share in the Tatler is so marked and preponderant as to have caused the general asso ciation of the paper with his name, and without any disparagement of the invaluable aid given by Addison, it must be owned that the scope and main features of the venture were determined by Steele. To him, for one thing, its strong moral purpose was due. Steele was essentially a preacher, ever bent on the reformation of society, and in the Tatler he set himself not only with energy, but also with much tactical skill, to make assault on the many flagrant corruptions of the age. Conspicuous among his attacks were those on gaming and duelling, of which he says himself, with justifiable complaisance, 'that in spight of all the force of fashion and prejudice, in the face of all the world, I alone bewailed the condition of an English gentleman, whose fortune and life are at this day precarious, while his estate is liable to the demands of gamesters through a false sense of justice, and his life to the demands of duellists through a false sense of honour'

But his best service to morality was rendered in his persistent efforts to ruise the general estimate of women and the level of feminine culture and self respect. Steele's chivalrous regard for women was one of the finest points in his character, and prompted perhaps his best and most famous sentence in eulogy of Aspasia (Lady Elizabeth Hastings), of whom he said in the 49th Tatler that to love her was 'a liberal education' In striving to rectify the position of what he called 'the fair sex,' he struck deep and straight at the worst exils of the day, for undoubtedly the frivolity of fashionable women in the late Stuart period was both cause and effect of the profligacy and brutality of the Rochesters and Sedleys and Mohuns. From the first, Steele made his appeal to women equally with men, and throughout he was never weary of urging on them the duty of acquiring mental culture, of taking a sensible view of life, and acquiring a proper conception of the seriousness and sanctity of marriage. His 'message' on this head is well summarised in a few sentences of the admirable 248th Tatler

'It is with great judignation that I see such crowds of the female world lost to human society, and condemned to a laziness which makes life pass away with less relish than in the hardest labour. Those who are in the quality of gentlewomen should propose to themselves some suitable method of passing away their time. This would furnish them with reflections and sentiments proper for the companions of reasonable men, and prevent the unnatural marriages which happen every day between the most accomplish'd women and the veriest oafs, the worthest men and the most insignificant females. Were the general turn of women's education of another kind than it is at present, we should want one another for more reasons than we do as the world now goes'

It was natural that a man who wrote thus should glorify all cleanly and kindly sentiments, as they are glorified in the Tatler Sometimes indeed, in pathetic pictures of true lovers' woes like the stories of Philander and Chloe (No 94), the sentiment is a trifle maudlin, but in the charming domestic pictures as a rule-in such masterpieces as the account of his father's death (No 181), the description of the family where Mr Bickerstaff visits as an old friend (Nos 95 and 114), and the relation of the little matrimonial jars of Tranquillus and Jenny (No 85)-the pathos and tenderness of Steele are unerring. No man has written more simply and beautifully of the love of husband and wife and parents and children, and of the innocent joys of home.

Of the other features of Steele's work in the Tatler one need only notice the uniform kindliness of siture (it was Steele's creed that every saturist should be a good-natured man), the humour, broader and less refined than Addison's, the negligently easy style so free from sententiousness despite the moral burden of the content, and the justice of the literary and dramatic criticism. Steele, it is true, seldom or never analyses his judgments, and shows nothing that can be called a critical theory, but his judgments themselves are sound, his taste is good. He frankly admires what is admirable, and transcribes it generously for the reader's benefit. Hardly any one of our writers quotes Shakespeare so often

Two months after the Tatler, to the great regret of the town, had been discontinued, there appeared (1st March 1711) the more famous Spectator, which ran until the 6th of December in the next year. It came out every week day, and, like its predecessor, cost a penny until the Stamp Act passed by Harley's Government caused its price to be doubled It was a signal proof of the paper's popularity that it continued to exist, though with a diminished circulation, in spite of a tax which killed most of the journals of the day Its highest circulation seems to have been 14,000 copies, and even after the half penny tax had been laid on, 10,000 copies of it were sold on an average The honours of the Spectator have every day fallen mainly to Addison, yet Steele's part in it was far from unimportant Of the 555 numbers, 236 (signed with the letter R or T) were written by him, as against Addison's 274 Among the other contributors were Ambrose Philips (who signs  $\lambda$ ), Pope (whose Messiah appeared in No 378), Hughes, Tickell, Parnell, and Eusden Steele, it should be added, had no hand in Addison's brief reunal of the Spectator in June 1714

The idea of the Spectator's Club, which is described in the second number, was Steele's invention, and from him consequently came not only the pictures of Sir Andrew Freeport, Will Honeycomb, and Captum Sentry, but also the first sketch of Sir Roger de Coverley, which was afterwards developed in the immortal series of papers forming Addison's masterpiece To Steele also belong one or two of the most pleasing papers ordinarily reckoned in that series, containing (Nos 113 and 118) the account of Sir Roger's hopeless passion for the widow, and to him, according to the best critical opinion, must not be attributed the degradation of the knight's character by showing him in an adventure with a woman of the town The well-known tale of Inkle and Yarreo, one of the oftenest-quoted examples of Steele's pathos, is to be found in the Spectator (No 11), and there also, as first-rate specimens of his humour, criticism, and satire, we may instance the amusing narrative of the stage couch journey with the Quaker and the brisk captain (No. 132), the account of Raphael's cartoons (Nos 226 and 244), and the peculiarly vigorous and plain spoken attack (No 51) on the grossness of the stage. The steady moral purpose which had guided the Tatler is maintained in numerous papers on the evils of profaneness, profligacy, female frivolity, and even the blessedness of keeping out of debt. Poor Steele always preached much better than he practised, and it can well be believed that there was some truth in the ingenuous confession with which he closed the Tatler, that as 'severity of manners was absolutely necessary for him who would censure others,' the purpose of the paper was 'wholly lost' by his 'being so long understood as the author'

To the Spectator, on the 12th of March 1713, succeeded the comparatively short-lived Guardian, the last of the three great periodicals of Queen Anne's reign. It also appeared daily at the price of a penny, running till the 1st of October in the same year Nearly half the papers were by Steele, rather less than a third by Addison, and most of the rest by Dr George (afterwards Bishop) Berkeley The place of Isaac Bickerstaff and Mr Spectator is here taken by an equally imaginary Nestor Ironside, and the reader at the outset is informed that his chief entertainment will arise from what passes at the ten-table of My Lady Lizard, to whose family Mr Ironside stands in loco parentis Briefly, the Guardian may be described as showing, with an inevitable lack of freshiness, the same kind of contents and qualities as had made the fortune of its predecessor. The introduction of party politics spoiled it for its own day and for posterity. Always a very militant Whig, Steele had allowed hits at the Tories even in the Tatler, and Swift, when ratting to the side of Harley and St John in 1712, grumbled that he had been 'mighty impertment of late in his Speciators' The greath intensified rage of faction in the last years of Queen Anne had its effect on the Guardian, which was often little better than a party pamphlet.

In politics, indeed, Steele had become ever more and more deeply engaged during those storms years which saw the downfall of Godolphin and Marlborough, the administration of Oxford and Bolingbroke, and the ending of the great war by the Peace of Utrecht. The dismissal of the Whigs had deprived him of his post of Gazetteer, but not of the commissionership of stamps which had been bestowed on him in 1710, and which he retained till 1713. His gradual breach with Swift, who in the former of these years had turned pamphleteer on the Tory side, is traceable in the Journal to Stella, which contains some graphic and caustic notices of his character and habits governed by his wife,' we read, 'most abominably I never saw her since I came, nor has he ever made me an invitation, either he does not, or is such a thoughtless Iisdall fellow that he never minds it. So what care I for his wit? for he is the worst company in the world till he has a bottle of wine in his head' 'Once, when he was to have made one of a tavern party,' we are told that he 'came not, nor never did twice, since I knew him, to any appointment' In 1713 the Guardian brought the two into open paper-warfare, Swift attacking Steele in the Examiner and also in a tract called The Importance of the Guardian con sidered When the Guardian came to an end, Steele carried on his campaign against the Govern ment in its successor, The Englishman (October 1713-February 1714), memorable only because its twenty-sixth number contains the account of Alexander Selkirk which is supposed to have given Defoe the hint for Robinson Crusoe January 1714 Steele published the pumphlet en titled The Crisis, and followed it up with The Lover and The Reader, two polemical periodicals which had the very shortest life The climas was reached in his election to the Parliament of 1714, and his almost instant expulsion by a vote of the House of Commons on the 12th of March for 'seditious' paragraphs in the Crisis and the Englishman Addison prompted him in the three hours' speech of 'great temper, modesty, and unconcern' which he made in his defence, and Stanhope and Walpole were among his supporters, but the Tory majority were resolved, after the fashion of the day, to have their revenge on the leading Whig pamphleteer. The persecution had one good result in the publication of the Apology for Himself and his Writings (October 1714), which contains many interesting biographical details

In a very few months, however, came a turn of the wheel of political fortune. The accession of George I brought the Whigs again to the top, and with them, of course, rose Steele By the goodwill of the actors, who gratefully remembered his Tatler criticisms, he became a patentee and manager of Drury Lane Theatrc, with a substantial share of the profits In the beginning of 1715 he entered Parliament again, and in April of the same year he was knighted Soon afterwards a place was found for him on the commission for inquiring into the estates forfeited by the rebels of 1715, and this appointment necessitated a journey to Edinburgh in 1718, when he was welcomed in verse by Allan Ramsay and Alexander Pennecuik. His literary activity was maintained in a new volume of the Englishman (1715) and one or two other ephemeral periodicals-Town Talk, Tea-Table, Chit-Chat-in that and the next year

Steele's Yet withil, prosperity was not secured thriftless habits and his proneness to speculation, manifested conspicuously in a luckless project for the carriage of live fish by sea, kept him in his normal state of impecuniosity and debt. But there were worse misfortunes still. 'Dear Prue' died in 1718, and next year came the end of that friendship with Addison of which he had boasted so often with a touching humility and generosity that are among the best proofs of his real excellence of Addison's decorous instincts must often character have been shocked by Steele's prodigality, and there seems no reason to doubt the well-known story which represents him reclaiming a loan by means of an execution on his friend, to teach him a lesson in frugality-1 lesson which is said to have been accepted with perfect good humour, but of course without any good result. The quarrel, however, was not about money, but politics, for the two friends differed, and proceeded to a paper-war on the question of Stanhope's Peerage Bill Steele attacked the bill in the Plebeian, Addison replied with acrimony in the Old 117ug, and the two were still unreconciled when Addison died in June 1719 Steele lived ten years longer, publishing The Theatre, another short lived periodical, in 1720, and, after one or two promplilets, his fourth play, The Conscious Loters, in 1722 Another play was announced but never completed, although a few fragments of it have been preserved

Steele's debts seem to have so accumulated as to make it prudent for him to leave London, whether for fear of duns or desire of retrenchment and repayment, and apparently he did not return to the capital after 1723. His last years were spent partly at Hereford, where his friend Hoadly was bishop, and partly at Carmarthen, where 'Prues' Stricken by paralysis, he suffered property lay partial loss of mind, and at Carmarthen, on 1st September 1729, he died. It is said that 'he retained his cheerful sweetness of temper to the last, and would often be carried out in a summer's evening, where the country lads and lasses were assembled at their rural sports, and with his pencil write an order for a new gown to the best dancer' -surely no unfitting final glimpse of the kindliest sentimentalist in our literature

Love Grief, and Death

The first sense of sorrow I ever knew was upon the death of my father, at which time I was not omite five years of age, but was rather amazed at what all the house meant, than possessed with a real understanding why nobody was willing to play with me I remember I went into the room where his body lay, and my mother sat weeping alone by it. I had my battledoor in my liand, and fell a beating the coffin, and calling 'Papa,' for I know not how I had some slight idea that he was locked up there. My mother catched me in her arms, and transported beyond all patience of the silent grief she was before in, she almost smothered me in her embrace. and told me, in a flood of tears, papa could not hear me. and would play with me no more, for they were going to put him under ground, whence he could never come to us again. She was a very beautiful woman, of a noble spirit, and there was a dignity in her grief amidst all the wildness of her transport, which methought struck me with an instinct of sorrow, which, before I was sensible what it was to grieve, seized my very soul, and has made pity the weakness of my heart ever since The mind in infancy is, methinks, like the body in embryo, and receives impressions so forcible that they are as hard to be removed by reason as any mark with which a child is born is to be taken away by any future application (From The Tutler, No. 181 )

Agreeable Companions and Flatterers.

An old acquaintance who met me this morning seemed overjoyed to see me, and told me I looked as well as he had known me do these forty years, but, continued he, not quite the man you were when we visited together at Lady Brightly's Oh! Isaac, those days are over. Do you think there are any such fine creatures now living as we then conversed with? He went on with a thousand incoherent circumstances, which, in his imagination, must needs please me but they had the quite contrary effect. The flattery with which he began, in telling me how well I wore, was not disagreeable, but his indiscreet mention of a set of acquaintance we had outlived, recalled ten thousand things to my memory, which made me reflect upon my present condition with regret. Had he indeed been so kind as, after a long obsence, to felicitate me upon an indolent and easy old age, and mentioned how much he and I had to thank for, who at our time of day could walk firmly, eat hearthly, and converse cheerfully, he had kept np my pleasure in myself But of all man kind, there are none so shocking as these injudicious They ordinarily begin upon something eivil people that they know must be a satisfaction, but then, for fear of the imputation of flattery, they follow it with the last thing in the world of which you would be reminded. It is this that perplexes eivil persons reason that there is such a general outers among us against flatterers is, that there are so very few good ones It is the nicest art in this life, and is a part of eloquence which does not want the preparation that is necessary to all other parts of it, that your audience should be your well wishers, for praise from an enemy is the most pleasing of all commendations.

It is generally to be observed, that the person most agreeable to a man for a constancy, is he that his no shining qualities, but is a certain degree above great imperfections, whom he can live with as his inferior, and who will either overlook or not observe his little Such an easy companion as this, either now and then throws out a little flattery, or lets a man silently flatter himself in his superiority to him. If you take notice, there is hardly a rich man in the world who has not such a led friend of small consideration, who is a darling for his insignificancy. It is a great ease to have one in our own shape a species below us, and who, without being listed in our service, is by nature of our retinue. These dependents are of excellent use on a runy day, or when a man has not a mind to dress, or to evelude solitude, when one has neither a mind to that There are of this good natured order nor to company who are so kind as to divide themselves, and do these good offices to many Five or six of them visit a whole quarter of the town, and exclude the spleen, without fees, from the families they frequent. If they do not prescribe physic, they can be company when you take it. Very great benefactors to the rieli, or those whom they call people at their ease, are your persons of no consequence. I have known some of them, by the help of a little cunning, make delieious flatterers. They know the course of the town, and the general characters of persons, by this means they will sometimes tell the most agreeable falsehoods imaginable They will acquaint you that such an one of a quite contrary party said, that though you were engaged in different interests, yet he had the greatest respect for your good sense and address. When one of these has a little eunning, he passes his time in the utmost satisfaction to himself and his friends, for his position is never to report or speak a displeasing thing to his friend As for letting him go on in an error, he knows advice against them is the office of persons of greater talents and less discretion

The Latin word for a flatterer (assentator) implies no more than a person that barely consents, and indeed such an one, if a man were able to purchase or maintain him, cannot be bought too dear. Such a one never con tradicts you, but gains upon you, not by a fulsome way of commending you in broad terms, but liking whatever you propose or utter, at the same time is ready to beg your pardon, and gainsay you if you chance to speak ill of yonrself. An old lady is very seldom without such a companion as this, who can recite the names of all her lovers, and the matches refused by her in the days when she minded such vinities—as she is pleased to call them, though she so much approves the mention of them. It is to be noted, that a woman's flatterer is generally elder than herself, her years serving at once to recommend her patroness's age, and to add weight to her complaisance in all other particulars.

We gentlemen of small fortunes are extremely neces sitous in this particular. I have indeed one who smokes with me often, but his parts are so low, that all the meense he does me is to fill his pipe vith me, and to be out at just as many whiffs as I take. This is all the praise or assent that he is capable of, jet there are more hours when I would rather be in his company than that of the brightest man I know. It would be an hard matter to give an account of this inclination to be flattered, but if we go to the bottom of it, we shall find that the pleasure in it is something lile that of receiving money which lav out. Every man thinks he lins an estate of reputation, and is glad to see one that will bring any of it home to him, it is no matter how dirty a bag it is conveyed to him in, or by how clownish a messenger, so the money is good. All that we want to be pleased with flattery, is to believe that the man is sincere who gives it us. It is by this one accident that absurd creatures often outrun the most slilful in this Their want of ability is here an advantage, and their bluntness, as it is the seeming effect of sinecrity, is the best cover to artifice

It is, indeed, the greatest of injuries to flatter any but the unhappy, or such as are displeased with themselves for some infirmity. In this latter case we have a member of our club, that, when Sir Jeffrey falls asleep, wakens him with snoring. This makes Sir Jeffrey hold up for some moments the longer, to see there are men younger than himself among us, who are more lethargic than he is

When flattery is practised upon any other consideration, it is the most abject thing in nature, nay, I cannot thinl of any character below the flatterer, except he that envies him. You meet with fellows prepared to be as mean as possible in their condescensions and expressions, but they want persons and talents to rise up to such a baseness. As a coxeomb is a fool of parts, so a flatterer is a knave of parts.

The best of this order that I know is one who disguises it under a spirit of contradiction or reproof. He told an arrant driveller the other day, that he did not care for being in company with him, because he heard he turned his absent friends into ridicule. And upon Lady Autumn's disputing with him about something that happened at the Revolution, he replied with a very angry tone 'Pray, midam, give me leave to know more of a thing in which I was actually concerned, than you who were then in your nurse's arms'

Quack Advertisements

It gives me much despair in the design of reforming the world by my speculations, when I find there always arise, from one generation to another, successive cheats and bubbles, as naturally as beasts of prey and those which are to be their food. There is hardly a man in the world, one would think, so ignorant as not to know that the ordinary quack doctors, who publish their abilities in little brown billets, distributed to all who pass by, are to a man impostors and minderers, yet such is the credulity of the vulgar, and the impudence of these professors, that the affair still goes on, and new promises of what was never done before are made every day. What aggravates the jest is, that even this promise has been made as long as the memory of man can trace it, and yet nothing performed, and yet still prevails

There is something unaccountably taking among the vulgar in those who come from a great way off. Ignorant people of quality, as many there are of such, dote excessively this way, many instances of which every man will suggest to himself, without my enumeration of them. The ignorants of lower order, who cannot, like the upper ones, be profuse of their money to those recommended by coming from a distance, are no less complaisant than the others, for they venture their lives for the same admiration.

'The doctor is lately come from his travels, and has practised both by sea and land, and therefore cures the green sickness, long sea voyages, and campaigns, and lying in.' Both by sea and land! I will not answer for the distempers called 'sea voyages, and campaigns,' but I daresay those of green sickness and lying in might be as well talen care of if the doctor stayed ashore. But the art of managing mankind is only to make them stare a little to keep up their astonishment, to let nothing be familiar to them, but ever to have something in their sleeve, in which they must think you are deeper than they are. There is an ingenious fellow, a barber, of my acquaintance, who, besides his broken fiddle and a dried sea monster, has a twine cord, strained with two nails at each end, over his window, and the words 'runn, dry, wet,' and so forth, written to denote the weather, according to the rising or falling of the cord. We very great scholars are not apt to wonder at this, but I observed a very honest felloy, a chance customer, who sat in the chair before me to be shaved, fix his eye upon this miraculous performance during the operation upon his chin and face. When those and his head also were cleared of all incumbrances and excrescences, he looked at the fish, then at the fiddle, still grubling in his pockets, and casting his eye again at the twine, and the v ords writ on each side, then altered his mind as to farthings, and gave my friend a silver sixpence. The business, as I said, is to keep up the amazement, and if my friend had had only the skelcton and kit, he must have been contented with a less payment There is a doctor in Mouse Alley, near Wapping, who sets up for curing cataracts upon the credit of having, as his bill sets forth, lost an eve in the emperor's service. His patients come in upon this, and he shows his muster roll, which confirms that he was in his imperial majesty's troops, and he puts out their eyes with great success. Who would believe that a man should be a doctor for the cure of bursten children, by declaring that his father and grand father were born bursten? But Charles Ingoltson, next door to the Harp in Barbican, has made a pretty penny by that asseveration The generality go upon their first conception, and think no further, all the rest is granted They take it that there is something uncommon in you, and give you credit for the rest. You may be sure it is upon that I go, when sometimes, let it be to the purpose or not I keep a Latin centence in my front, and I was not a little pleased when I observed one of my readers say, casting his eye on my twentieth paper, 'More Latin still? What a prodigious scholar is this man! Int as I

I have here taken much liberty with this learned doctor, I must make up all I have said by repeating what he seems to be in earnest in, and honestly promise to those who will not receive lum as a great man, to wit, 'That from eight to twelve, and from two till six, he attends for the good of the public to bleed for threepence'

Story-telling

I have often thought that a story teller is born, as well as a poet. It is, I think, certain that some men have such a peculiar cast of mind, that they see things in another light than men of grave dispositions. of a lively imagination and a mirthful temper will repre sent things to their hearers in the same manner as they themselves were affected with them, and whereas serious spirits might perhaps have been disgusted at the sight of some odd occurrences in life, yet the very same occurrences shall please them in a well told story, where the disagreeable parts of the images are concealed, and those only which are pleasing exhibited to the fancy Story telling is therefore not an art, but what we call a 'knack,' it doth not so much subsist upon wit as upon humour, and I will add, that it is not perfect without proper gesticulations of the body, which naturally attend such merry emotions of the mind I know very well that a certain gravity of countenance sets some stories off to advantage, where the hearer is to be surprised in the end But this is by no means a general rule, for it is frequently convenient to aid and assist by cheerful looks and whimsical agitations. I vill go yet further, and affirm that the success of a story very often depends upon the make of the body, and formation of the features, of him who relates it. I have been of this opinion ever since I criticised upon the chin of Dick Dewlap I very often had the weakness to repine at the prosperity of his conceits, which made him pass for a wit with the widow at the coffee house, and the ordinary mechanics that frequent it, nor could I myself forbear laughing at them most heartily, though upon examina tion I thought most of them very flat and insipid. I found, after some time, that the ment of his wit was founded upon the shaking of a fat paunch, and the toss ing up of a pair of rosy jowls. Poor Dick had a fit of sickness, which robbed him of his fat and his fame at once, and it was full three months before he regained his reputation, which rose in proportion to his floridity He is now very jolly and ingenious, and hath a good constitution for wit

Those v ho are thus adorned with the gifts of nature, are apt to show their parts with too much ostentation I would therefore advise all the professors of this art never to tell stories but as they seem to grow out of the subject matter of the conversation, or as they serve to illustrate or enliven it. Stories that are very common are generally irl some, but may be aptly introduced, provided they be only hinted at, and mentioned by way of allusion Those that are altogether new should never be ushered in without a short and pertinent character of the chief persons concerned, because, by that means, you make the company acquainted with them, and it is a certain rule, that slight and trivial accounts of those who are familiar to us ad minister more mirth than the brightest points of wit in unknown characters A little circumstance in the com plexion of dress of the man you are talling of sets his image before the hearer, if it be chosen aptly for the Thus, I remember Tom Lizard, after having made his sisters merry with an account of a formal old man's way of complimenting, owned very frankly that his story would not have been worth one farthing if he had made the hat of him whom he represented one inch narrower Besides the marking distinct characters, and selecting pertinent circumstances, it is likewise neces sary to leave off in time, and end smartly, so that there is a kind of drama in the forming of a story, and the manner of conducting and pointing it is the same as in an epigram. It is a miscrible thing, after one hath raised the expectation of the company by humorous characters and a pretty concert, to pursue the matter too far There is no retreating, and how poor is it for a story teller to end his relation by saying, 'That's all!' # A Domestic Scene

There are several persons who have many pleasures and entertainments in their possession which they do not enjoy. It is therefore a kind and good office to acquaint them with their own happiness, and turn their attention to such instances of their good fortune which they are apt to overlook. Persons in the married state often want such a monitor, and pine away their days by looking upon the same condition in anguish and murmur, which carries with it in the opinion of others a complication of all the pleasures of life, and a retreat from its inquietudes.

I am led into this thought by a visit I made an old friend, who was formerly my school fellow. He came to town last week with his family for the winter, and vesterday morning sent me word his wife expected me I am as it were at home at that house, and every member of it knows me for their well wisher cannot indeed express the pleasure it is to be met by the children with so much joy as I am when I go thither The boys and girls strive who shall come first, when they think it is I that am knocking at the door, and that child which loses the race to me runs back again to tell the father it is Mr Bickerstaff This day I was led in by a pretty girl that we all thought must have forgot me, for the family has been out of town these two years Her I nowing me again was a mighty subject with us, and took up our discourse at the first entrance which, they hegan to rally me upon a thousand little stories they heard in the country, about my marriage to one of my neighbour's daughters upon which the gentleman, my friend, said, 'Nay, if Mr Bickerstaff marries a child of any of his old companions, I hope mine shall have the preference, there is Mrs Mary is now sixteen, and would make him as fine a widow as the best of them but I know him too well, he is so enamoured with the very memory of those who flourished in our youth, that he will not so much as look upon the modern beauties. I remember, old gentleman, how often you went home in a day to refresh your countenance and dress, when Teraminta reigned in your As we came up in the coach, I repeated to my wife some of your verses on her ' With such reflections on little passages which happened long ago, we passed our time during a cheerful and elegant meal. dunner his lady left the room, as did also the children As soon as we were alone, he took me by the hand, Well, my good friend, says he, I am heartily glad to see thee, I was afraid you would never have seen all the company that dined with you to-day again. Do not you think the good woman of the house a little altered since you followed her from the playhouse, to find out who she was for me? I perceived a tear fall down his cheek as he spoke, which moved me not a little. But to turn the discourse, said I, she is not indeed quite that ereature she was when she returned me the letter I carried from you, and told me she hoped, as I was a gentleman, I would be employed no more to trouble her, who had never offended me, but would be so much the gentleman's friend as to dissuade him from a pursuit which he could never succeed in You may remember, I thought her in earnest, and you were forced to employ your cousin Will, who made his sister get acquainted with her for you. You cannot expect her to Fifteen 1 replied my good friend be for ever fifteen Ah! you little understand, you that have lived a bachelor, how great, how exquisite a pleasure there is in being really beloved! It is impossible that the most beauteous face in nature should raise in me such pleasing ideas as when I look upon that excellent woman That fading in her countenance is chiefly caused by her watching with me in my fever. This was followed by a fit of siekness, which had like to have carried her off last winter I tell you sincerely, I have so many obligations to her that I cannot with any sort of moderation think of her present state of health. But as to what you say of fifteen, she gives me every day pleasures beyond what I ever knew in the possession of her beauty, when I was in the vigour of youth - Livery moment of her life hings me fresh instances of her complacency to my inclinations, and her prindence in regard to my fortune. Her face is to me much more beautiful than when I first saw it, there is no decry in any feature, which I cannot trace from the very instant it was occasioned by some anxious concern for my welfare and interests. Thus at the same time, methinks, the love I conceived towards her for what she was, is heightened by my gratitude for what she is-The love of a wife is as much above the idle passion commonly called by that name, as the loud laughter of buffoons is inferior to the elegant mirth of gentlemen Oh! she is an inestimable jewel. In her examination of her household affairs, she shews a certain fearfulness to find a fault, which makes her servants obey her like ehildren, and the meanest we have has an ingenuous shame for an offence, not always to be seen in children in other families. I speak freely to you, my old friend, ever since her sickness, things that give me the quickest joy before, turn now to a certain anxiety. As the chil dren play in the next room, I know the poor things by their steps, and am considering what they must do should they lose their mother in their tender years. The pleasure I used to take in telling my boy stories of buttles, and asking my girl questions about disposal of her baby [doll], and the gossiping of it, is turned into inward reflection and melancholy

He would have gone on in this tender way, when the good lady entered, and with an inexpressible sweetness in her countenance told us she had been searching her closet for something very good, to treat such an old friend as I was. Her husband's eyes sparkled with pleasure at the chearfulness of her countenance, and I saw all his fears vanish in an instant. The lady observing something in our looks which shewed we had been more serious than ordinary, and seeing her husband receive her with great concern under a forced chearfulness, im mediately guessed at what we had been talking of, and applying herself to me, said, with a smile. Mr Bickerstaff, do not believe a word of what he tells you, I shall still live to have you for my second, as I have often promised you, unless he takes more care of himself than he has done since his coming to town You must know, he tells me that he finds London is a much more healthy place than the country, for he sees several of his old acquaintance and school fellows are here young fellows with fair full bottomed periwigs. I could scarce keep him this morning from going out open breasted. Ms friend, who is always extremely delighted with her agreeable humour, made her sit down with us did it with that easiness which is peculiar to women of sense, and to keep up the good humour she had brought in with her, turned her raillery upon me Mr Bickerstaff, you remember you followed me one night from the play house, suppose you should carry me thither to morrow night, and lead me into the front box This put as into a long field of discourse about the beauties who were mothers to the present, and shined in the boxes twenty years ago I told her I was glad she had trans ferred so many of her charms, and I did not question hut her eldest daughter was within half a year of being a Toast.

We were pleasing ourselves with this fantastical pre ferment of the young lady, when on a sudden we were alarmed with the noise of a drum, and immediately entered my little godson to give me a point of war mother, between laughing and chiding, would have put him out of the room, but I would not part with him so I found upon conversation with him, though he was a little noisy in his mirth, that the child had excellent parts, and was a great master of all the learning on the other side eight years old. I perceived him a very great lustorian in Asop's Tables but he frank ly declared to me his mind, that he did not delight in that learning, because he did not believe they were true, for which reason I found he had very much turned his studies, for about a twelve month past, into the lives and adventures of Don Bellianis of Greece, Gny of Warwick, the Seven Champions, and other historians of that age I could not but observe the satisfaction the father took in the forwardness of his son, and that these diversions might turn to some profit, I found the boy had made remarks, which might be of service to him during the course of his whole life He would tell you the mismanagements of John Hickathrift, find fault with the passionate temper in Bevis of Southampton, and loved Saint George for being the champion of England, and by this means had his thoughts insensibly moulded into the notions of dis cretion, virtue, and honour I was extolling his accomplishments, when the mother told me that the little girl who led me in this morning was in her way a better scholar than he Betty, says she, deals chiefly in fairies and sprights, and sometimes in a winter night will terrify the maids with her accounts, until they are afraid to go up to bed.

I sat with them until it was very late, sometimes in merry, sometimes in serious disconrise, with this particular pleasure, which gives the only true relish to all con versation, a sense that every one of us liked each other. I went home considering the different conditions of a married life and that of a bachelor, and I must confess it struck me with a secret concern, to reflect that when ever I go off, I shall leave no traces behind me. In this pensive mood I returned to my family, that is to say, to my maid, my dog, and my eat, who only can be the better or worse for what happens to me.

Inkle and Yarico

I was the other day amusing myself with Ligon's account of Barbadoes, and in answer to your well wrought tale, I will give you (as it dwells upon my memory) out of that honest traveller, in his fifty fifth page, the history of Inkle and Yarico

Mr Thomas Inkle, of London, aged twenty years, embarked in the Downs on the good ship called the Achilles, bound for the West Indies, on the 16th of June, 1647, in order to improve his fortune by trade and merchandise. Our adventurer was the third son of an eminent citizen, who had taken particular care to instil into his mind an early love of gain, by making him a perfect master of numbers, and consequently giving him a quick view of loss and advantage, and preventing the natural impulses of his passions, by prepossession towards his interests. With a mind thus turned, young Inkle had a person every way agreeable, a ruddy vigonr in his countenance, strength in his limbs, with ringlets of fair hair loosely flowing on his shoulders It happened, in the course of the voyage, that the Achilles, in some distress, put into a creek on the main of America, in search of provisions. The youth, who is the hero of my story, among others went ashore on this occasion. From their first landing they were observed by a party of Indians, who hid themselves in the woods for that purpose. The English unadvisedly marched a great distance from the shore into the country, and were intercepted by the natives, who slew the greatest number of them Our adventurer escaped among others, by flying into a forest. Upon his coming into a remote and pathless part of the wood, he threw himself, tired and breathless, on a little hillock, when an Indian maid rushed from a thicket behind him After the first sur prize, they appeared mutually agreeable to each other If the Luropean was highly charmed with the limbs, features, and wild graces of the naked American, the American was no less taken with the dress, complexion, and shape of an European, covered from head to foot. The Indian grew immediately enamoured of him, and consequently solicitous for his preservation. She there fore conveyed him to a cave, where she gave him a delicious repast of fruits, and led him to a stream to slake his thirt. In the midst of these good offices, she would sometimes play with his hair, and delight in the opposition of its colour to that of her fingers, then open his bosom, then laugh at him for covering it. She was, it seems, a person of distinction, for she every day came to him in a different dress, of the most beautiful shells, bugles, and bredes [braids]. She lil ewise brought lum a great many spoils, which her other lovers had presented to her, so that his cave was richly adorned with all the spotted skins of beasts, and most party coloured feathers of fowls, which that world afforded. To make his confinement more tolerable, she would carry him in the dusk of the evening, or by the favour of the moon light, to unfrequented groves and solitudes, and slien him where to lie down in safety, and sleep amidst the falls of waters and melody of nightingales. Her part was to watch and hold him awake in her arms, for fear of her countrymen, and awake hun on occasions to consult his safety. In this manner did the lovers pass away their time, till they had learned a language of their own, in which the voyager communicated to his mistress how happy he should be to have her in his own country, where she should be clothed in such silks as his waistcoat was made of, and be carried in houses drawn by horses, without being exposed to wind and weather. All this he promised her the enjoyment of, without such fears and alarms as they were tormented with. In this tender correspondence these lovers lived for several months, when I arico, instructed by her lover, discovered a vessel on the coast, to which she made signals, and in the night, with the utmost joy and satisfretion, accompanied him to a ship's erew of his countrymen, bound for When a vessel from the main arrives in Barbadoes that island, it seems the planters come down to the shore, where there is an immediate market of the Indians and other slaves, as with us of horses and oven

To be short, Mr Thomas Inkle, now coming into English territories, began seriously to reflect upon his loss of time, and to weigh with himself how many days interest of his money he had lost during his stay with Yarico. This thought made the young man very pen sive, and careful what account he should he able to give his friends of his voyage. Upon which consideration, the prudent and frugal young man sold Yarico to a Barbadian merchant, notwithstanding the poor girl, to commiserate her condition, told him that she was with child hy him, but he only made use of that information to rise in his demands upon the purchaser.

(From the Spectator, No. 11)

Richard Ligon, a London Royalist merchant ruined by the Civil War, undertook at sixty to begin life nnew in the West Indies, sailed to Barbadoes in 1647, and, driven home by ill health in three Years, was by his creditors clapped in prison, where he wrote his History of the Barbadoes (1657) new ed 1673). There Steele (who had financial interests in the West Indies, through his wife) found the bones of poor Yarico's story but the novelette is mainly Steele's own creation Inkle (named from an old word for a kind of tape) is entirely his invention, and is unkindly made to sail by the ship Ligon was passenger on, it was Steele also, not Ligon, who dis covered nightingales in Barbadoes! From the Spectator the story found its way into such compilations as Knox's Elegant Extracts and Masson's Collection, where Burns I new it ere he had the chance of seeing at Damfries in 1794 the 'opera or musical comedy of Inkle and Yarico, by George Colman the younger In the Spectator form the tale attracted notice on the Continent also was retold in German by Gellert, by Bodmer, and by Gessner und had its share in securing a victory for the Swiss or Natural school over the Leipzig school of French sympathies and formal standards

The Quaker in the Stage-coach

Having notified to my good friend Sir Roger that I should set out for London the next day, his horses were ready at the appointed hour in the evening, and attended by one of his grooms, I arrived at the county town at twilight, in order to be ready for the stage coach the day following As soon as we arrived at the inn, the servant, who waited upon me, inquired of the chamberlain in my hearing what company he had for the coach? The fellow answered, Mrs Betty Arable the great fortune, and the widow her mother, a recruiting officer, who took a place because they were to go, young Squire Quickset her cousin, that her mother wished her to be marned to, Ephrum the quaker, her guardian, and a gentle man that had studied himself dumb from Sir Roger de Coverley's. I observed by what he said of myself, that according to his office he dealt much in intelligence, and doubted not but there was some foundation for his reports of the rest of the company, as well as for the whimsical account he gave of me. The next morning at day break we were all called, and I, who I now my own natural shyness, and endeavour to be as little liable to be disputed with as possible, dressed immediately, that I might make no one wait. The first preparation for our setting out was, that the captain's half pike was placed near the conchman, and a drum behind the coach. In the mean time the drimmer, the captain's equipage, was very loud that none of the captain's things should be placed so as to be spoiled, upon which his cloke bag was fixed in the seat of the coach and the captain him self, according to a frequent though invidious behaviour of military men, ordered his man to look sharp, that none but one of the ladies should have the place he had taken fronting the coach box

We were in some little time fixed in our seats, and sat with that dislike which people not too good natured usually conceive of each other at first sight The coach jumbled us insensibly into some sort of familiarity and we lind not moved above two miles, when the widow asked the captain what success he had in his recruiting? The officer, with a frankness he believed very graceful, told her, 'that indeed he had but very little luck, and had suffered much by desertion, therefore should be glad to end his warfare in the service of her or her fair daughter In a word, continued he, I am a soldier, and to be plain is my character vou see me, madani, young sound, and impudent, take me vourself, widow, or give me to her, I will be wholly at your dispo al. I am a soldier of fortune, ha!' This was followed by a vain laugh of his own, and a deep silence of all the rest of the company I had nothing left for it but to fall fast asleep, which I did with all speed 'Come, sud he, resolve upon it, we will make a wedding at the next town we will awake this pleasant companion who is fallen asleep, to be the bride man, and, giving the quaker a clap on the knee, he concluded, 'This sly saint, who, I will warrant, understands what is what as well as you or I, widow, shall give the bride as father ' The quaker, who happened to be a man of smartness, answered, 'Friend, I take it in good part that thou hast given me the authority of a fither over this comely and virtuous child, and I must assure thee, that if I have the giving her, I shall not bestow her on thee Thy mirth, friend, savoureth of folly—thon art a person of a light mind, thy drum is a type of thee, it soundeth because it is emply Verily, it is not from thy fulness, but thy emptiness that thou hast spoken this day. Friend, friend, we have hired this coach in partnership with thee, to carry us to the great city, we cannot go any other way worthy mother must hear thee if thou wilt needs utter thy follies, we cannot help it, friend, I say if thou wilt, we must hear thee, but if thou wert a man of understanding, thou wouldst not take advantage of thy courageous countenance to abash us children of peace Thou art, thou sayest, a soldier, give quarter to us, who cannot resist thee. Why didst thou fleer at our friend, who feigned himself asleep? he said nothing, but how dost thou know what he contuneth? If thou speakest improper things in the hearing of this virtuous young virgin, consider it as an outrige against a distressed person that cannot get from thee to speak indiscrectly what we are obliged to hear, by being hasped up with thee in this public vehicle, is in some degree assaulting on the high road '

Here Ephraim paused, and the captam with an happy and uncommon impudence, which can be convicted and support itself at the same time, cries, 'Faith, friend, I thank thee, I should have been a little impertment if thou hadst not reprimanded me. Come, thon art, I see, a smoky [knowing] old fellow, and I will be very orderly the ensuing part of my journey—I was going to give myself airs, but, ladies, I beg pardon'

The captain was so little out of humour, and our company was so far from being soured by this little ruffle, that Ephraim and he took a particular delight in being agreeable to each other for the future, and assumed their different provinces in the conduct of the company Our reckonings, apartments, and accommodation fell under Ephraim, and the captain looked to all disputes on the road, as the good behaviour of our coachman, and the right we had of taking place as going to London of all vehicles coming from thence. The occurrences we met with were ordinary, and very little happened which could entertain by the relation of them, but when I considered the company we were in, I took it for no small good fortune that the whole journey was not spent in impertiuences, which to the one part of us might be an entertainment, to the other a suffering. What there fore Ephraim said when we were almost arrived at London, had to me an air not only of good understanding but good breeding. Upon the young lady's expressing her satisfaction in the journey, and declaring how delight ful it had been to her, Ephraim delivered himself as follows 'There is no ordinary part of human life which expresseth so much a good mind, and a right inward man, as his behaviour upon meeting with strangers, especially such as may seem the most unsuitable com panions to him such a man, when he falleth in the way with persons of simplicity and innocence, however know ing he may be in the ways of men, will not vaunt him self thereof, but will the rather hide his superiority to them, that he may not be painful unto them. My good friend, continued he, turning to the officer, thee and I are to part by and by, and peradventure we may never meet again but be advised by a plain man, modes and apparel are but trifles to the real man, therefore do not think such a man as thyself terrible for thy garb, nor such a one as me contemptible for mine. When two such as thee and I meet with affections as we ought to have towards each other, thou shouldst rejoice to see my peaceful demeanour, and I should be glad to see thy strength and ability to protect me in it?

(From The Spectator, No 132.)

There are biographies of Steele by Austin Dobson (1886) and G. A. Aitken (1883), the latter of whom has also published an edition of his plays (1893). An annotated selection from his periodical essays was issued in 1885 by the Clarendon Press. There are recent annotated editions of the Tatler in 8 vols., by G. A. Aitken (1898) and of the Spectator, in 1 vol., by Henry Morley (1868). G. Gregory Smith, in 8 vols (1897-98), and G. A. Aitken, in 8 vols. (1898).

ROBERT AITKEN

Ambrose Philips (c. 1675-1749) was one of the poets of the day whom Addison's friendship and Pope's enmity raised to temporary importance. Born in Shropshire of Leicestershire ancestry, and educated at St John's College, Cambridge, he made his appearance as a poet in the same year and in the same volume as Pope—the Pastorals of Philips being the first poem, and the Pastorals of Pope the last, in Tonson's Viscellary for 1709

Tickell praised Philips's Pastorals as the finest in the language, and Pope resented this absurd depreciation of his own poetry by an ironical paper in the Guardian Pretending to criticisc the rival Pastorals and compare them, Pope gives the preference to Philips, but quotes all his worst passages as his best, and places by the side of them his own finest lines, which he says want rusticity and deviate into downright poetry Philips felt the satire keenly, and even vowed to take personal vengeance on his adversary by whipping him with a rod which he hung up for the purpose in Button's Coffee-House. Pope, faithful to the maxim that a man never forgives another whom he has injured, continued to pursue Philips with hatred and satire to the close of his life. The pastoral poet had the good sense not to enter the lists with his formidable assailant, and his character and talents soon procured him public employment In 1715 he was appointed a commissioner for the Lottery, he was afterwards secretary to the Primate of Ircland, and sat for County Armagh in the Irish Parliament In 1734 he was made registrar of the Prerogative Court. From these appointments, Philips was able to purchase an annuity of £400 per annum, with which he hoped, as Johnson says, 'to pass some years of life sin England] in plenty and tranquillity, but his hope deceived him he was struck with a palsy, and died June 18, 1749' The Pastorals of Philips are but poor things on the whole, but Goldsmith culogised the opening of his Epistle to the Earl of Dorsel as 'incomparably fine'—a judgment Mr Gosse contradicts, while Mr Leslie Stephen thinks the genuine description of nature quite remarkable for the time. His rendering of a fragment of Sappho was voted so excellent that Addison was thought to have assisted in its composition

Fragment from Sappho

Blessed as the immortal gods is lie, The youth who fondly sits by thee, And hears and sees thee all the while Softly speak and sweetly smile.

'Twas this deprived my soul of rest, And raised such tumults in my breast, For while I gazed in transport tost, My breath was gone, my voice was lost,

My bosom glowed, the subtle flame Ran quick through all my vital frame, O'er my dim eyes a darkness hung, My ears with hollow murmurs rung

In dewy damps my limbs were chilled, My blood with gentle horrors thrilled, My feeble pulse forgot to play, I fainted, sunk, and died away

Philips, who translated also from Pindur and Anacreon, produced three tragedies, but only one —The Distressed Mother, from the Androwaque of Racine—was successful, and was praised by

Addison in the Spectator, he wrote in the Whig journal The Freethinker (1718-19), which was his own venture, and he translated some Persian tales A series of short complimentary pieces, by which Philips paid court, as Johnson says, 'to all ages and characters, from Walpole, the steerer of the realm, to Miss Pulteney in the nursery,' procured him the nickname of Namby Pamby from Harry Carey (see page 330 below), a nickname cordially adopted by Pope as suited to Philips's 'eminence in the infantile style.' Of Philips's own achievement in the namby pamby rhythm, the 'Dimply damsel, sweetly smiling,' addressed to Miss Margaret Pulteney, is one good example, and this is another

To Miss Charlotte Pulteney, in her Mother's Arms

Timely blossom, infant fair, Fondling of a happy pair, Every morn and every night Their solicitous delight, Sleeping, waking, still at ease, Pleasing, without skill to please, Little gossip, blithe and hale, Tattling many a broken tale, Singing many a tuncless song, Lavish of a heedless tongue. Simple maiden, void of art, Babbling out the very heart, Yet abandoned to thy will, Yet imagining no ill, Yet too innocent to blush, Like the linnet in the bush, To the mother hunct's note Moduling her slender throat, Chirping forth thy petty joys, Wanton in the change of toys, Like the linnet green, in May, Flitting to each bloomy spray, Wearied then, and glad of rest, Like the linnet in the nest This thy present happy lot, This in time will be forgot Other pleasures, other cares, Ever busy Time prepares, And thou shalt in thy daughter see This picture once resembled thee.

Epistle to the Earl of Dorset,

COPENHAGEN, March 9, 1709.
From frozen climes, and endless tracts of snow,
From streams which northern winds forbid to flow,
What present shall the Muse to Dorset bring,
Or how, so near the pole, attempt to sing?
The hoary winter here conceals from sight
All pleasing objects which to verse invite.
The hills and dales and the delightful woods,
The flowery plains and silver streaming floods,
By snow disguised, in bright confusion lie,
And with one dazzling waste fatigue the eye

No gentle breathing breeze prepares the spring, No birds within the desert region sing. The ships, unmoved, the boisterous winds defy, While rattling chariots o'er the ocean fly. The vast leviathan wants room to play, And spoat his waters in the face of day.

The starving wolves along the main sea prowl, And to the moon in icy valleys how!

O'ur many a shining league the level main Here spreads itself into a glassy plain. There solid billows of enormous size, Alps of green ice, in wild disorder rise.

And yet but lately have I seen, even here, The winter in a lovely dress appear, Lre yet the clouds let fall the treasured snow, Or winds begun through hazy skies to blow At evening a keen eastern breeze arose, And the descending run unsullied froze Soon as the silent shades of night withdren, The ruddy morn disclosed at once to view The face of nature in a rich disguise, And brightened every object to my eyes I or every shrub, and every blade of grass, And every pointed thorn seemed wrought in glass, In pearls and rubies rich the hawthorns show, While through the ice the crimson bernes glow The thick sprung reeds v hich watery marshes yield, Seemed polished lances in a liostile field The stag in hmpid currents with surprise Sees cristal branches on his forehead rise The spreading onk, the beech, and towering pine Glazed over, in the freezing ether shine. The frighted birds the rattling branches shun, Which wave and glitter in the distant sun

When, if a sudden gust of wind arise, The brittle forest into atoms flies, The crackling wood beneath the tempest bends, And in a spangled shower the prospect ends Or, if a southern gale the region warm, And by degrees unbind the wintry charm, The traveller a miry country sees, And journeys sad beneath the dropping trees Like some deluded persant Marlin leads Through fragrant bowers and through deheious meads, While here enchanted gardens to him rise, And airy fabricks there attract his eyes, His wandering feet the magick paths pursue, And, while he thinks the fair illusion true, The trackless scenes disperse in fluid air, And woods, and wilds, and thorny ways appear A tedious road the weary wretch returns, And as he goes the transient vision mourns

From the First Pastoral-'Lobbin.'

If we, O Dorset, quit the city throng
To meditate in shades the rural song
By your command, be present, and O bring
The Muse along! The Muse to you shall sing
Her influence, Buckliurst, let me there obtain,
And I forgive the famed Sicilian swain

Begin—In unhanimous times of yore,
When flocks and herds were no inglorious store,
Lobbin, a shepherd boy, one evening fair,
As western winds had cooled the sultry air,
His numbered sheep within the fold now pent,
Thus plained him of his dreary discontent,
Beneath a hoary poplar's whispering boughs,
He solitary sat to breathe his vows
Venting the tender anguish of his heart,
As passion taught, in accents free of art,
And little did he hope, while night by night
His sighs were lavished thus on Lincy bright.

'Ah' well a-day, how long must I endnre This pining pain? Or who shall speed my cure? Fond love no cure will have, seeks no repose, Delights in grief, nor any measure knows And now the moon begins in clouds to rise, The brightening stars increase within the skies. The winds are hushed, the dews distil, and sleep Hath closed the eyelds of my wears sheep, I only, with the prowling wolf, constrained All night to wake with hunger he is pained, And I with love His hunger he may tame, But who can onench. O cruel love, thy flame? Whilome did I, all as this poplar fair, Upraise my heedless head, then void of care. 'Mong rustick ronts the chief for wanton game. Nor could they merry male till Lobbin came Who better seen than I in shepherd's arts, To please the lads, and win the lasses' hearts? How deftly, to mine oaten reed so sweet. Wont they upon the green to shift their feet! And, wearied in the dauce, how would they yearn Some well-devised tale from me to learn ! For many songs and tales of mirth had I. To chase the lostering sun adown the sky But ah ' since I ney coy deep wrought her spite Within my heart, unmindful of delight, The jolly grooms I fly, and all alone To rocks and woods pour fourth my fruitless moan Oh 1 quit thy wonted scorn, relentless fair, Ere, lingering long, I perish through despair Had Rosalind been mistress of my mind, Though not so fair, she would have proved more kind O think, unwitting maid, while yet is time, How flying years impair thy youthful prime! Thy virgin bloom will not for ever stay. And flowers, though left nngathered, will decay The flowers anew returning seasons bring. But beanty faded has no second spring My words are wind! She, deaf to all my cries, Takes pleasure in the mischief of her eyes Like frisking heifer loose in flowery meads, She gads where'er her roving fancy leads, Yet still from me. Ah me, the tiresome chase I Shy as the fawn, she flies my fond embrace She flies, indeed, but over leaves behind, I ly where she will, her likeness in my mind' His Poems were published by Ambrose Philips in 1748 and re appeared in 1765

John Philips (1676-1709), author of The Splended Shelling, which Addison pronounced 'the finest burlesque poem in the English language,' was the son of the vicar of Brampton in Oxfordshire, who was also Archdeacon of Salop studi id at Winchester and Christ Church, Oxford, his life, mainly devoted to literature, was cut short His early love of Milton is reby consumption flected in all his poems The Splendid Shilling, a mock-heroic poem in Miltonic blank verse, is not in the least designed disrespectfully to burlesque Milton, whom Philips reverenced. He wrote also a Tory celebration of the battle of Blenheim, but his most considerable effort in serious verse was Cyder, an imitation of Virgil's Georgics Splendid Shilling is a classic, read and reprinted while the other poems are forgotten.

The Splendid Shilling

Happy the man who, void of cares and strife, In silken or in leathern purse retains A Splendid Shilling He nor hears with pain New orsters cried, nor sighs for cheerful ale. But with his friends, when nightly mists arise, To Juniper's Magpie or Town hall repairs Where, mindful of the nymph whose wanton eye Transfixed his soul and kindled amorous flames. Chloc or Phillis, he each circling glass Wishes her health, and joy, and equal love. Meanwhile he smokes, and laughs at merry tale, Or pun ambiguous, or conundrum quaint But I, whom griping penury surrounds. And hanger, sure attendant upon want, With scanty offals, and small acid tiff. Wretched repast 1 my meagre corps sustain Then solitary walk, or doze at home In garret vile, and with a warming puff Regale chilled fingers, or from tube as black As winter chimney, or well polished jet, Exhale mundungus, ill perfuming scent Not blacker tube nor of a shorter size Smokes Cambro Briton, versed in pedigree, Sprung from Cadwalador and Arthur, kings-Full famous in romantic tale, when he O er many a craggy hill and barren cliff. Upon a cargo of famed Cestman cheese, High overshadowing rides, with a design To vend his wares, or at th' Arvonian mart. Or Maridunum, or the ancient town Yelcped Brechinia, or where Vaga's stream Encircles Ariconium, fruitful soil! Whence flows nectareous wines that well may vie With Massic, Seun, or renowned Falern Thus, while my joyless minutes tedious flow

With looks demure and silent pace, a dun, Horrible monster 1 hated by gods and men, To my aerial citadel ascends With vocal heel thrice thindering at my gate, With hideous accent thrice he calls, I know The voice ill boding, and the solemn sound What should I do? or whither turn? Amazed, Confounded, to the dark recess I fly Of wood hole, straight my bristling hairs creet Thro' sudden fear a chilly sweat bedews My shuddering limbs, and, wonderful to tell ! My tongue forgets her faculty of speech, So horrible he seems! His faded brow Entrench'd with many a frown, and conic beard, And spreading band, admired by modern saints, Disastrous acts forebode, in his right hand Long scrolls of paper solemnly he waves, With characters and figures dire inscribed, Grievous to mortal eyes, ye gods, avert Such plagues from rightcous men 1. Behind him stalks Another monster, not unlike himself, Sullen of aspect, by the vulgar called A catchpole, whose polluted hands the gods With force incredible and magic charms First have endued if he his ample palm Should haply on all fated shoulder lay Of debtor, straight his body, to the fouch Obsequious, as whilom knights were wont, To some enchanted castle is conveyed, Where gates impregnable and ecercive chains

In durance strict detain him till, in form Of money, Pallas sets the captive free

Beware, ye debtors, when ye walk, beware, Be circumspect I oft with insidious ken This caitiff eyes your steps aloof, and oft Lies perdue in a nook or gloomy cave, Prompt to enchant some inadvertent wretch With his unhallowed touch So, poets sing, Grimalkin, to domestic vermin sworn An everlasting foe, with watchful eye Lies nightly brooding o'er a chinky gap, Protending her fell claws, to thoughtless nuce Sure ruin So her disembowelled web Arachne in a hall or kitchen spreads Obvious to vagrant flies she secret stands Within her woven cell, the humming prey, Regardless of their fate, rush on the toils Inextricable, nor will aught avail Their arts, or arms, or shapes of lovely hue, The wasp insidious, and the buzzing drone, And butterfly, proud of expanded wings Distinct with gold, entangled in her snares, Useless resistance make with eager strides She tow'ring flies to her expected spoils Then with envenomed pays the vital blood Drinks of reluctant foes, and to her cave Their bulky carcasses triumphant drugs

So pass my days. But when nocturnal shades This world envelop and th' inclement air Persuades men to repel benumbing frosts With pleasant wines and erackling blaze of wood, Me lonely sitting, nor the glimmering light Of make weight candle, nor the joyous talk Of loving friend delights, distressed, forlorn, Amidst the horrors of the tedious night, Darkling I sigh, and feed with dismal thoughts My anxious mind, or sometimes mournful verse Indite, and sing of groves and myrtle shades, Or desperate lady near a purling stream, Or lover pendent on a willow tree Meanwhile I labour with eternal drought, And restless wish, and rave, my parchéd throat Finds no relief, nor heavy eyes repose But if a slumber haply does invide My weary limbs, my fancy 's still awake, Thoughtful of drink, and eager, in a dream, Tipples imaginary pots of ale, In vain, awake, I find the settled thirst Still gnawing, and the pleasant phantom curse.

Thus do I live, from pleasure quite debarred, Nor taste the fruits that the sun's genial rays Mature, John apple, nor the downy peach, Nor walnut in rough furrowed coat secure, Nor medlar fruit delicious in decay Afflictions great 1 yet greater still remains. My galligaskins, that have long withstood The winter's fury and encroaching frosts, By time subdued (what will not time subdue!) An horrid chasm disclosed with orifice Wide, discontinuous, at which the winds Eurus and Auster, and the dreadful force Of Boreas, that congeals the Cronian waves, Tumultuous enter with dire chilling blasts, Portending agues. Thus, a well fraught ship, Long sailed secure, or through th' Ægean deep, Or the Ionian, till, cruising near

The Lalybean shore, with hideous crush On Seylla or Charylidis, dangerous rocks, She strikes rebounding, whence the shattered oak, So fierce a shock unable to withstand, Admits the sea, in at the gaping side. The crowding waves gush with impetuous rage, Resistless, overwhelming, horrors seize. The mariners, death in their eyes appears, They stare, they lave, they pump, they swear, they pray Vain efforts! still the battering waves rush in, Implacable, till, deluged by the foam, The ship sinks foundering in the vast abyss.

Jumper's Magrie and the Town hall were Oxford alchouses. Mundangus for tobacco, is from Span mondengo, tripe, paunch. Cestrean is a Latinised adjective for of Chester or of Cheshire, Arronia is Carnarvon, Maridinium, Carmarthen, Brechina, Brecknock, Laga, the Wye, Ariconium is Kenchester (possibly Ross) Massic, Setiman, and Falerman were old wines of Italy beloved of the Romans. Arachine is the spider. John affile, or apple john, is a variety best for use when long preserved and shrivelled. Criman, from Armos, Salurn, means simply Arctic Lilyle in from the promontory of Lilybæum at the western end of Sicily is here used for Sicilian at large.

Eustace Budgell (1686-1737) was a cousin of Addison, and from Trinity College, Oxford, entered the Temple. He accompanied Addison to Ireland as clerk, and afterwards rose to be Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant and a member of the Irish Parliament numbers of the Speciator are ascabed to Budgell, Dr Johnson reported them to have been so much 'mended' by Addison as to be almost his own. No doubt in style and humour they resemble those of Addison, but it was probable enough that Budgell should have tried his best to imitate In 1717 Budgell, who was vain and vindictive, quarrelled with the Irish Secretary, and wrote pamphlets on his grievances, the result of which was his dismissal from office and return to England He lost a fortune in the South Sea Scheme, in a series of law suits, and in attempts to gain a seat in the English House of Commons, and subsequently figured principally as a pam phleteer writer for the Craftsman and Grub Street hack, being at times 'disordered in his senses.' His declining reputation suffered a mortal blon by a charge of having forged a testament in his By the will of Dr Matthew Tindal, own favour the deist, it appeared (1733) that a legacy of £2000 The will was set uside had been left to Budgell and the unhappy author disgraced To this Pope alludes in the couplet

Let Budgell charge low Grub Street on my quil, And write whate'er he please—except my will

In May 1737 this wretched man, involved in debts and difficulties, and dreading an execution in his house, committed suicide by leaping from a boat while shooting London Bridge. On his desk was found a slip of paper, on which he had written

What Cato did, and Addison approved, Cannot be wrong

In this he misrepresented Addison, who made the dying Cato say

Yet methinks a beam of light breaks in On my departing sonl. Alas 'I fear I've been too hasty O ye powers that search The heart of man, and weigh his inmost thoughts, If I have done amiss, impute it not The best may err, but you are good

The Art of Growing Rich

The first and most infallible method towards the attaining of this end is thrift, all men are not equally qualified for getting money, but it is in the power of every one alike to practise this virtue, and I believe in this as in all other circumstances of life. Though the ways of getting money were long since very numerous, and though so many new ones have been found out of late years, there is certainly still remaining so large a field for invention, that a man of an indifferent head might easily sit down and draw up such a plan for the conduct and support of his life as was never yet once thought of

We daily see methods put in practice by hungry and ingenious men, which demonstrate the power of invention in this particular. It is reported of Scaramouche, the first famous Italian comedian, that being in Paris, and in great want, he bethought himself of constantly plying near the door of a noted perfumer in that city, and when any one came out who had been buying snuff, never failed to desire a taste of them, when he had by this means got together a quantity made up of several different sorts, he sold it again at a lower rate to the same perfumer, who, finding out the trick, called it tabac de melle fleurs, or snuff of a thousand flowers The story further tells us, that by this means he got a very comfortable subsistence, until, making too much linste to grow rich, he one day took such an unreasonable ninch out of the box of a Swiss officer as engaged him in a quarrel, and obliged him to quit this ingenious way of life. Nor can I in this place omit doing justice to a youth of my own country, who, though he is scarce yet twelve years old, has, with great industry and application. attained to the art of beating the Grenadiers' March on his chin I am credibly informed, that by this means he does not only maintain himself and his mother, but that he is laying up money every day, with a design, if the war continues, to purchase a drum at least, if not a pair of colours.

I shall conclude these instances with the device of the famous Rabelais, when he was at a great distance from Paris, and without money to bear his expenses This ingenious author being thus sharp set, got together a convenient quantity of brick-dust, and having disposed of it into several papers, writ upon one, 'Poyson for Monsieur,' upon a second, 'Poyson for the Dauphin, ' and on a third, 'Poyson for the King' Having made this provision for the royal family of France, he had his papers so that his landlord, who was an inquisitive man and a good subject, might get a sight of them. The plot succeeded as he desired, the host gave immediate intelligence to the secretary of state. The secretary presently sent down a special messenger, who brought up the traitor to court, and provided him at the king's expense with proper accommodations on the road. As soon as he appeared, he was known to be the celebrated Rabelais, and his powder upon examination being found very innocent, the jest was only laught at, for which a less eminent droll would have been sent to the galleys

Trade and commerce might doubtless be still varied a thousand ways, out of which would arise such branches as have not yet been touched. The famous Doily is still fresh in every one's memory, who raised a fortine by finding out materials for such stuffs as might at once be cheap and genteel I have heard it affirmed, that, had not he discovered this frugal method of gratifying our pride, we should hardly have been able to carry on the last war I regard trade not only as highly advantagious to the commonwealth in general, but as the most natural and likely method of making a man's fortune, having observed, since my being a Spectator in the world, greater estates got about 'Change than at Whitehall or St James's I believe I may also add, that the first acquisitions are generally attended with more satisfaction, and as good a conscience.

I must not, however, close this essay without observing, that what has been said is only intended for persons in the common ways of thriving, and is not designed for those men who, from low beginnings, push themselves up to the top of states and the most considerable figures in life. My maxim of saving is not designed for such as these, since nothing is more usual than for thrift to dis appoint the ends of ambition, it being almost impossible that the mind should be intent upon trifles while it is, at the same time, forming some great design.

valuable materials in the rolls of Parliament, the Cottonian MSS, and other available sources Carte really did make an attempt to utilise the documents at his command, and though his work failed, it proved invaluable to many

William Stukeley (1687–1765), called the 'Arch-Druid,' was born at Holbeach, studied at Corpus, Cambridge, and practised as a doctor at Boston, London, and Grantham. In 1729 he took orders, and in 1747 became a London rector His twenty works (1720–26), dealing with Stonehenge, Avebury, and antiquities generally, enshrine much that is credulous as well as curious. His Diary and Correspondence was published by the Surtees Society in 1884–87

Benjamin Hoadly (1676-1761), successively Bishop of Bangor, Hereford, Salisbury, and Winchester, was a prelate of great controversial ability. who threw the weight of his talents into the scale of Whig politics when fiercely attacked by Tories and Jacobites Born at Westerham in Kent, in 1697 he was elected a Fellov of Catharine Hall, Cambridge In 1706, while rector of St Pcter le-Poor, London, he attacked a sermon by Atterbury. and thus incurred the enmity and ridicule of Swift and Pope. He defended the Revolution of 1688, and attacked the doctrines of divine right and passive obedience with such vigour and perse verance that, in 1709, the House of Commons recommended him to the favour of the queen Her successor, George I., elevated him in 1715 to the see of Bangor Shortly after his elevation to the Bench Hoadly published a work against the Nonurors, and a sermon preached before the king at St James's, on the 'Nature of the Kingdom or Church of Christ,' from the text, 'My kingdom is not of this world? The latter excited a long and vehement dispute, known by the name of the Bangorian Controversy, in which an endless series of tracts was published The Lower House of Convocation censured Hoadly's views, as calculated to subvert the government and discipline of the Church, and to impugn and impeach the roval supremacy in matters ecclesiastical controversy was conducted with unbecoming violence, and several bishops and other grave divines-Sherlock among the number-forgot the dignity of their station and the spirit of Christian charity in the heat of party warfare. Pope alludes sarcastically to Hoadly's sermon in the Duncial

Toland and Tindal, prompt at priests to jeer, Yet silent bowed to Christ's no lingdom here

Yet Hallam held that there was 'nothing whatever in Hoadly's sermon injurious to the established endowments and privileges, nor to the discipline and government of the English Church, even in theory. If this had been the case, he might have been reproached with some inconsistency in becoming so large a partaker of her honours and emoluments. He even admitted the usefulness of censures for open immoralities, though denying all Church authority to oblige any one to external communion, or to pass any sentence which should determine the condition of men with respect to the favour or displeasure of God Another great question in this controversy was that of religious liberty as a civil right, which the Convocation explicitly denied. And another related to the much-debated evercise of private judgment in religion, which, as one party meant virtually to take away, so the other perhaps unreasonably exaggerated' Hoadly was author of several other works, as on the reasonableness of conformity and on the sacrament. The following is from the famous sermon on John xviii 36

The Kingdom of Christ not of this World.

If, therefore, the church of Christ be the kingdom of Christ, it is essential to it that Christ himself be the sole lawgiver and sole judge of his subjects, in all points relating to the favour or displeasure of Almighty God, and that all his subjects, in what station soever they may be, are equally subjects to him, and that no one of them, any more than another, bath authority either to make new laws for Christ's subjects, or to impose a sense upon the old ones, which is the same thing. or to judge, censure, or punish the servants of another master, in matters relating purely to conscience or salvation If any person hath any other notion, either through a long use of words with inconsistent meanings, or through a negligence of thought, let him but ask himself whether the church of Christ be the kingdom of Christ or not, and if it be, whether this notion of it doth not absolutely exclude all other legislators and judges in matters relating to conscience or the favour of God, or whether it can be his kingdom if any mortal men have such a power of legislation and judgment in it. This inquiry will bring us back to the first, which is the only true account of the church of Christ, or the kingdom of Christ, in the month of a Christian, that it is the number of men, whether small or great, whether dispersed or united, who truly and sincerely are subjects to Jesus Christ alone as their lawgiver and judge in matters relating to the favour of God and their eternal salvation

The next principal point is, that, if the church be the kingdom of Christ, and this 'kingdom be not of this world,' this must appear from the nature and end of the laws of Christ, and of those rewards and punishments which are the sanctions of his laws. Now, his laws are declarations relating to the favour of God in another state after this. They are declarations of those con ditions to be performed in this world on our part, without which God will not make us happy in that to And they are almost all general appeals to the will of that God, to his nature, known by the common reason of mankind, and to the imitation of that nature, which must be our perfection. The keeping his commandments is declared the way to life, and the doing his will the entrance into the kingdom of heaven being subjects to Christ is to this very end, that we may the better and more effectually perform the will of God The laws of this Lingdom, therefore, as Christ left them, have nothing of this world in their view, no tendency either to the exultation of some in worldly pomp and dignity, or to their absolute dominion over the faith and religious conduct of others of his subjects, or to the creeting of any sort of temporal kingdom under the covert and name of a spiritual one

The sanctions of Christ's law are rewards and punish ments. But of what sort? Not the rewards of this world, not the offices or glories of this state, not the pains of prisons, banishments, fines, or any lesser and more moderate penalties, nay, not the much lesser and negative discouragements that belong to human society He was far from thinking that these could be the instru ments of such a persuasion as he thought acceptable to God. But as the great end of his kingdom was to guide men to happiness after the short images of it were over here below, so he took his motives from that place where his kingdom first began, and where it was at last to end, from those rewards and punishments in a fature state, which had no relation to this world, and to show that his 'kingdom was not of this world,' all the sanctions which he thought fit to give to his laws were not of this world at all.

St Paul understood this so well, that he gives an account of his own conduct, and that of others in the same station, in these words 'Knowing the terrors of the Lord, we persuade men' whereas, in too many Christian countries since his days, if some who profess to succeed him were to give an account of their own conduct, it must be in a quite contrary strain 'Knowing the terrors of this world, and having them in our power, we do not persuade men, but force their outward profession against their inward persuasion'

Non, wherever this is practised, whether in a great degree or a small, in that place there is so far a change from a kingdom which is not of this world, to a kingdom which is of this world As soon as ever you hear of any of the engines of this world, whether of the greater or the lesser sort, you must immediately think that then, and so far, the kingdom of this world takes place For, if the very essence of God's worship be spirit and truth, if religion be virtue and charity, under the belief of a Supreme Governour and Judge, if true real faith cannot be the effect of force, and if there can be no reward where there is no willing choice—then, in all or any of these cases, to apply force or flattery, worldly pleasure or pun, is to act contrary to the interests of true religion, as it is plainly opposite to the maxims upon which Christ founded his kingdom, who chose the motives which are not of this world, to support a kingdom which is not of this world. And indeed it is too visible to be liid, that wherever the rewards and punishments are changed from future to present, from the world to come to the world now in possession, there the kingdom founded by our Saviour is in the nature of it so far changed that it is become in such a degree what he professed his kingdom was not, that is, of this world, of the same sort with other common earthly kingdoms, in which the rewards are worldly honours, posts, offices, pomp, attendance, dominion, and the punishments are prisons, fines, banishments, gulleys and racks, or something less of the same sort

See the Life in the edition of his works by Hoadly's son (3 vols. folio, 17-3).

Daniel Waterland (1683-1740), born at Waseley rectors, Lincolnshire, was elected in 1704 a Fellow of Magdalen College, Cambridge, and in 1730 became Archdeacon of Middlesex and vicar of Twickenham He was a controversial theologian of great ability and acuteness, and as champion of Trinitarian orthodoxy vindicated the doctrines of the Church of England from Arian and deistic assailants. His several publications on the Trinity constitute a valuable series of treatises. A complete edition of his works, with a Life of the author by Bishop Van Mildert, was published at Oxford, in eleven volumes, in 1823

Conyers Middleton (1683-1750), rector of Hascombe in Surrey, was very eminent as a controversialist, and even Parr, who proved that his famous and eulogistic Life of Cicero (1741) was largely plagrarised from William Bellenden, a Scottish seventeenth century author, held that as a writer of English Middleton was excelled by Addison alone. It is long since he ceased to hold this proud eminence, but he was a very conspicuous personage in his lifetime. 'A native of Richmond in Yorkshire, Fellow and librarian of the University of Cambridge, he was early engaged in a personal feud with Bentley, and ultimately had to apologise for libel A Letter from Rome showing an exact conformity between Popery and Paganism (1729) was ostensibly an attack on Catholic ritual, but raised grievous suspicions of the writer's soundness in the Christian faith In a controversy with Waterland he professed to be answering the deists, but gave up the literal accuracy of Scripture and was by many regarded as little better than a dangerous freethinker An Introductory Discourse and a Free Inquiry (1747-49) denied the credibility of all miracles later than the first age of the Church, but was by most thought to cast doubt on all miracles In the Life of Cicero, admiration of the rounded style and flowing periods of the Roman orator seems to have produced in his biographer a desire to attain to similar excellence, certainly few contemporaries wrote English with the same careful finish and sustained dignity. A few sen tences from his panegyrical summary of Cicero's character will exemplify his style

He [Cicero] made a just distinction between bearing what we cannot help, and approving what we ought to condemn, and submitted, therefore, yet never consented to those usurpations, and when he was forced to compli with them, did it always with a reluctance that he cr presses very keenly in his letters to his friends. But whenever that force was removed, and he was at liberty to pursue his principles and act without controll, as in his consulship, in his province, and after Cæsar's death (the only periods of his life in which he was trul) master of himself), there we see him shining out in his genuine character of an execllent citizen, a great magis trate, a glorious patriot, there we see the man who could declare of himself with truth, in an appeal to Atticus as to the best witness of his conscience, that he had always done the greatest services to his country when it was in his power, or when it was not, had never harboured a thought of it but what was divinc-If we must needs compare him, therefore, with Cato, as some writers affect to do, it is certain that if Cato's virtue seem more splendid in theory, Cicero's will be found superior in practice, the one was romantic, the other was natural, the one drawn from the refinements of the schools, the other from nature and social life, the one always unsuccessful, often hurtful, the other always beneficial, often salutary to the republic.

To conclude Cicero's death, though violent, cannot be called untimely, but was the proper end of such a life, which must also have been rendered less glorious if it had owed its preservation to Antony It was, there fore, not only what he expected, but, in the circum stances to which he was reduced, what he seems even to have wished. For he, who before had been timid in dangers and desponding in distress, yet, from the time of Cresar's death, roused by the desperate state of the republic, assumed the fortitude of a hero, discarded all fear, despised all danger, and when he could not free his country from a tyranny, provoked the tyrants to take that life which he no longer cared to preserve like a great actor on the stage, he reserved himself, as it were, for the last act, and after he had played his part with dignity, resolved to finish it with glory

The Bellenden with whose herier Middleton ploughed was not John Bellenden (Vol. 1. p. 215) but William Bellenden, sometime professor at Paris, who wrote in Latin more than one work on Cicero the last giving Cicero's history in Cicero's own words, and died about 1633. Middleton thus found not merely his plan ready made, but his materials collected.

Nathaniel Lardner (1684-1768), an English Nonconformist divine who ultimately became a Unitarian, was born and died at Hawkhurst in Kent. He wrote a number of theological works, including The Credibility of the Gospel History (2 vols 1727 and 12 vols 1733-55), long a notable part of English apologétics, and a large collection of Jewish and Heathen Testimonies to the Truth of Christianity (1764-67)

William Law (1686-1761) was a great writer of English, a consummate controversialist, and a powerful and permanent spiritual influence. Born a grocer's son at Kingschiffe, Northamptonshire, he entered Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and became a Fellow in 1711 He was unable to sub scribe the oath of allegiance to George I, and forfeited his fellowship. About 1727 lie became tutor to the father of Edward Gibbon, and for ten years was 'the much honoured friend and spiritual director of the whole family ' The elder Gibbon died in 1737, and three years later Law retired to kingscliffe, where he was joined by his disciples, Miss Hester Gibbon sister of his pupil, and Mrs Hutcheson-Indies whose united income of about £3000 a year was mostly spent in works of charity About 1733 Law had begun to study Jacob Boehme, and most of his later books are expositions of Boehme's mysticism or adaptations of it. Law won his first triumphs against Bishop Hoadly in the famous Bangorian Controversy with his Three Letters (1717) His Remarks on Mandeville's Fable of the Bees (1723) is a masterpiece of caustic wit and vigorous English Only less admirable is the Case of Reason (1732), in answer to Tindal the deist held that Locke's philosophy led to freethinking, and regarded Warburton's defence of Christianity as worse than useless. His most famous work remains the Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life (1729), written before the 'mystical period,' which profoundly influenced Dr Johnson and the Wesleys, as well as the early evangelicals such as Venn, Scott, and Newton His position, theologically and otherwise, was somewhat isolated, and was puzzling even to the more spiritual tempers in an unspiritual age. He was a High Churchman but an 'enthusiast'-characters not then thought compatible, his asceticism seemed to smack of Puritanism, his later mysticism alienated the Wesleys, and as a Churchman he was a controversial anti-Methodist. But his character and his writings produced marked effects on English intellectual life. His thought and his style were equally vigorous, his reasoning logical and keen, his expression lucid, brilliant, and often highly humorous, and, like most of his contemporaries, he had no dislike to forms of argument that would now be accounted too personal, as in the following extract from his attack

On Mandeville's 'Fable of the Bees'

Sir, I have read your several compositions in favour of the vices and corruptions of mankind, and hope I need make no apology for presuming to offer a word or two on the side of virtue and religion. I shall spend no time in preface or general reflections, but proceed directly to the examination of such passages as expose moral vertue as a fraud and emposition, and render all pretences to it as odious and contemptible Though I direct myself to you, I hope it will be no offence if I sometimes speak as if I was speaking to a Christian, or show some ways of thinking that may be owing to that kind of worship which is professed amongst us Ways of thinking derived from revealed religion are much more suitable to our low capacities than any arrogant pretences to be wise by our own light. Moral virtue, however disregarded in practice, has hitherto had n speculative esteem amongst men, her praises have been celebrated by authors of all kinds, as the confessed beauty, ornament, and perfection of human nature. On the contrary, immorality has been looked upon as the greatest reproach and torment of mankind, no satyr has been thought severe enough upon its natural baseness and deformity, nor any wit able to express the evils it occasions in private life and public societies. goodness would not suffer you to see this part of Christendom deluded with such false notions of I know not what excellence in virtue or cvil in vice, but obliged you immediately to compose a system (as you call it) wherein you do these three things 1st You consider man merely as an animal, having, like other animals, nothing to do but to follow his appetites. 2dly You consider man as cheated and flattered out of his natural state by the craft of moralists, and pretend to be very sure that the moral virtues are the political offspring which flattery begot upon pride ' So that man and morality are here both destroyed together, man is declared to be only an animal, and morality an imposture According to this doctrine, to say that a man is dishonest is making him just such a criminal as a horse that does not dance. Hat this is not all, for you dare further affirm in praise of immorality, 'that evil, as well moral as natural, is the solid basis, the life and support of all trades and employ ments without exception, that there we must look for the true origin of all arts and sciences, and that the moment evil ceases, the society must be spoiled, if not dissolved' These are the principal doctrines which with more than functic zeal you recommend to your readers, and if lewd stories, profane observations, loose jests, and haughty assertions might pass for arguments, few people would be able to dispute with you

I shall begin with your definition of man 'As for my part, say you, without any compliment to the courteous reader or mysclf, I believe man (besides skin, flesh, bones, &c that are obvious to the eye) to be n compound of various passions, that all of them as they are provoked and come uppermost, govern him by turns whether he will or no 'Surely this definition is too general, because it seems to suit a wolf or a bear as exactly as your self or a Grecian philosopher 'you believe man to be,' &c., now I cannot understand to what part of you this believing faculty is to be asembed, for your definition of man makes him in capable of believing anything, unless believing can be said to be a passion, or some faculty of skin or bones But supposing such a belief as yours, because of its blindness, might justly be called a passion, yet surely there are greater things conceived by some men than can be ascribed to mere passions, or skin and flesh That reach of thought and strong penetration which his carried Sir Isanc Newton through such regions of science must truly be owing to some higher principle Or will you say that all his demonstrations are only so many blind sallies of passion? If man had nothing but instincts and passions, he could not dispute about them, for to dispute is no more an instinct or n passion than it is a leg or an arm. If therefore you would prove yourself to be no more than a brute or an animal, how anuelt of your life you need alter I cannot tell, but you must nt least forbear writing against virtue, for no mere animal ever hated it. But however, since you desire to be thought only skin and flesh, and a compound of passions, I will forget your better part, as much as you have done, and eonsider you in your own way tell us, 'that the moral virtues are the political offspring, which flattery begot upon pride.' You therefore, who are an advocate for moral vices, should by the rule of contraries lx supposed to be acted by humility, but that being (as I think) not of the number of the passions, you have no claim to be guided by it. The prevailing passions, which you say have the sole government of man in their turns, are pride, shame, fear, lust, and anger, you have appropriated the moral virtues to pride, so that your own conduct must be ascribed either to fear, shame, anger, or lust, or else to a beautiful union and concurrence of them all. I doubt not but you are already angry that I consider you only as an animal that acts as anger, or lust, or any other passion moves it, although it is your own assertion that you are no better But to proceed, 'Sagacious moralists, say you, draw men like angels, in hopes that the pride at least of some will put them upon copying after the beautiful originals which they are represented to be? I am loth to charge you with sagacity, because I would not accuse you falsely, but if this remark is well made, I can help you to another full as just, viz. 'that sagacious advocates for immorality draw men like brutes, in hopes that the depravity at least of some will put them upon copying after the base originals, which they are represented to be? The province you have chosen for yourself is to deliver man from the sagacity of moralists, the encroachments of virtue, and to replace him in the rights and privileges of brutality, to recall him from the giddy heights of rational dignity and angelic likeness to go to grass or wallow in the mire. Had the excellence of man's nature been only a false insinuation of errifty politicians, the very falseness of the thing had made some men at peace with it, but this doctrine coming from heaven, its being a principle of religion and a foundation of solid virtue, has rouzed up all this zeal against it

There are two collected editions of Laws works—that of 1762 and that by Moreton (1893 et seq.). See Walton's Materials for a Cemplete Biography (1848), Overton's William Law, Nonjuror and Mystic (1881), and Dr A. Whyte's Characters of William Law (1892).

Thomas Parnell (1679-1718), one of a bril liant circle of wits, was born and educated in Dublin, his father, a native of Congleton in Cheshire, having estates in Ireland He took holy orders in 1700, and in 1706 was appointed Arch deacon of Clogher, to which office was afterwards added, through the influence of Swift, the vicarage of Finglass, estimated by Goldsmith (extravagantly) at £400 a year Parnell, like Swift, disliked Ire land, and seems to have considered his situation there a cheerless and irksome banishment, but, as permanent residence at their livings was not then required from the Irish clergy, he lived for the most part in London He little guessed that by and by the fame of Parnell the poet would be obscured by that of his brother's descendant, Parnell the uncrowned king of Ireland, and that Parnellite and anti-Parnellite would be watchwords not in poetry but politics His grief for the loss of his young wife (five years after their marriage in 1706) prejed upon his spirits-which had always been unequaland drove him into intemperance, though he was an accomplished scholar and a delightful companion. He died at Chester on his way back to Ireland, and there was buried. His Life was written by Goldsmith, who was proud of his distinguished countryman, and reputed him the last of the great school that had modelled itself upon the ancients Parnell's works are miscellaneous in charactertranslations, songs, hymns, epistles, eclogues, tales in verse, and various kinds of occasional poems The Bookworm is a satirical joke, Chloris appearing in a Looking-glass is a trifle On Bishop Burnet being set on Fire in his Closet is meant to be as unpleasant as possible to the prophet of the northern nation A series of Scripture characters -Moses, David, Solomon, Deborah, Habakkuk even, and others—are celebrated at great length in rhyming couplets The Batrachomnomachia is the In the song quoted below principal translation there is more of Irish vivacity than of eightcenth century didacticism, and we seem to hear a comrade of Tommy Moore singing But Parnell's best known piece is The Hermit Pope pronounced it to be 'very good,' and a certain picturesque solemnity marks what Mr Gosse has called 'the apex and chef d'œuvre of Augustan poetry in England'—the subject an old and often-handled moral apologue or fable, apparently of Oriental origin. The Night-piece on Death was indirectly—strange as it may appear—preferred by Goldsmith to Gray's Elegy

From 'A Night-plece on Death.'

How deep you azure dyes the sky, Where orbs of gold unnumbered he. While through their ranks, in silver pride, The nether crescent seems to glide. The slumbering breeze forgets to breathe, The lake is smooth and clear beneath, Where once again the spangled show Descends to meet our eyes below The grounds which on the right aspire. In dimness from the view retire The left presents a place of graves, Whose wall the silent water laves That steeple guides thy doubtful sight Among the livid gleams of night There pass, with melancholy state, By all the solemn heaps of fate, And think, as softly sad you tread Above the venerable dead, 'Time was like thee they life possest, And time shall be that thou shalt rest.'

Those graves with bending osier bound, That nameless heave the crumbled ground. Quick to the glancing thought disclose Where toil and poverty repose The flat smooth stones that bear a name, The chisel's slunder help to same (Which ere our set of friends decay, Their frequent steps may wear away), A middle race of mortals own, Men half ambitious, all unknown The marble tombs that rise on high, Whose dead in vaulted arches lie, Whose pillars swell with sculptured stones, Arms, angels, epitaphs, and bones These all the poor remains of state, Adom the rich, or praise the great, Who, while on earth in fame they live, Are senseless of the fame they give

The Hermit

Far in a wild, unknown to public view,
From youth to age a reverend Hermit grew,
The moss his bed, the cave his humble cell,
His food the fruits, his drink the crystal well,
Remote from men, with God he passed the days,
Prayer all his business, all his pleasure pruse.

A life so sacred, such serene repose, Seemed heaven itself, till one suggestion rose, That vice should triumph, virtue vice obey This sprung some doubt of Providence's sway, His hopes no more a certain prospect boast, And all the tenor of his soul is lost So when a smooth expanse receives imprest Calm nature's image on its watery breast, Do yn bend the banks, the trees depending grow, And skies beneath with answering colours glow.

But if a stone the gentle sea divide,
Swift ruffling circles curl on every side,
And glummering fragments of a broken sun,
Banks, trees, and skies, in thick disorder run.
To clear this doubt, to know the world by sight,
To find if books, or swains, report it right (For yet by swains alone the world he knew, Whose feet came wandering o'er the nightly dew),
He quits his eell, the pilgrim staff he bore,
And fixed the scallop in his hat before,
Then, with the rising sun, a journey went,
Sedate to think, and watching each event

The morn was wasted in the pathless gruss, And long and lonesome was the wild to pass, But when the southern sun had warmed the day, A youth came posting o'er a crossing way, His raiment decent, his complexion fair, And soft in graceful ringlets waved his hur, Then near approaching, 'Father, hail' he cried, 'And hail, my son!' the reverend sire replied Words followed words, from question answer flowed, And talk of various kind deceived the road, Till each with other pleased, and loth to part, While in their age they differ, join in heart Thus stands in aged elm in my bound, Thus youthful my clasps an elm around

Now sunk the sun, the closing hour of day Came onward, mantled o'cr with solker gray, Nature in silence bid the world repose, When near the road a stately palace rose, There by the moon through ranks of trees they pass, Whose verdure crowned their sloping sides of grass It chanced the noble master of the dome Still made his house the wandering stranger's home, Let still the kindness, from a thirst of praise, Proved the vain flourish of expensive ease The pair armie, the liveried servants wait. Their lord receives them at the pompous gate, The table groans with costly piles of food, And all is more than hospitably good Then led to rest, the day's long toil they drown, Deep sunl in sleep, and silk, and heaps of down At length 'tis morn, and, at the dawn of day, Mong the wide canals the zepliyrs play, Fresh o'er the gay parterres the breezes creep, And shake the neighbouring wood to banish sleep Up use the guests, obedient to the call, An early banquet decked the splendid hall, Rich luscious wine a golden goblet graced, Which the lind master forced the guests to taste Then, pleased and thankful, from the porch they go, And, but the landlord, none had cause of woe, His cup was vanished for in secret guise, The younger guest purloined the glittering prize

As one who spies a serpent in his way,
Ghstening and basking in the summer ray,
Disordered stops to shun the danger near,
Then walks with faintness on, and looks with fear,
So seemed the sire, when, far upon the road,
The shining spoil his wily partner shewed
He stopped with silence, walked with trembling heart,
And much he wished, but durst not ask to part,
Murmiring he lifts his eyes, and thinks it hard
That generous actions meet a base reward
While thus they pass, the sun his glory shrouds,
The changing slies heng out their scale clouds,

A sound in air presaged approaching i un, And heasts to covert send across the plans Warned by the signs, the wandering pair retreat To seck for shelter at a neighbouring cat Twas built with turrets, on a rising pround And strong, and large, and unumproved around, Its owner's temper, tunorous and severe, Unkind and griping can ed a de est there As near the mi er's heavy doors they diew, Licrec using custs with adden fury blew, The numble highrant, mixed with shower, began And o or then head loud rolling thunder ran , Here long they I nock, but knock or call in vain, Dri on by the yind and battered by the rain ic pity y armed the matter beat At length (I was then his threshold first received a puese). Slow creating turns the door with jealous care, And half he welcomes in the shivering pair, One frogal fagget hights the naled to dis And Nature's fervour through their limit's recalls, brend of the correct sort, with ea, er wine, Inch hardly printed served them both to due And when the tempest first appeared to cause, A ready warming bid them part in peace With till remark, the pondering hermit viewed, In one so rich in life to poor and rule, And why should such within himself he cried, Lack the log wealth a thousand want bende? But what new marks of wonder contral e place In every settling feature of his face, When, from his vest, the young companion bore That cup the generous landlord owned before, And paid profusely with the precion boul, The stinted I indues of this churchsh soul? But now the clouds in airy timult fly, The sun emerging oper an arnre sky A fresher green the smelling lewes distant And, glutering as they tremble, cheer the day The weather courts them from their poor retient, And the glad master bolts the weary gate While hence they wall, the pilgrim's bo om wrought With all the traval of uncertain thought His partner's acts without their cause appear. Twas there a vice, and seemed a inniness here Detesting that, and pitying this, he goes I ost and confounded with the various shows Now night's dim shades again involve the sky, Igain the wanderers want a place to he, Again they search, and find a lodging night The soil improved around, the mansion neat, And neither poorly low, nor idly great, It seemed to speak its master's turn of mind. Content, and not for praise, but virtue, kind Hither the walkers turn their weary feet, Then bless the mansion, and the master greet. Their greeting fair, bestowed with modest guise, The courteous master hears, and thus replies

Without a vain, without a gradging heart,
To him who gives us all, I yield a part,
From him you come, for him accept it here,
A frank and suber, more than costly cheer!
He spoke, and bid the welcome table spread,
Then talked of virtue till the time of bed.
When the grave household round his half repair,
Warned by a bell, and close the hour with prayer
At length the world, renewed by calm repose,

Ne'er moved in pity to the wandering poor, With him I left the cup, to teach his mind That Heaven can bless, if mortals will be kind Conscious of wanting worth, he views the bowl. And feels compassion touch his grateful soul. Thus artists melt the sullen ore of lead. With heaping coals of fire upon its head, In the kind warmth the metal learns to glow, And, loose from dross, the silver runs below Long had our pious friend in virtue trod, But now the child half weaned his heart from God, Child of his age, for him he lived in pain, And measured back his steps to earth again. To what excesses had this dotage run! But God to save the father took the son. To all but thee, in fits he seemed to go, And 'twas my mmistry to deal the blow The poor foud parent, humbled in the dust, Now owns in tears the punishment was just. But how had all his fortunes felt a wrack Had that false servant sped in safety back! This night his treasured heaps he meant to steal, And what a fund of charity would fail! Thus Heaven instructs thy mind this trial o'er, Depart in peace, resign, and sin no more.'

On sounding pinions here the youth withdrew, The sage stood wondering as the seraph flew, Thus looked Elisha when, to mount on high, His master took the chariot of the sky, The fiery pomp ascending left the view, The prophet gazed, and wished to follow too

The bending Hermit here a prayer begun 'Lord, as in heaven, on earth thy will be done.' Then gladly turning, sought his ancient place, And passed a life of piety and peace.

Good editions of Parnell's Poems are by the Rev John Mitford (1833) and G A. Aitlen (1894).

Thomas Tickell (1686–1740) was one of those on whom Addison's friendship shed a reflected light. Born at Bridekirk vicarage near Carlisle, he went up to Queen's College, Oxford, in 1701, and held a fellowship there in 1710–26. He was a writer in the Spectator and Guardian, and when Addison went to Ireland as secretary to Lord Sunderland, Tickell accompanied him, and was employed under him. He published a translation of the first book of the Iliad at the same time with Pope. Addison and the Whigs were rumoured to have pronounced it the better version of the two, while the Tories ranged under the banner of Pope, and hence originally came about the famous quarrel between Pope and Addison Gay told Pope that Steele said Addison had called Tickell's work the best translation that ever was in any language. Pope professed to believe Tickell's translation as really by Addison, designed to eclipse his, and wrote the satire on 'Atticus,' and so sputtered on the feud, which was never quenched Addison continued his patronage of Tickell, when made Secretary of State in 1717, he appointed his friend Under-Secretary, and further left him the charge of publishing his works Tickell seems to have held himself at liberty to make occasional alterations in Addison's words, and to his edition -long the standard one-of Addison's collected works he prefixed an elegy on his friendly patron. which was justly reckoned his best poem and one of the best things of the kind He wrote a number of addresses, epistles, odes, and occasional poems His ballad of Colin and Lucy was rendered into Latin by Vincent Bourne. Both Gray and Goldsmith pronounced Colin and Lucy one of the best ballads in the language, though Gray thought Tickell 'a poor, short-winded imitator of Addison,' with but three or four notes of his own, sweet but tiresomely repeated 1722 Tickell published a poem, chiefly allegorical, entitled Kensington Gardens, but having been in 1724 appointed secretary to the Lords-Justices of Ireland, he seems to have abandoned the Muses He died at Bath in 1740, and was buried at Glasnevin near Dublin, where he had his home. The memorial tablet in Glasnevin Church records that 'his highest honour was that of having been the friend of Addison' The elegy and Colin and Lucy would have served to perpetuate his name, even Pope admitted that he was an 'honest man.'

From the Elegy on Addison.

Can I forget the dismal night that gave My soul's best part for ever to the grave? How silent did his old companions tread, By midnight lamps, the mansions of the dead, Through breathing statues, then unheeded things Through rows of warners, and through walks of kings! What awe did the slow solemn knell inspire, The pealing organ, and the pausing choir, The duties by the lawn robed prelate paid And the last words, that dust to dust conveyed! While speechless o'er thy closing grave we bend, Accept these tears, thou dear departed friend. Oh, gone for ever ' take this long adicu. And sleep in peace next thy loved Montague. To strew fresh laurels, let the task be mine. A frequent pilgrim at thy sacred shrine.

A frequent pilgrim at thy sacred shrine, Mine with true sighs thy absence to bemoan, And grave with faithful epitaphs thy stone If e'er from me thy loved memorial part, May shame afflict this alienated heart, Of thee forgetful if I form a song,

My lyre be broken, and untuned my tongue, My gries be doubled from thy image free, And mirth a torment, unchastised by thee!

Oft let me range the gloomy assles alone,
Sad luxury to vulgar minds unknown,
Along the wills where speaking marbles shew
What worthies form the hallowed mould below,
Proud names, who once the reins of empire held,
In arms who triumphed, or in arts excelled,
Chiefs graced with scars and prodigal of blood,
Stern patriots who for sacred freedom stood,
Just men by whom impartial laws were given,
And saints who taught and led the way to heaven,
Ne'er to these chambers, where the mighty rest,
Since their foundation came a nobler guest,
Nor e'er was to the bowers of bliss conveyed
A fairer spirit or more welcome shade

In what new region to the just assigned, What new employments please th' unbodied mind? A winged virtue, through th' ethereal sky From world to world unwearied does he fly? Or curious trace the long laborious muze Of heaven's decrees, where wondering angels gaze? Does he delight to hear bold scraphs tell How Michael battled, and the dragon fell, Or, mixed with milder cherubim, to glow In hymns of love, not ill essayed below? Or dost thou warn poor mortals left behind, A task well suited to thy gentle mind? Oh if sometimes thy spotless form descend, To me thy aid, thou guardian genius, lend ! When rage misguides me, or when fear alarms, When pain distresses or when pleasure charms, In silent whisperings purer thoughts impart, And turn from ill a frail and feeble heart Led through the paths thy virtue trod before. Till bliss shall join, nor death can part us more

That awful form which, so the heavens decree, Must still be loved and still deplored by mc, In nightly visions seldom fulls to rise, Or, roused by fancy, meets my waking eyes If business calls or crowded courts invite, Th' unblemished statesman seems to strike my sight, If in the stage I seek to soothe my care, I meet his soul which breathes in Cato there, If pensive to the rural shades I rove, His shape o'ertakes me in the lonely grove, 'Twas there of just and good he reasoned strong. Cleared some great truth, or raised some serious song There patient shewed us the wise course to steer, A candid censor, and a friend severe, There taught us how to live, and (oh! too high The price for knowledge) taught us how to die.

Thou hill whose brow the antique structures grace, Reared by bold chiefs of Warwick's noble race, Why, once so loved, whene'er thy bower appears, O'er my dim eyeballs glance the sudden tears? How sweet were once thy prospects fresh and fair, Thy sloping walks, and unpolluted air! How sweet the glooms beneath thy aged trees, Thy noontide shadow, and thy evening breeze! His image thy forsaken bowers restore, Thy walks and airy prospects charm no more, No more the summer in thy glooms allayed, Thy evening breezes, and thy noonday shade

('To the Earl of Warwick on the Death of Mr Addison,')

Colin and Lucy

Of Leinster, famed for maidens fair,
Bright Lucy was the grace,
Nor e'er did Liffey's limpid stream
Reflect so sweet a face,
Till luckless love and pining care
Impaired her rosy hue,
Her coral hips and damask cheeks,
And eyes of glossy blue

Oh! I have you seen a hily pale
When beating rains descend?
So drooped the slow consuming maid,
Her life now near its end
By Lucy warned, of flattering swains
Take heed, ye easy fair!
Of vengeance due to broken yows,
Ye perjured swains, beware

Three times nil in the dead of night \( \) bell was heard to ring,
And shricking, at her window thrice
The riven flapped his wing
Too well the love form miden knew
The solemn boding sound,
And thus in dying words bespoke
The virgins weeping round

'I hear n voice you cannot hear,
Which says I must not stay,
I see a hand you cannot see,
Which buckons me away
By a false heart and broken vows
In early youth I die
Was I to blame because his bride
Was thrice as rich as I?

'Ah, Colin' give not her thy vows,
Vows due to me alone,
Nor thou, fond maid! receive his kiss,
Nor think him all thy own.
To morrow in the church to wed,
Impatient both prepare,
But know, fond maid, and know, false man,
That Lucy will be there.

'Then bear my corpse, my comrades, bear,
This bridegroom blithe to meet,
He in his wedding trim so gay,
I in my winding sheet'
She spoke, she died, her corse was borne
The bridegroom blithe to meet,
He in his wedding trim so gay,
She in her winding sheet

Then what were perjured Colin's thoughts?
How were these amputals kept?
The bridesmen flocked round Lucy dead,
And all the village wept
Confusion, shame, remorse, despuir,
At once his bosom swell,
The damps of death bedewed his brow,
He shook, he groaned, he fell

From the van bride, ah, bride no more!
The varying crimson fled,
When stretched before her rival's corse
She saw her husband dead

A Nocturnal Reverle

In such a night, when every louder wind Is to its distant cavern safe confined, And only gentle zephyr funs his wings, And lonely Philomel still waking sings, Or from some tree, famed for the onl's delight, She, hollowing clear, directs the wanderer right In such a night, when passing clouds give place, Or thinly veil the heaven's mysterious face, When in some river overhung with green, The waving moon and trembling leaves are seen, When freshened grass now bears itself upright, And makes cool banks to pleasing rest invite. Whence springs the woodbine, and the bramble rose, And where the sleepy cowslip sheltered grows, Whilst now a paler hue the forglove takes, I et checkers still with red the dusky brakes, When scattered glowworms, but in twilight fine, Shew trivial beauties, watch their hour to shine, Whilst Salisbury stands the test of every light, In perfect charms and perfect virtue bright When odours which declined repelling day, I hrough temperate air uninterrupted stray, When darkened groves their softest shadows wear, And fulling waters we distinctly hear, When through the gloom more venerable shews Some ancient fabrick, awful in repose, While sunburnt hills their swarthy looks conecal, And swelling hay cocks thicken up the vale When the loosed horse now, as his pasture leads, Comes slowly grazing through the adjoining meads, Whose stealing pace and lengthened shade we fear, Till torn up forage in his teeth we hear, When nibbling slieep at large pursue their food. And unmolested kine rechew the cud, When curlens ory beneath the village walls, And to her straggling brood the partridge calls, Their short lived jubilee the creatures keep, Which but endures whilst tyrant man does sleep, When a sedate content the spirit feels, And no fierer light disturbs, whilst it reveals, But silent musings urge the mind to seek Something too high for syllables to speak, Till the free soul to a composedness charmed, Finding the elements of rage disarmed, O'er all below a solemn quiet grown, Joys in the inferiour world, and thinks it like her own In such a night let me abroad remain, Till morning breaks, and all 's confused again, Our cares, our toils, our clamours are renewed, Or pleasures, seldom reached, again pursued

A. Song

Love, thou art best of human joys, Our chiefest happiness below, All other pleasures are but toys, Music without thee is but noise, And beauty but an empty show

Heaven, who knew best what man would move
And ruse his thoughts above the brute,
Said, Let him be, and let him love,
That must alone his soul improve,
Howe'er philosophers dispute

A collected edition of the Countess's works, including an unacted tragedy, Aristomenes was published in 1713-

Lady Mary Wortley Montagu (1689-1762). united as few men or women have done solid sense and learning to wit, fancy, and lively powers of description, in letter-writing she has very few equals, and scarcely a superior Horace Walpole may be more witty and sarcastic, and Cowper more unaffectedly natural, tender, and delightful. vet if we consider the variety and novelty of the matters described in Lady Mary's letters, the fund of anecdote and observation they display, and the idiomatic clearness of her style, we shall hesitate to place her below any letter-writer that England has yet produced She was the eldest daughter of Evelyn Pierrepont, who became next year fifth Earl, and in 1715 Duke, of Kingston, and was brought up at Thoresby, Notts in childhood she showed exceptional gifts, was very carefully educated, and from her youth up was a close student and indefatigable reader Bishop Burnet encouraged her in her unusually wide course of study, which included Greek In 1712 she philosophy in Latin translations married - against her father's wishes - Edward Wortley (later Wortley Montagu), and on his being appointed in 1714 a commissioner of the Treasury, she was introduced to the courtly and polished circles. Her personal beauty and the charms of her conversation secured the friend ship of Addison, Congreve, Pope, and the In 1716 her husband was appointed ambassador to the Porte, and Lady Mary accom panied him to Constantinople (1717-18), going b) way of Vienna, and returning by Tunis, Genoa, During her journey and her residence and Paris in the Levant, she corresponded with her sister the Countess of Mar, Lady Rich, Pope, and others, brilliantly describing and contrasting European and Turkish scenery and manners Having noted among the villagers in Turkey the results of inoculating for the smallpox, she confidently submitted her own son, at that time four years old, to this protective method, then practically unknown to European medical art, and by her zealous effort afterwards established the practice of inoculation in England and in Europe. In 1718, her husband being recalled from his embassy, she returned to England, and, by Pope's advice, settled at Twickenham The rival wits did not long con Pope wrote high-flown panegyrics tinue friends and half concealed love-letters to Lady Mary, and she treated them with silence or ridicule. On one occasion he is said to have made a tender and formal declaration, which threw the lady into an immoderate fit of laughter, henceforth the sen sitive poet became her implacable enemy Mary also wrote verses, town eclogues, and epigrams, and Pope confessed that she had too The cool self-possession of much wit for him the lady of rank and fashion, joined to her sarcastic powers, proved an overmatch for the jealous retired author, tremblingly alive to the shafts of In 1739, for reasons unknown, Lady

Mary left England and her husband to travel and live abroad. She visited Venice, Florence, Rome, and Naples, and settled first at Avignon and then at Lovere, on the Lago d'Iseo. Mr Montagu having died in 1761, Lady Mary was prevailed upon by her daughter, the Countess of Bute, to return to England, but died in the following year.

Her letters, printed surreptitiously in 1763, were edited by her great grandson. Lord Wharnchiffe. The wit and varied talents of Lady Mary are visible throughout the whole of her correspondence. Her desire to communicate piquant personal stories or to paint graphically leads her into details which modern taste hardly approves She described what she saw and heard without mincing matters, and her strong masculine understanding and absolute frankness render her sometimes apparently unamiable and unfeeling, and frequently defective in what we account feminine delicacy But otherwise, as models of epistolary style, easy, familiar, and elegant, no less than as pictures of foreign scenery and manners and fashionable gossip, the letters of Lady must always hold their place in literature are truly letters, not critical or didactic essays enlivened by formal compliment and elaborate wit, though some of them are perhaps rather like a brightly-written chapter of a book of travel, or one section ('to be continued in our next') of a systematic description of life and manners abroad -such, for example, as Lady Mary's long letter to her sister describing in great and vivid detail her reception by the Grand Vizier's chief wife, and in the linem of the Vizier's chief deputy rather objectionable letters, published even in Lord Wharncliffe's and, with corrective notes, in Mr Moy Thomas's editions, were assuredly not written by Lady Mary, but are forgenes presumably by John Cleland, son of Pope's friend Major Cleland, a clever but notoriously unprincipled littérateur

On Matrimonial Happiness.

If we marry, our happiness must consist in loving one another 'tis principally my concern to think of the most probable method of making that love eternal You object against living in London, I am not fond of it myself, and readily give it up to you, though I am assured there needs more art to keep a fondness alive in solitude, where it generally prevs upon itself. There is one nrticle absolutely necessary—to be ever beloved, one must be ever agreeable. There is no such thing as being agreeable without n thorough good humour, a natural sweetnes of temper, enlivened by cheerfulness Whatever natural fund of gaiety one is born with, tis necessary to be entertained with agreeable objects Anybody capable of tasting pleasure, when they confine themselves to one place, should talle care tis the place in the world the most pleasing. Whatever you may now think (now, perhaps, you have some fondness for me), though your love should continue in its full force, there are hours when the most beloved mis ress would be troublesome. People are not for ever (nor is it in human nature that they should be disposed to be fond, you would be glad to find in me the friend and the companion. To be agreeably this last, it is necessary to be gay and entertaining. A perpetual solitude in " place where you see nothing to raise your spirits, at length wears them out, and conversation insensibly falls into dull and insipid. When I have no more to say to you, you will like me no longer How dreadful is that view! You will reflect, for my sake you have abap doned the conversation of a friend that you liked, and your situation in a country where all things would have contributed to make your life pass in (the true zolutté) a smooth tranquillity. I shall lose the vivaeity which should entertain you, and you will have nothing to recompense you for what you have lost people that have settled entirely in the country but have grown at length weary of one another. The lady's conversation generally falls into a thousand impertinent effects of idleness and the pentleman falls in love with his dogs and his horses, and oir of love with everything else. I am now arguing in favour of the town, you have answered me as to that point. In respect of your health, its the first thing to be considered, and I shall never ask you to do anything injurious to that. But his my opinion, its necessary to be happy that we neither of its think any place more agreeable than that where we are. I have no hing to do in London and its indifferent to me if I never see it more.

(From a letter to Mr Wertley Montagu in 1-12.)

Eastern Manners and Language

I no longer look tipen Theornius a a romantic writer he has only given a plain image of the way of life amongs! the peasants of his country, who, before oppression had reduced them to war, were, I suppose all employed as the better sort of them are now I don't doubt, had he been born a Briton, his Idylliums had been filled with descriptions of thrashing and churning, both which are unknown here, the corn being all trod out by onen, and butter (I speak it with sorrow) unheard of

I read over your Homer here with an infinite pleasure, and find several little passages explained that I did not before entirely comprehend the beauty of, many of the customs and much of the dress then in fashion being yet retained, and I don't wonder to find more remains here of an age so distant than is to be found in any other country, the Turks not taking that pains to introduce their own manners as has been generally practised by other nations that imagine themselves more polite would be too tedious to you to point out all the passages that relate to present customs. But I can assure you that the princesses and great ladies pass their time at their looms, embroidering veils and robes, surrounded by their incids, which are always very numerous, in the same manner as we find Andromache and Helen described The description of the belt of Menelaus exactly resembles those that are now worn by the great men, fastened before with broad golden clasps, and embroidered round with rich work The snowy veil that Helen throws over her face is still fashionable, and I never see half a-dozen of old pashas (as I do very often), with their reverend beards, sitting basking in the sun but I recollect good king Priam and his counsellors manner of druging is certainly the same that Diana is sung to have danced on the banks of the Eurotas. The great Indy still leads the dance, and is followed by a troop of young girls, who imitate her steps, and if she sings, make up the chorus. The tunes are extremely greated in the monderfully The steps are varied according to the pleasure of her that leads the dance, but always in exact time, and infinitely more agreeable than any of our dances, at least in my opinion I sometimes make one in the truin, but am not skilful enough to lead, these are Grecian dances, the Turl ish being very different

I should have told you, in the first place, that the eastern manners give a great light into many Scripture prisages that appear odd to us, their phrases being commonly what we should call Scripture language vulgar Turk is very different from what is spoken at court, or amongst the people of figure, who always mix so much Arabic and Persian in their discourse that it may very well be called another language ridiculous to make use of the expressions commonly u ed in speaking to a great man or lady, as it would be to speak broad Yorkshire or Somersetshire in the draw ing room Besides this distinction, they have what they call the sublime, that is, a style proper for poetry, and which is the exact Seripture style. I believe you will be pleased to see a geniune example of this, and I am very glad I have it in my power to satisfy your curio ity, by sending you a faithful copy of the verses that Ibrahim Pasha, the reigning favourite, has made for the young princess, his contracted wife, whom he is no vet permitted to visit without witnesses, though she is gone home to his house He is a man of wit and harming, and whether or no he is capable of writing good ver e lumself, you may be sure that on such an occasion he would not want the assistance of the best poets in Thus the verses may be looked upon as a sample of their finest poetry, and I don't doubt you'll be of my mind, that it is most wonderfully resembling the Song of Solomon, which was also addressed to a royal bride

τ

The nightingale now wanders in the vines Her passion is to seek roses

I went down to admire the beauty of the vines The sweetness of your charms has ravished my soul.

Your eyes are black and lovely, But wild and disdainful as those of a stag

11

The wished possession is delayed from day to day, The cruel sultan Achmet will not permit me To see those checks, more vermilion than roses

I dare not snatch one of your kisses,

The sweetness of your charms has ravished my soul
Your eyes are black and lovely,
But wild and disdainful as those of a stag

111

The wretched Ibrahim sighs in these verses
One dart from your eyes has pierced through my heart.
Ah! when will the hour of possession arrive?
Must I yet wait a long time?
The sweetness of your charms has ravished my soul.
Ah, Sultana! stag eyed—an angel amongst angels!
I desire, and my desire remains unsatisfied
Can you take delight to prey upon my heart?

w

My cries pierce the heavens!

My eyes are without sleep!
Turn to me, Sultana—let me gaze on thy beauty Adieu! I go down to the grave
If you call me, I return
My heart is hot as sulphur, sigh, and it will flame
Crown of my life! fair light of my eyes!
My Sultana! my princess!
I rub my face against the earth—I am drowned in scalding tear,—I rave!

Have you no compassion? Will you not turn to look upon me?

I have taken abundance of pains to get these versus in a literal translation, and if you were acquainted with my interpreters, I might spare myself the trouble of assuring you that they have received no poetical touches from their hands.

(From a letter to Mr Pope, dated Adrianople, April 1, O.S., 1717, one of six long letters to various persons bearing the same date—surely a good day 8 work.)

On Inoculation for Small-pox.

Apropos of distempers, I am going to tell you a thing that will make you wish yourself here. The small pox, so fatal and so general amongst us, is here entirely harmless, by the invention of ingrafting, which is the term they give it. There is a set of old women who male it their business to perform the operation every autumn, in the month of September, when the great heat is abated. People send to one another to know if any of their family has a mind to have the small pox, they make parties for this purpose, and when they are met (commonly fifteen or sixteen together) the old woman comes with a nut shell full of the matter of the best sort of small pox, and asks what years you please to have opened. She immediately ups open that you offer to her with a large needle (which gives you no more pain than a common scratch), and puts into the vein as much venom as can be upon the head of her needle, and after that binds up the little wound with a hollow bit of shell, and in this manner opens four or five years. The Grecians have commonly the superstition of opening one in the middle of the fore head, one in each arm, and one on the breast, to mark the sign of the cross, but this has a very ill effect, all these wounds leaving little scars, and is not done by those that are not superstitious, who choose to have them in the legs, or that part of the arm that is con The children or young patients play together all the rest of the day, and are in perfect health to the eighth. Then the fever begins to seize them, and they keep their beds two days, very seldom three. They have very rarely above twenty or thirty in their faces, which never mark, and in eight days time they are as well as before their illness. Where they are wounded, there remain rimning sores during the distemper, which I don't doubt is a great relief to it. Every year thousands undergo this operation, and the French embassador says pleasantly that they take the small pox here by way of diversion, as they take the waters in other countries There is no example of any one that has died in it. and you may believe I am well satisfied of the safety of the experiment, since I intend to try it on my dear little I am patriot enough to take pains to hring this useful invention into fashion in England, and I should not fail to write to some of our doctors very particularly about it, if I I new any one of them that I thought had virtue enough to destroy such a considerable branch of their revenue for the good of mankind. But that distemper is too beneficial to them, not to expose to all their resentment the hardy wight that should undertake to put an end to it Perhaps if I live to return, I may however have conrage to war with them Upon this occasion, admire the heroism in the heart of your friend

(From a letter to Mrs Sarah Chiswell dated Adrianople, April 1 O S 1717)

France in 1718.

I cannot give my dear Lady R [Rich] a better proof of the pleasure I have in writing to her than choosing to do it in this seat of various amusements, where I am accable with visits, and those so full of vivacity and compliment that tis full employment to hearken, whether one answers or not. The French embassadress at Con stantinople has a very considerable and numerons family here, who all come to see me, and are never weary of The air of Paris has already had a making enquiries good effect upon me, for I was never in better health, though I have been extremely all all the road from Lyons to this place. You may judge how agreeable the journey has been to me, which did not need that addition to make me dislike it. I think nothing so terrible as objects of misers, except one had the Godlile attribute of being capable to redress them, and all the country villages of France shew nothing else. While the post hor-es are changed, the whole town comes out to beg, with such miserable starved faces, and thin tattered clothes they need no other elequence to persunde one of the wretched ness of their condition. This is all the I rench magnifi cence till you come to Fontainebleau. There you begin to think the country rich, when you are showed one thousand five hundred rooms in the king's hunting The apartments of the royal family are very large, and richly gilt, but I saw nothing in the architee ture or painting worth remembering A protes of countenances, I must tell you something of the French ladies, I have seen all the beauties, and such - (I can't help making use of the course word) nauseous [creatures]' so fantastically absurd in their dress' so monstrously unnatural in their point! their hair cut short, and curled round their faces, and so loaded with powder, that makes it look like white wool! and on their cheeks to their clins, unmercifully laid on, a shining red japan, that glistens in a most flaming manner, that they seem to have no resemblance to human faces, and I am apt to believe that they took the first hint of their dress from a fair sheep newly 'Tis with pleasure I recollect my dear pretty countrywomen and if I was writing to anybody else, I should say that these grotesque daubers give me still a higher esteem of the natural charms of dear Lady R. s auburn hair, and the lively colours of her unsullied complexion (From a letter to Lady Rich dated Paris. October to OS 1718)

To the Countess of Bute-On Female Education Loverr Jan 28 NS 1753.

DEAR CHILD-You have given me a great deal of satisfaction by your account of your eldest daughter I am particularly pleased to hear she is a good arith metician, it is the best proof of understanding knowledge of numbers is one of the chief distinctions between us and the brutes. If there is anything in blood, you may reasonably expect your children should be endowed with an uncommon share of good sense. Mr Wortley's family and mine have both produced some of the greatest men that have been born in Lingland, I mean Admiral Sandwich, and my grandfather, who was distinguished by the name of Wise William have heard Lord Bute's father mentioned as an extra ordinary genius, though he had not many opportunities of shewing it, and his uncle the present Dule of Argyll has one of the best heads I ever knew. I will therefore speak to you as supposing Lady Mary not only capable, but desirous of learning, in that case, by all means let her be includged in it. You vill tell me I did not male it a part of your education your prospect was very different from hers. As you had no defect either in inind or person to hinder, and much in your circumstances to attract the highest offers, it seemed your business to learn how to live in the world, as it is hers to know how to be easy out of it. It is the common error of builders and parents to follow some plan they think beautiful (and perhaps is so) without considering that nothing is beautiful that is displaced. Hence ve see so many edifices rused that the raisers can never inhabit, being too large for their fortunes. Vistas are laid open over barren heaths, and apartments contrived for a coolness very agreeable in Italy, but killing in the north of Britain, thus every woman endervour to breed her daughter a fine lady, qualifying her for a station in which she will never appear, and at the same tine in capacitating her for that retirement to which sie is destined Learning if she has a real taste for it, will not only make her contened by happy in it entertunment is so cheep as reading, nor any pleasure so listing. She will not want new fashions, nor regret the loss of expensive diversions, or variety of company, if she can be amused with an author in her closet. To render this amusement extensive she should be permitted to learn the languages. I have heard it lamented that boys lose so many years in mere learning of words this is no objection to a girl, whose time is not so precious she cannot advance herself in any profession, and has therefore more hours to spare, and as you say her memory is good, she will be very agreeably employed this way

There are two cautions to be given on this subject first, not to think herself learned when she can read Latin, or even Greck Languages are more properly to be called vehicles of learning than learning itself, as may be observed in many schoolmasters, who, though per haps critics in grammar, are the most ignorant fellows True knowledge consists in knowing things, not words. I would no further wish her a linguist than to enable her to read books in their originals, that are often corrupted, and always injured, by translations Two hours' application every morning will bring this about much sooner than you can imagine, and she will have lessure enough besides to run over the English poetry, which as a more important part of a woman's education than it is generally supposed. Many a young damsel has been ruined by a fine copy of verses, which she would have laughed at if she had known it had been stolen from Mr Waller I remember, when I was a girl, I saied one of my companions from destruction, who communicated to me an epistle she was quite charmed As she had naturally a good taste, she observed the lines were not so smooth as Prior's or Pope's, but had snore thought and spirit than any of theirs. She was wonderfully delighted with such a demonstration of her lover's sense and passion, and not a little pleased with her own charms, that had force enough to inspire such elegancies In the midst of this triumph, I shewed her that they were taken from Randolph's poems, and the unfortunite transcriber was dismissed with the scorn he To say truth, the poor plagiary was very unlucky to fall into my hands that author, being no longer in fashion, would have escaped any one of less universal reading than myself. You should encourage your daughter to talk over with you what she reads, and as you are very capable of distinguishing, take care she does not mistake pert folly for wit and humour, or rhyme for poetrs, which are the common errors of young people, and have a trum of ill consequences

The second crution to be given her (and which is most absolutely necessary) is to concerl whatever learn ing she attains, with as much solicitude as she would hide crookedness or lameness the parade of it can only serve to draw on her the envy, and consequently the most inveterate hatred, of all he and she fools, which will certainly be at least three parts in four of her requaintance. The use of knowledge in our sex, beside the amusement of solitude, is to moderate the passions, and learn to be contented with a small expense, which are the certain effects of a studious life, and it may be preferable even to that fame which men have engrossed to themselves, and will not suffer us to share. You will tell me I have not observed this rule myself, but you are mistaken, it is only inevitable necedent that has given me any reputation that was have always carefully avoided it, and ever thought it a misfortune The explanation of this paragraph would occasion a long digression, which I will not trouble you with, it being my present design only to say what I think useful for the instruction of my granddaughter, which I have much at heart If she has the same meliaation (I should say passion) for learning I was born with, history, geography, and philosophy will furnish her with materials to pass away cheerfully a longer life than is allotted to mortals. I believe there are few heads capable of making Sir I Newton's calculations, but the result of them is not difficult to be understood by a moderate capacity Do not sear this should make her affect the character of Lady ----, or Lady ----, or Mrs ---- [the blanks are in the original], these women are ridiculous not because they have learning, but because they have it not. One thinks herself a complete historian after reading Echard's Roman History, another a profound philosopher after having got by heart some of Pope's unintelligible essays, and the third an able divine on the strength of White field's sermons, thus you hear them screaming politics and controversy

It is a saying of Thucydides, ignorance is bold and knowledge reserved. Indeed it is impossible to be far advanced in it without being more humbled by a conviction of human ignorance than elated by learn ing At the same time I recommend books, I neither exclude work nor drawing. I think it is as scanda lous for a woman not to know how to use a needle, as for a man not to know how to use a sword I was once extremely fond of my pencil, and it was a great mortifi cation to me when my father turned off my master, having made a considerable progress for a short time I My over eagerness in the pursuit of it had brought a weakness on my eyes, that made it necessary to leave it off, and all the advantage I got was the improvement of my hand I see by hers that practice will make her a ready writer she may attain it by serv ing you for a secretary, when your health or affairs make it troublesome to you to write yourself, and custom will make it an agreeable amusement to her. She cannot have too many for that station of life which will probably be her fate. The ultimate end of your education was to make you a good wife (and I have the comfort to hear that you are one), hers ought to be to make her happy in a virgin state. I will not say it is happier, but it is undoubtedly safer than any marriage. In a lottery, where there are (at the lowest computation) ten thousand blanks to a prize, it is the most prudent choice not to venture I have always been so thoroughly persuaded of this truth, that, notwithstanding the flattering views I had for you (as I never intended you a sacrifice to my vanity), I thought I owed you the justice to lay before you may you all the hazards attending matrimony recollect I did so in the strongest manner Perhaps you may have more success in the instructing your daughter; she has so much company at home, she will not need seeking it abroad, and will more readily take the notions As you were alone in my you think fit to give her family, it would have been thought a great cruelty to suffer you no companions of your own age, especially having so many near relations, and I do not wonder their opinions influenced yours. I was not sorry to ecc you not determined on a single life, knowing it was not your father's intention, and contented myself with endeavouring to make your home so easy that you might not be in haste to leave it.

I am afraid you will think this a very long insignificant letter. I hope the kindness of the design will excuse it, being willing to give you every proof in my power that I am

Your most affectionate mother

More complete than the surreptitious edition of Lady Mary's letters in 1763 was that of 1803 (5 vols.), and still better that edited by her great-grandson, Lord Wharnchiffe (1837). This was further extended and improved by Mr Moy Thomas (1861) revised, 1887). The letters from Constantinople and from France have appeared in various shapes. The editor of the surreptitions 1763 edition (3 vols.) was probably John Cleland (1707-89) the forged letters presumably by him, were issued as a fourth volume in 1767.

John Norris (1657-1711), an English Platonist and 'mystic divine,' was one of the earliest opponents of the philosophy of Locke. Educated at Oxford, in 1689 he took a Somersetshire living, but from 1692 he held George Herbert's old rectors of Bemerton near Salisbury He was an intimate of Henry More. Hallam described him as 'more thoroughly Platonic than Malebranche, to whom, however, he pays great deference, and adopts his fundamental hypothesis of seeing all things in God? More noteworthy is it that he carried into the eighteenth century much of the spirit of Henry More, something of the mood of Crashaw and Vaughan. His first original work was An Idea of Happiness (1683), his poems, essays, discourses, and letters, entitled A Collection of Viscellanies (1687), went through nine editions. His verses are quaint and full of conceits One simile of his, in 'The Parting,' was copied or annexed by two better-known poets-by Blair in The Grave, and by Thomas Campbell in The Pleasures of Hope

How fading are the joys we dote upon!

Like apparitions seen and gone

But those which soonest take their flight,

Are the most exquisite and strong

Like angel visits short and bright,

Mortality's too weak to bear them long

In 'Lines to the Memory of my dear Neece' Norms repeats the idea in other words

Angels, as 'tis but seldom they appear, So neither do they make long stay, They do but visit and away

Again, when Campbell wrote 'Tis distance lends enchantment to the view,' he certainly had before his mind this from Norris's 'Infidel'

Distance presents the objects fair, With charming features and a graceful air, But when we come to seize th' inviting prey, Like a shy ghost, it vanishes away

In the same poem, with its unpromising title, we find the rather memorable stanza

So to the unthinking boy the distant sky Seems on some mountain's surface to rely
He with ambitious haste climbs the ascent Curious to touch the firmament,
But when with an unwearied pace,
Arrived he is at the long vished for place,
With sighs the sad event he does deplore—
His Hearen is still as distant as before

Some of his verses are prosaic and tuncless enough to recall Zachary Boyd's paraphrases of Scripture at their worst. Thus 'Adam Turned out of Paradise' complains in these words

O whither now, whither shall I repair,

Exiled from this angelic coast?

There's nothing left that's pleasant, good, or fair,
The world can't recompence for Eden lost.

'Tis true, I've here a universal sway,
The creatures me as their chief lord obey,

Yet the world, tho' all my seat,
Can't make me happy, tho' it makes me great

Dr Grosart edited Norris's Poems in 1871 for Vol. III of the Miscellanies of the 'Fuller Worthies Library where he suggests many parallelisms between Norris and later writers, and insists on the debt of Blair and Campbell especially Christopher Pitt (1699-1748) was admitted by Johnson into his gallery of English poets best-known work is his translation (1725) of Vida's Art of Poetry, and in 1740 he produced a complete English Encid He also imitated some of the satires and epistles of Horace, and helped with Creech's Lucretius and Pope's Odyssey 'Pitt pleases the critics, and Dryden the people, Pitt is quoted, Such was Johnson's report. and Dryden read. but even the critics have long ceased to delight in From New College, Oxford, he was presented to the rectory of Pimperne in his native county of Dorsct, and there he spent the rest of his life. By the influence of Pitt, he was appointed (1752) one of the clerks of the Privy Council, and under-treasurer of Chelsea Hospital Johnson included his mis cellaneous poems in his collection

Edward Young,

author of the Night Thoughts, was born towards the end of June 1683 at Upham in Hampshire, where his father-afterwards Dean of Salisburywas rector He was educated at Winchester School, and subsequently at New, Corpus, and All Souls Colleges, Oxford In 1712 hc commenced as poet and courtier of the great, and he continued both professions till he was over eighty. One of his patrons was the notorious Duke of Wharton, the scorn and wonder of his days,' whom Young accompanied to Ireland in 1716-17 He was for a while tutor in the family of the Marquis of Exeter, but was induced by Wharton to stand as parliamentary candidate for Cirencester, receiving a bond for £600 to defrav expenses Young was defeated, Wharton died (1731), but the courts sustained Young's claim to two annuities (worth £200 a year) promised by the Duke His first tragedy, Busins (afterwards burlesqued in Fielding's Tom Thumb), was produced in 1719, in 1721 his second and best, The Revenge, his last, The Brothers, not till 1753 Significantly enough, the three tragedies of the future author of the Night Thoughts all end in suicide. The Revenge contains, amidst some rant and hyperbole, passages of strong passion and eloquent declamation in Young's sonorous blank verse, like Othello, it is founded on jealousy, and the principal character, Zanga, is a Moor Young's satires, seven in number, appeared in 1725-28 under the title of The Love of Fame, the Universal Passion Doubtless his own experiences must have been valuable, for as the associate and toady of Bubb Dodington and the like his humiliations and disappointments must have been many In 1727 Young entered the Church. and grievous wrote a panegyric on the king, and was made one of His Majesty's chaplains In 1730 he obtained from his college the living of Welwyn in Hertford shire, where he was destined to close his days, though always eager for further preferment. His marriage with the (widowed) daughter of the Earl of Lichfield proved a happier union than rumour represented the noble alliances of Dryden and The lady had a daughter by her first marriage, to whom Young was warmly attached That daughter and her husband died, and when the mother followed, the lonely survivor's Night Thoughts (1742-44) showed that years and sorrows had but enriched his poetic gift. In 1761 he was made clerk of the closet to the Princess Dowager of Wales, and he lived on till the 5th of April 1765

In his youth Young was gry and dissipated, all his life he was an indefitigable flatterer and courtier, in his poetry only is he a severe moralist and ascetic divine. Even if he felt the emotions he describes, he hardly allowed them to influence his conduct. He was not weaned from the world till age overtook him, and the epigrammatic point and wit and gloom of his Night Thoughts show the poetic artist rather than the devout Christian. The becausements even on which the poem was based were deliberately exaggerated for poetical effect.

Insatiate archer I could not one suffice?

Thy shafts flew thrice, and thrice my peace was slun, And thrice, ere thrice you moon had filled her horn.

This tale of sorrows was a poetical license, one of the shafts struck after an interval of four years. The gay Lorenzo is overdrawn. Like the character of Childe Harold in the hands of Byron, it afforded its creator scope for dark and powerful painting, and was made the vehicle for bursts of indig nant virtue, sorrow, regret, and admonition artificial character pervades the whole poem, and is an essential part of its structure, yet there are many noble and sublime passages, where, as with the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Young prophesies of life, death, and immortality Epigram and repartee are then forgotten, fancy yields to feeling, and the imagery is natural and appropriate. But the poet-preacher seldom remains long at a time in his loftier mood, his desire to say witty and smart things, to load his picture with supernumerary horrors, and conduct his personages to their 'sulphureous or ambrosial seats,' soon converts him into the scene-printer or epigrammatist. Poetry disappears in verbinge and sentimentalism, which cloying antithesis and magniloquence make more tedious Many of his sententious lines and short passages have become proverbial, some of his reflections make ad mirable copy-lines, such as 'Procrastination 15 the thief of time.' Young's great work, like Hudibras, is too full of compressed reflection and illustration to be read continuously with pleasure. There is no plot or progressive interest, each of the nine books is independent of the other. The reader seeks out favourite passages, or contents himself with a single excursion into a wide and variegated field. The worst fault is the inevitable suggestion of insincerity, or at least of overstrained sentiment. But the more the work is studied, the more marvellous seem the fertility of fancy, the pregnancy of wit and wisdom, the felicitous conjunction of sound and sense, of sympathetic tenderness and everlasting truth, clearly discernible through the gloomy recesses of the poet's melancholious imagination.

The glorious fragments of a fire immortal,
With rubbish mixed, and glittering in the dust
This magnificent apostrophe had hardly been equalled since Milton's days

On Life, Death, and Immortality

Tired Nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep!
He, lile the world, his ready visit pays
Where Fortnne smiles, the wretched he forsakes, Swift on his downy pinion flies from woe,
And lights on lids unsulled with a tear

From short (as usual) and disturbed repose,
I wake how happy they who wake no more!
Yet that were vain, if dreams infest the grave.
I wake, emerging from a sea of dreams
I umultuous, where my wrecked desponding thought
From wave to wave of faneied misery
At random drove, her helm of reason lost.
Though now restored, tis only change of pain—
A bitter change!—severer for severe
The day too short for my distress, and night,
E'en in the zenith of her dark domain,
Is sunshine to the colour of my fate.

Night, sable goddess' from her ebon throne, In rayless majesty, now stretches forth Her leaden sceptre o er a slumbering world Silence how dead' and darkness how profound! Nor eye nor listening ear an object finds, Creation sleeps. Tis as the general pulse Of life stood still, and Nature made a pause, An awful pause! prophetic of her end And let her prophecy be soon fulfilled, Fate! drop the curtain, I can lose no more.

Silence and Darkness' solemn sisters! twins
From ancient Night, who nurse the tender thought To reason, and on reason build resolve—
That column of true majesty in man—
Assist me I will thank you in the grave,
The grave your kingdom—there this frame shall fall
A victim sacred to your dreary shrine.
But what are ye?——

Thou, who didst put to flight
Primeval Silence, when the morning stars
Exulting, shouted o'er the rising ball,
O Thon! whose word from solid darkness struck
That spark, the snn, strike wisdom from my soul,
My soul, which flies to thee, her trust, her treasure,
As misers to their gold, while others rest.

Through this opaque of nature and of soul, This double night, transmit one pitying ray, To lighten and to cheer Oh lead my mind, (A mind that fain v ould wander from its woe) Lead it through various scenes of life and death, And from each scene the noblest truths inspire. Nor less inspire my conduct than my song, Teach my best reason, reason, my best will Teach rectitude, and fix my firm resolve Wisdom to wed, and pay her long arrear Nor let the phial of thy vengeance, poured On this devoted head, be ponred in vain.

How poor, how rich, how abject, how august, How complicate, how wonderful is man! How passing wonder He who made him such ! Who centred in our make such strange extremes! From different natures marvellously mixt, Connexion exquisite of distant worlds ! Distinguished link in being's endless chain! Midway from nothing to the Deity l A beam ethereal, sullied and absorpt! Though sullied and dishonoured, still divine l Dim miniature of greatness absolute ! An heir of glory ' a frail child of dust-Helpless immortal insect infinite! A worm ' a god ' I tremble at myself, And in myself am lost ! at home a stranger, Thought wanders up and down, surprised, aghast, And wondering at her own how reason reels! O what a miracle to man is man, Triumphantly distressed! what joy! what dread! Alternately transported and alarmed! What can preserve my life? or what destroy? An angel's arm can't snatch me from the grave, Legions of angels can't confine me there.

Tis past conjecture, all things rise in proof
While o'er my limbs sleep's soft dominion spread
What though my soul fantastic measures trod
O er fairy fields, or moarned along the gloom
Of pathless woods, or down the eriggy steep
Harled headlong, swam with pain the mantled pool,
Or scaled the cliff, or danced on hollow winds,
With antic shapes, wild natives of the brain?
Her ceaseless flight, though devious, speaks her nature
Of subtler essence than the trodden clod
Even silent night proclaims my soul immortal!

Why, then, their loss deplore that are not lost? This is the desert, this the solitude
How populous, how vital is the grave!
This is creation's melancholy vault,
The vale funereal, the sad cypress gloom,
The land of apparitions, empty shades!
All, all on earth, is shadow, all beyond
Is substance, the reverse is folly's creed
How solid all, where change shall be no more!

This is the bid of being, the dim dawn,
The twilight of our day, the vestibule,
Life's theatre as yet is shut, and death,
Strong death alone can heave the massy bar,
This gross impediment of clay remove,
And make us embryos of existence free
From real life, bat little more remote
Is he, not yet a candidate for light,
The future embryo, slumbering in his sire.
Embryos we must be till we barst the shell,
Yon umbient azine shell, and spring to life,
The life of gods, O transport and of man.
Yet man, fool man! here biries all his thoughts,

Inters eclestial hopes without one sight Prisoner of earth, and pent beneath the moon, Here pinions all his wishes, winged by heaven To fly at infinite, and reach it there Where seraphs gather unmortality, On life's fur tree, fast by the throne of God What golden joys ambrosial clustering glow In his full beam, and ripen for the just, Where momentary ages are no more! Where time, and pain, and chance, and death expire! And is it in the flight of three score years To push eternity from human thought, And smother souls immortal in the dust? A soul immortal, spending all her fires, Wasting her strength in strenuous idleness, Thrown into tumult, raptured or alarmed, At aught this scene can threaten or indulge, Resembles occun into tempest wrought, To wast a scather, or to drown a fly

On Time

(From The Complaint-Night I)

The bell strikes one We take no note of time But from its loss to give it then a tongue Is wise in man As if an angel spoke, I feel the solemn sound If heard aright, It is the knell of my departed hours Where are they? With the years beyond the flood It is the signal that demands dispatch How much is to be done? My hopes and fears Start up alarmed, and o'er life's narrow verge Look down—on what? A fathoinless abyss A dread eternity ! how surely mine! And can eternity belong to me, Poor pensioner on the bounties of an hour? (From The Complaint-Night I )

O time than gold more sacred, more a load Than lead to fools, and fools reputed wise What moment granted man without account? What years are squandered, wisdom's debt unput? Our wealth in days all due to that discharge Haste, haste, he has in wait, he's at the door, Insidious Death! should his strong hand arrest, No composition sets the prisoner free. Eternity's ineverable chain Fast binds, and vengeance claims the full arrear

Youth is not rich in time, it may be poor, Part with it as with money, sparing, pay No moment, but in purchase of its worth, And what it's worth, ask death beds, they can tell Part with it as with life, reluctant, big With holy hope of nobler time to come, Time higher aimed, still nearer the great mark Of men and angels, virtue more divine.

Ah! how unjust to nature and himself
Is thoughtless, thankless inconsistent man!
Like children babbling nonsense in their sports,
We censure Nature for a span too short,
That span too short we tax as tedious too,
Torture invention, all expedients tire,
To lash the lingering moments into speed,
And whirl us (happy riddance!) from ourselves

Time, in advance, behind him hides his wings, And seems to creep, decrepit with his age, Behold him when passed by , what then is seen But his broad pinions swifter than the winds? And all mankind, in contradiction strong, Rueful, aghast! cry out on his career

We waste, not use our time, we breathe, not live, Time v asted is existence, used, is life. And live existence ninn, to live ordained, Wrings and oppresses with enormous weight. And why? since time was given for use, not waste, Linjoined to fly, with tempest, tide, and stars, To keep his speed, nor ever writ for man. Time's use was doomed a pleasure, waste a pain, That man might feel his error if unseen, And, feeling, fly to labour for his cure.

Not blundering, split on idleness for ease

We push time from us, and we wish him back, Lavish of lustrums, and yet fond of life, Life we think long and short, death seek and shun. Body and soul, lil c pecvish man and wife, United jar, and yet are loth to part Oh the dark days of vanity ' while here, How tastcless! and how terrible when gone! Gone? they ne'er go, when past, they haunt us still The spirit wall's of every day deceased, And smiles an angel, or a fury frowns. Nor death nor life delight us If time past, And time possest, both pain us, what can please? That which the Deity to please ordained, Time used The man who consecrates his hours By vigorous effort, and an lionest aim, At once he draws the sting of life and death He walks with nature, and her paths are peace.

'Tis greatly wise to talk with our past hour,
And ask them what report they bore to heaven,
And how they might have borne more welcome newe
Their answers form what men experience call,
If wisdom's friend her best, if not, worst foe.

(From The Compla nt—Night IL)

In these shorter passages he rangs the changes on the same topics

Look nature through, 'tis revolution all, All change, no death, day follows night, and night. The dying day, stars rise and set, and rise. Larth takes the example. See, the Summer gay, With her green chaplet and ambrosial flowers, Droops into pallid Autumn. Winter gray, Horrid with frost and turbulent with storm, Blows Autumn and his golden fruits away, Then melts into the Spring soft Spring, with breath I avonian, from warm chambers of the south, Recalls the first. All, to reflourish, fades. As in a wheel, all sinks to reascend. Emblems of man, who passes, not expires.

Self flattered, unexperienced, high in hope,
When voung, with sanguine cheer and streamers gay,
We cut our cable, launch into the world,
And fondly dream each wind and star our friend,
All in some darling enterprise embarkt
But where is he can fathom its extent?
Amid a multitude of nitless hands,
Ruin's sure perquisite, her lawful prize!
Some steer aright, but the black blast blows hard,

And puff- them wide of hope with hearts of proof Full agunst win I and title, some win their vay, And when strong effort has deserved the port, And tugged it into view, 'tis won! 'tis lost! Though a rong their our, still stronger is their fate They strike ' and while they triumph they expire. In stress of weather most, some sink outright O or them and o or their rames the billows close. To morroy knows no they were ever born Others a short memorial leave behind, Lake a flag floating when the barl 's ingulfed, It floats a moment, and is seen no more. One Casar lives a thousand are forgot. How few beneath auspicious planets horn-Darling of Providence ! fond fates elect !-With swelling sails male good the promised port, Wi hall their wisnes freighted to even these, Freighted with all their wishes, soon complain, Free from misfortune, no from nature free, They still are men, and when is man secure? As fatal time, as s o m I the rush of years Beats down their strength, their numberless escapes In run end. And now their proud succes-But plants new terrors on the victors brow Wha pain to quit the world, jus made their own, Their rest so deeply downed, and built so high ' Too lon they build, who build beneath the stare

On Night.

These though s O Night! are thine, From thee this came I ke lovers exerct sighs. While overs slept. So Cwithin, pices feigh, In shallows welled, soft, sliding from his sphere, Her shipherd encered, of his can noured less. Than I of thee.—And are thouse ill unsung, Beneath whose brow and by who e aid I sing? Immortal silence! where shall I begin? Where end? or how seal music from the spheres. To so he their golders?

O majestic night!

Nature's great ancestor! Day's elder born!

And fated to survice the transient suit!

By mortals and unmertals seen with awe!

A start; crown thy raven brow adorns,

An azure zone thy varieties of shape and shade,

In ample folds of urapery divine,

The flowing maintle form, and, heaven throughout

Volumirously pour thy pompous truin

The gloom, grandeurs—Nature's most august,

Inspiring aspect '—claim a gruteful verse,

And like a sable curtain started with gold,

Drawn oler my labours past, shall close the scene.

On Retirement.

Blest be that hand divine, which gently laid My heart at rest beneath this humble shed! The orld's a stately bark, on dangerous seas, With pleasure seen, but boarded at our penl Here, on a single plank, thrown safe ashore, I hear the tumult of the distant throng, As that of seas remote, or dving storms, And meditate on scenes more silent still, Pursue thy theme, and fight the fear of Death. Here, like a shepherd gazing from his hut, Touching his reed, or leaning on his staff,

Eager ambition's fiery chace I sec,
I see the circling hunt of noisy men
Burst law's inclosure, leap the mounds of right,
Pursuing and pursued, each other's prey,
As volves for rapine, as the fox for viles
Till Death, that mighty hunter, earths them all.

Why all this toil for triumphs of an hour?
What though we wade in vicalth, or soar in fame,
Earth's highest station ends in 'Here he lies,'
And 'dust to dust' concludes her noblest song

Prograstination.

Be vise to day, its madness to defer Next day the fital precedent will plead, Thus on, till visdom is pushed out of life. Procrastination is the thief of time, Year after year it teals, till all are fled, An' to the mercies of a moment leaves. The vas' concerns of an e-ernal scene. It not so frequen, would not this be stringe? That its so frequent, this is stranger still.

Of man's miraculous mistakes, this bears The palm, 'That all men are about to live,' For ever on the brink of being born All pay themselves the compliment to think They one day shall not drivel, and their pride-On this reversion talles up ready praise, At leas, their own their future selves applaud, How excellent that life they ne er will lead! Time lodged in their own hands is Folly's vails .. That lodged in Tate's to wisdom they consign, The thing they can't but purpose, they postpone. 'Tis not in folly not to scorn a fool, And scarce in human wisdom to do more. All promise is poor dilatory man And that through every stage When young indeed, In full content we sometimes nobly rest, Unanxious for ourselves, and only wish, As duteous sons, our fithers were more wise. At thirty, man suspects himself a fool, kno vs it at forty, and reforms his plan. At fifty, chides his infamous delay, Pushes his prudent purpose to resolve. In all the magnanimity of thought Recoives, and re resolves, then dies the same

And why? because he thinks him elf immortal All men think all men mortal but themselves, Themselves, when some alarming shock of fate S ril es through their wounded hearts the sudden dread; But their liearts wounded, hile the wounded air, Soon close, where passed the shaft no trace is found, As from the wing no sear the sky retains, The parted wave no furrow from the keel, So dies in human hearts the thought of death E en with the tender tear which nature sheds O er those we love, we drop it in their grave.

(From The Complaint-Night I )

The Arght Thoughts eclipsed Young's other works, but his Love of Fame, in Seven Characteristical Satires, shows real satiric power, often almost equalling Pope's Parts of Pope's seem indeed to have been suggested by Young's

From 'The Love of Fame

Not all on books their criticism waste The genius of a dish some justly taste,

And ent their way to fame! with anxious thought The salmon is refused, the turbot bought Impatient Art rebul es the sun's delay, And bids December yield the fruits of May Their various cares in one great point combine The business of their lives, that is, to dine, Half of their precious day they give the feast, And to a kind digestion spare the rest Apieus liere, the taster of the town, Feeds twice a week, to settle their renown

These worthies of the palate guard with care The sacred annals of their bills of fare, In those choice books their panegyries read, And scorn the creatures that for hunger feed, If man, by feeding well, commences great, Much more the worm, to whom that man is meat

Brunetta's wise in actions great and rare, But scorns on trifles to bestow her eare. Thus every hour Brunetta is to blame, Because th' occasion is beneath her aim Think nought a trifle, though it small appear, Small sands the mountain, moments make the year, And trifles, life. Your care to trifles give, Or you may die before you truly live.

Belus with solid glory will be erowned, He buys no phantom, no vain empty sound, But builds lumself a name, and to be great, Sinks in a quarry an immense estate, In cost and grandeur Chandos he'll outdo, And, Burlington, thy taste is not so true, The pile is finished, every toil is past, And full perfection is arrived at last When lo I my lord to some small corner runs, And leaves state rooms to strangers and to duns

The man who builds, and wants wherewith to pay, Provides a home from which to run away In Britain, what is many a lordly seat, But a discharge in full for an estate?

Some for renown on scraps of learning dote, And think they grow immortal as they quote. To patchwork learned quotations are allied, Both strive to make our poverty our pride

Let high birth triumph! what can be more great? Nothing—but merit in a low estate. To Virtue's humblest son let none prefer Vice, though descended from the Conqueror Shall men, like figures, pass for high or base, Slight or important only by their place? Titles are marks of honest men, and wise, The fool or knave that wears a title, lies They that on glorious ancestors enlarge, Produce their debt instead of their discharge

From the 'First Epistle to Mr Pope With fame in just proportion envy grows, The man that makes a character makes foes, Slight peevish insects round a genius rise, As a bright day awakes the world of flies, With hearty malice, but with feeble wing, (To show they live) they flutter and they sting But as by depredations wasps proclaim The fairest fruit, so these the fairest fame.

Shall we not censure all the motley train, Whether with ale irriguous or champagne?

Whether they tread the vale of prose, or climo And whet their appetites on chiffs of rhyme, The college sloven or embroidered spark, The purple prelate or the parish elerk, The quiet quidnunc or demanding prig, The plaintiff Tory or defendant Whig, Rich, poor, male, female, young, old, gay or sad, Whether extremely witty or quite mid, Profoundly dull or shallov ly polite, Men that read well, or men that only write, Whether peers, porters, tailors, tune the reeds, And measuring words to measuring shapes succeeds, For bankrupts write, when ruined sliops are shut, As maggets crawl from out a penished nut. His hummer this, and that his trowel quits, And wanting sense for tradesmen, serve for wits. By thriving men, subsists each other trade, Of every broken craft a vinter's made. Thus his material, paper, takes its birth I rom tattered rags of all the stuff on earth.

Burns, who knew most of Young by heart, no doubt tool from the sixth satire the material for the climax of his 'Address to the Deil '

> But fare you weel, and 'Niekic ben!' O wad ve tak a thought an' men' ' Ve aiblins might-I dinna l'en-Still hae a stake I'm wae to think upo' von den, I v'n for your sale!

The idea that perhaps the devil might yet find salvation is often set to the credit of the plough Unreasonably, man-poet's unheard of generosity for though Burns may not have known that Origen's doctrine of the Apocatastasis or Final Restitution expressly included the devil and his angels, or that the benevolent scheme of St Macarius (who actually persuaded God to pardon the devil) fell through only because Satan would not stoop to beg forgiveness, he could not have been ignorant of Young's 'devil's fair apologist' and her comment on Tillotson's heresy having classised, not too tenderly, the foibles and vices of many types of women, and raised the question of 'she atheists,' Young goes on

Atheists are few most nymphs a Godhead own, And nothing but his attributes dethrone. From atheists far, they steadfastly believe God is, and is Almighty ---- to forgive. His other excellence they Il not dispute, But mercy, sure, is his chief attribute. Shall pleasures of a short duration chain A lady's soul in everlas ing pain? Will the great Author us poor worms destroy, For now and then a sip of transient joy? No, he's for ever in a smiling mood, He's like themselves, or how could be be good? And they blaspheme, who blacker schemes suppose -Devoutly thus Jehovah they depose, The pure! the just! and set up in his stead A deity that's perfectly well bred 'Dear T-l-n' be sure the best of men,

Nor thought he more, than thought great Origen.

Though once upon a time he misbehaved,
Poor Satan! doubtless, he'll at leugth be saved.
Let priests do something for their one in ten,
It is their trade, so far they 're honest men
Let them cant on, since they have got the knack,
And dress their notions, like themselves, in black,
Fright us with terrors of a world unknown,
From joys of this, to keep them all their own
Of earth's fair fruits, indeed, they claim a fee,
But then they leave our untithed virtue free.
Virtue's a pretty thing to make a show
Did ever mortal write like Rochefoucault?'
Thus pleads the devil's fair apologist,
And, pleading, safely enters on his list.

Burns's 'Address to the Deil,' it should be noted, is essentially comic or serio-comic, though, like this ironical excursus of Young's, it may contain some slight element of serious thought.

Young expounded in prose his views 'On Lyric Poetry,' and illustrated them in an ode on 'Ocean,' which has a more artificial air than his blank verse, and is full of bathos to boot. These are a few of the stanzas (nearly seventy in all!), the last of v hich contains an adumbration of Thomson's guardian angels chorusing 'Rule Britannia'

Who sings the source
Of wealth and force,

Vast field of commerce and big war,
Where wonders dwell!

Where terrors swell!

And Neptune thinders from his car?

The main! the main!
Is Britain's reign,
Her strength, her glory is her fleet
The main! the main!
Be Britain's strain,
As Triton's strong, as Syren's sweet.

Where rushes forth
The frowning North
On blackening billows, with what dread
My shuddering sonl
Beholds them roll
And heurs their roarings o'er my head I

The northern blast,
The shattered mast,
The syrt, the whirlpool, and the rock,
The breaking spout,
The stars gone out,
The boiling strait, the monster's shock

Let others fear,
To Britain dear
Whate'er promotes her darling claim
These terrors charm,
Which keep her warm
In chase of honest gain or fame

When Nature sprung,
Blest angels sung
And shouted o'er the rising ball,
For strains as high
As man's can fly
These sea devoted honours call.

The Life of Young in Johnson's Lives of the Poets is by Herbert Croft (written 1782). Mitford and Doran, in the memoirs prefixed to their editions (1852 and 1854) of the works, added a few facts and so also Leslie Stephen's article in the last volume of the Dictionary of National Biography (1900) George Ehot's Worldliness and Other worldliness, reprinted in her Estays (1884), contains a severe attack on Young's character. For Young in France, see Texte's Roussean and the Cosmopolitan in Literature (trans. 1800).

George Berkeley (1685–1753), the good bishop to whom Pope assigned 'every virtue under heaven,' was born at Dysert Castle near Kilkenny Like Swift, he passed from Kilkenny school to Trinity College, Dublin, where, student and Fellow, he remained thirteen years. His Commonplace Book of 1705–6 (published in 1871) reveals the influence of Locke's psychology on a subtle and original mind Berkeley's Lesay towards a new Theory of Vision (1709) showed that the act of seeing, which seems so immediate, is really a reasoning interpretation of signs and hints, and argued that the process involves the assisting agency of God The argument was extended in 1710 by a Treatise concerning the Principles of Human Knowledge, further illustrating his 'new principle'-that the world which we see and touch is not an abstract independent substance, of which our sensations are an effect, the very world presented to our senses depends for its actuality on being perceived. In 1711, having taken orders, he published a Discourse of Passive Obedience, a defence of the Christian duty of not resisting the supreme civil power, and in 1713 he visited London, and wrote some papers for Steele's Guardian The same year he published his Three Dialogues between Hylas and Philonous, the design of which was plainly to demonstrate the immateriality of the external world, the meorporeal nature of the soul, and the immediate providence of a Deity, in opposition to scepties and deists. Berkeley now became intimate with Addison, Arbuthnot, Swift, Pope, Steele, and the rest of that gifted circle, by whom he seems to have been sincerely beloved He accompanied the brilliant and eccentric Earl of Peterborough, as chaplain and secretary, on his embassy to Sicily, and afterwards for four years travelled on the Continent as tutor to a son of the Bishop of Clogher While abroad we find him writing to Pope 'As merchants, antiquaries, men of pleasure, &c. have all different views in travelling, I know not whether it might not be worth a poet's while to travel, in order to store his mind with strong images of nature Green fields and groves, flowery meadows, and purling streams, are nowhere in such perfection as in England, but if you would know lightsome days, warm suns, and blue skies, you must come to Italy, and to enable a man to describe rocks and precipiees, it is absolutely necessary that he pass the Alps' A story was long current that while at Paris Berkeley visited Male branche, then in ill-health, and a dispute as to Berkeley's theory of the external world so excited the French philosopher that a violent access of his allment carried him off in a few days! In reality Berkeley was still in England when Malebranche On his return he published a Latin tract, In an Essay towards preventing the Ruin of Great Britain (1721) Berkeley says he would regard the collapse of the South Sea seheme as a blessing if it should make all honest men of one party, put religion and virtue in countenance, and 'turn our thought from cozenage and stock jobbing to industry and frugal methods of life,' denounces that fearful prevalence of bribery and perjury, makes proposals for new taxes (on bachelors, &c.) and for improving many manufactures, calls for the interposition of the legislature against the ruinous folly of masquerades and for the reformation of the drama, recommends the enaction of comprehensive sumptuary laws, and for the suppression of the more aggressive forms of freethinking am not,' he says, 'for placing an invidious power in the hands of the clergy or complying with the narrowness of any mistaken zealots who should incline to persecute Dissenters But whatever conduct common sense as well as Christian charity obligeth us to use towards those who differ from us in some points of religion, yet the public safety requireth that the avowed contemners of all religion should be severely chastised And perhaps it may be no easy matter to assign a good reason why blasphemy against God should not be inquired into and punished with the same rigour as treason against the king?

Through Pope he was recommended to the Duke of Grafton, Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, who made him his chaplain and secured for him the The benevolent philosopher dennery of Derry had long been cherishing 'a scheme for con verting the savage Americans to Christianity, by a college to be erected in the Summer Islands, otherwise called the Isles of Bermuda.' In this eollege he most 'exhorbitantly proposed,' as Swift commented, 'a whole hundred pounds a year for himself, forty pounds for a fellow and ten for a student' No anticipated difficulties could daunt him, condutors were obtained, a royal charter was granted, and Sir Robert Walpole promised £20,000 from Government In January 1729 Berkeley and his friends landed at Newport in Rhode Island, in August the saintly missionary (who had no seruple about holding negro slaves) removed inland, liaving bought a farm and built a house. But when Walpole declined to advance the sum promised, the project was at an end, Berkeley returned to Europe, and was in London Next month appeared the m February 1732 largest and most finished of his works, Alciphron, or the Minute Philosopher, a religious presenta tion of nature giving pleasant pictures of American scenery and life, conveyed in a series of dia logues, which in scope and charm have often been compared with Plato's Berkeley became a favourite with Queen Caroline, and, in 1734 was appointed to the bishoprie of Clovne. Lord Chesterfield afterwards offered him the see of Clogher, which was double the value of that of Cloyne, but he declined the preferment. Some useful tracts on sehemes for ameliorating lrish social conditions were published by the Bishop One of them was The Querist (1735-37), containing many acute suggestions, that called Stris (1744), a chain of philosophical reflections on the medica nal virtues of water in which pine tar has been stirred, eost him, he said, more thought than any of the rest of his works. The resin of the tar is compared with the creative spirit present in nature, the thought has a neoplatonic flavour His last literary labour was a tract, Further Thoughts on Tar-water (1752) The best way of making this panacea, he thinks, is 'in a stone jug or earthen vessel, throughout well glazed,' and by no means in a metallie vessel 'By increasing the proportion of tar to the water and by stirring it longer, tar-water may be made strong enough for a spoonful to impregnate a glass, a thing very useful on the road, "Tar-water must be drank warm in agues, small-pox, measles, and fevers, in eholic and disorders of the bowels, in gout also and rheumatism, in most other ailments cold or warm at the choice of the patient. the patient cannot begin too soon or drink too He records a case of an old woman cured in a fortnight of combined ague, colic, and jaundice by drinking three pints of warm tarwater every day

Fuling health (spite of tar-water) and bereave ment led Berkeley, in 1752, to resolve to resign his bishopric and settle in Oxford, and there next year he died. His dislike to the pursuits and troubles of ambition are thus expounded by him to a friend in 1747 'In a letter from England, which I told you came a week ago, it was said that several of our Irish bishops were earnestly contending for Pray, who are they? I thought the primacy Bishop Stone was only talked of at present. ask this question merely out of curiosity, and not from any interest, I assure you I am no man's rival or competitor in this matter. I am not in love with feasts, and crowds, and visits, and late hours, and strange faces, and a liurry of affairs often insignificant. For my own private satisfaction, I had rather be master of my time than wear a I repeat these things to you, that I may not seem to have declined all steps to the primacy out of singularity, of pride, or stupidity, but from solid motives As for the argument from the opportunity of doing good, I observe that duty obliges men in high station not to decline occasions of doing good, but duty doth not oblige men to solicit such high stations' The Bishop was a poet as well as a mathematician and phil-When inspired with his transatlantic mission, he enshrined in verse-somewhat tame for the inspiration—his apocalyptic vision of a transcendently glorious American world-empire, reviving the golden age on a vaster scale. The first line of the concluding verse has long since been quoted into a proverb

Verses on the Prospect of Planting Arts and Learning in America.

The Muse, disgusted at an age and clime Barren of every glorious theme, In distant lands now waits a better time, Producing subjects worthy fame

In happy climes where from the genial sun And virgin earth such scenes ensue, The force of art by nature seems outdone, And fancied beauties by the true

In happy climes, the seat of inuocence,
Where nature guides and virtue rules,
Where meu shall not impose for truth and sense
The pedantry of courts and schools

There shall be sung another golden age,
The rise of empire and of arts,
The good and great inspiring epic rage,
The wisest heads and noblest hearts.

Not such as Europe breeds in her decay, Such as she bred when fresh and young, When heavenly flame did animate her clay, By future poets shall be sung

Westward the course of empire takes its way,
The four first acts already past,
A fifth shall close the drama with the day,
Time's noblest offspring is the last.

Berkeley's Theory of Vision, long considered a philosophical romance, is now a part of scientific ontics His doctrine of the immateriality of the outer world, which he insisted on regarding as the simplest, most obvious, and only logical way of interpreting our perceptions-that what is perceived is the perceptions, not a dead, mert world of matter lying behind them and (needlessly) inferred from them-puzzled his contemporaries. and has been consistently rejected by all 'common-sense' philosophers and laymen, though the dependence of matter on mind (not my mind but some mind) is a familiar element in idealist Probably his chiefest aim was, by means of his immaterialism, to turn the tables on materialists, and confute those who taught that there is neither soul nor God by proving that we know only our own souls and can logically prove only the existence of other souls, including the Creative Spirit He applied to the analysis and dissolution of the assumed outer material world the principles of Locke's psychology, hardly foreseeing that Hume would afterwards, with greater audacity, apply the same principles to soul as such, and analyse it too, by cognite methods, into fleeting successions of sensations and feelings Berkeley's philosophy is nowhere completely set forth in the form of a systematic treatise, but amongst English writers on abstruse philosophical problems he stands alone for lucidity and charm of exposition, for felicity of illustration, and for the union of gentle but humorous fancy with keen wit and trenchant logic. His style is clear and unaffected, with the easy grace of the polished philosopher, and his descriptions of external nature at times remind one of Izaak The following extracts, from the opening of the first and end of the last of the three Dialogues between Hylas and Philonous, show how skilfully he could manage this device for popularising abstract argument

The Point in Dispute

Philonous Good morrow, Hylas I did not expect to find you abroad so early

Hylas It is indeed something unusual, but my thoughts were so taken up with a subject I was discoursing of last night, that finding I could not sleep, I resolved to rise and take a turn in the garden

Phil It happened well, to let you see what innocent and agreeable pleasures you lose every morning. Can there be a pleasanter time of the day or a more delight ful season of the year? That purple sky, those wild but sweet notes of birds, the frigrent bloom upon the trees and flowers, the gentle influence of the rising sun, these and a thousand nameless beauties of nature inspire the soul with secret transports, its faculties too being at this time fresh and lively, are fit for these meditations, which the solitude of a garden and tranquillity of the morning naturally dispose us to But I am afraid I interrupt your thoughts for you seemed very intent on something

Hy! It is true I was, and shall be obliged to you if you will permit me to go on in the same vein, not that I would by any means deprive myself of your company, for my thoughts always flow more easily in conversation with a friend than when I am alone but my request is, that you would suffer me to impart my reflections to

Phil With all my heart, it is what I should have requested myself if you had not prevented me.

III I was considering the old fate of those men who have in all ages, through in affectation of being dis tinguished from the vulgar, or some unaccountable turn of thought, pretended either to believe nothing at all, or to believe the most extravagant things in the world This however might be borne, if their paradoxes and scepticism did not draw after them some consequences of general disadvantage to mankind. But the mischief lictly here, that when men of less leisure see them who are supposed to have spent their whole time in the pursuits of knowledge professing an entire ignorance of all things, or advancing such notions as are repug nant to plain and commonly received principles, they will be tempted to entertain suspicions concerning the most important truths, which they had hitherto held sacred and unquestionable

Phil I entirely gree with you, as to the ill tendency of the affected doubts of some philosophers, and fan tastical conceits of others. I am even so far gone of late in this way of thinking, that I have quitted several of the sublime notions I had got in their schools for vulgar opinions. And I give it you on my word, since this revolt from inetaphysical notions to the plain dictates of nature and common sense, I find my understanding strangely enlightened, so that I can now easily comprehend a great many things which before were all mystery and riddle.

131 I am glad to find there was nothing in the accounts I heard of you

I'm! Pray, what were those?

Intly I on were represented in last night's conversation as one who maintained the most extravagant opinion that ever entered into the mind of man, to with there is no such thing as material substance in the world

Phil I hat there is no such thing as what philosophers call material substance, I am scriously persuaded but if I were made to see anything absurd or scepacal in this, I should then have the same reason to renounce this that I imagine I have now to reject the contrary opinion

III. What' can anything be hore fantastical, more repugnant to common sense enaction manifest piece of scepticism, than to believed for the o such thing is matter?

Phil Sofily, par I Hylas is of free an int should prove that you, who hold chere is, complying of that opinion, a greater sceptic, and main alone who paradoxes and repugnances to common select, alots who believe no such thing?

Hil You may as soon persuade meistran cir. is greater than the whole, as that in ord differ froid absurdity and scepticism I should ever be obtacted give up my opinion in this point

Phil Well then, are you content to admit that opinion for true, which upon examination shall appear most agreeable to common sense, and remote from scupticism?

III With all my heart Since you are for raising disputes about the plainest things in nature, I am content for once to hear what you have to say

Berkeley's Theory summed up

Phil With all my heart retain the word matter, and apply it to the objects of sense, if you please, provided you do not attribute to them any subsistence distinct from their being perceived. I shall never quarrel with Matter, or material substance, you for an expression are terms introduced by philosophers, and as used by them, imply a sort of independency, or a subsistence distinct from being perceived by a mind but are never used by common people, or if ever, it is to signify the immediate objects of sense. One would think therefore, so long as the names of all particular things, with the terms sensible, substance, body, stuff, and the like, are retained, the word matter should be never missed in common talk And in philosophical discourses it seems the best way to leave it quite out, since there is not perhaps any one thing that hath more favoured and strengthened the depraved bent of the mind toward atheism, than the use of that general confused term.

Hyl Well but, Philonous, since I am content to give up the notion of an unthinking substance exterior to the mind, I think you ought not to deny me the privilege of using the word matter as I please, and annexing it to a collection of sensible qualities subsisting only in I freely own there is no other substance, in a strict sense, than spirit But I have been so long accustomed to the term matter, that I know not how to part with it. To say, there is no matter in the world, is still shocking to me Whereas to say, there is no matter, if by that term be meant an unthinking substance existing without the mind, but if by matter is meant some sensible thing, whose existence consists in being perceived, then there is matter this distinction gives it quite another turn and men will come into your notions with small difficulty, when they are proposed in that For after all, the controversy about matter, in the strict acceptation of it, lies altogether between you and the philosophers, whose principles, I acknowledge, are not near so natural or so agreeable to the common sense of mankind and holy scripture as yours is nothing we either desire or shun, but as it makes or is apprehended to make some part of our happiness But what hath happiness or misery, joy or grief, pleasure or pain, to do with absolute existence, or with unknown entities, abstracted from all relation to us? It is evident, things regard us only as they are pleasing or displeasing and they can please or displease only so far forth as they are perceived Further therefore we are not concerned, and thus far you leave things as Yet still there is something new in this you found them doctrine. It is plain, I do not now think with the phil osophers, nor yet altogether with the vulgar know how the case stands in that respect precisely what 'you have added to or altered in my former notions

Phil I do not pretend to be a setter up of new notions. My endeavours tend only to unite and place in a clearer light that truth which was before shared between the vulgar and the philosophers, the former being of opinion, that those things they immediately perceive are the real things, and the latter, that the things immediately perceived are ideas which exist only in the mind. Which two notions put together do in effect constitute the substance of what I advance.

Myl I have been a long time distrusting my senses, methought I saw things by a dim light, and through false glasses. Now the glasses are removed, and a new light breaks in upon my understanding. I am clearly convinced that I see things in their native forms, and am no longer in pain about their unknown natures or absolute existence. This is the state I find myself in at present though indeed the course that brought me to it I do not yet thoroughly comprehend. You set out upon the same principles that Academics, Cartesians, and the like sects usually do and for a long time it looked as if you were advancing their philosophical scepticism, but in the end your conclusions are directly opposite to theirs.

Phil You see, Hylas, the water of yonder fountain, how it is forced upwards in a round column to a cer tain height, at which it breaks and falls back into the bason from whence it rose its ascent, as well as descent, proceeding from the same uniform law or principle of gravitation. Just so, the same principles which at first view lead to scepticism, pursued to a certain point, bring men back to common sense.

The standard edition of Berkeley is that of Professor Campbell Fraser, with a Life and dissertations (4 vols. 1871, nev ed 1902). Professor Fraser also published a small monograph on Berkeley (1881) and Selections from Berkeley (5th ed 1900). Mr A. J. Lalfour wrote a biographical introduction to the edition of the works by G. Sampson (3 vols. 1897-99).

Joseph Butlet (1692-1752), one of the greatest of English divines and moralists, was born at Wantage in Berkshire, the youngest of the eight children of a retired draper. With a view to the Presbyterian ministry, he attended a Dissenting academy at Gloucester, afterwards at Tewkesbury, where the future Archbishop Secker was his schoolfellow About the age of twenty-two he joined the Church of England, and entered Oriel College, Oxford. Having taken orders in 1718, be was appointed preacher at the Rolls Chapel, where he preached those remarkable sermons which he published in 1726 The first three, On Human Nature, constitute one of the most important contributions ever made to moral science He became prebendary of Salisbury (1721), and rector of Haughton-le-Skerne near Darlington (1722), in 1725 he was presented to the 'golden rectory' of Stanhope, also in Durham Here he resided in great retirement till 1733, busy on his Secker wished to see him promoted to some more important position, and mentioned his name to Queen Caroline The queen thought he had been dead 'No, madam,' said Archbishop Blackburne ('the jolly old Archbishop of York' who, according to Horace Walpole, 'had all the manners of a man of quality though he had been a buccaneer and was a clergyman'), 'he is not dead, but he is buried.' In 1733 Butler became chaplain to his friend Lord Chancellor Talbot, and in 1736 a prebendary of Rochester and clerk of the closet In 1736 he published the to Queen Caroline Analogy of Religion, Natural and Revealed, which, in the words of Chalmers, made him the 'Bacon of theology' In 1738 he was made Bishop of Bristol, in 1740 Dean of St Paul's, in 1747 he declined the primacy, and in 1750 he was trans lated to the see of Durham

Butler takes high rank amongst English moralists. and has had the very greatest influence on Eng lish etbical thinking It is sometimes said that the sum total of his teaching is the insisting on the authority and supremacy of conscience. He de veloped Shaftesbury's moral sense into a higher and more authoritative conscience, he learnt from Aristotle and the Stoics, and he wrote against Mandeville and Hobbes, contending that the social impulses in man are no less natural than the appetites and self-regarding desires-that virtue is more consonant with human nature than vice He not merely emphasises, as vigorously as Kant does, the indefeasibleness of the moral law, but shows ingenuity in constructing an argumentum ad hominem specially applicable to those who deny his main thesis. This method of the argumentum ad hominem is especially characteristic of his great treatise, the Analogy The Leynote of the Analogy is to show that all the objections to revealed religion are equally applicable to the whole constitution of nature, and that the general analogy between the principles of divine government, as revealed in the Scriptures, and those manifested in the course of nature, warrants the conclusion that they have one Author argument is valid against the deists, but it lacks completeness as a defence of Christianity then it seemed hardly enough to pose the deists. unfriendly critics thought the true method of defending Christianity was so to exhibit its excel lences as to make objectors eager to embrace it. Pitt is reported to have said that it raised more doubts than it solved Bagehot not unfairly said that we might expect revelation to explain the difficulties to be found in the religious interpretation of nature, and not to add others of its own Matthew Arnold and Mr Leslie Stephen are amongst those who find Butler's argument unsatisfring Mr Gladstone was one of Butler's most enthusiastic defenders, and seemed even to argue that the Analogy is of as great apologetic value now as it was in Butler's own time.

But for materialists, positivists, thorough going agnostics, Butler's arguments are irrelevant unless you posit the existence of God, and the truth and binding force of 'natural religion,' the Analogy has no fulcrum to work from In Butler's time the dcists were the most conspicuous, the only considerable opponents of revealed religion, and most of them accepted the truths of natural religion as heartily as Butler did Kant and Darwin had not as yet overthrown teleology, and the kind of evidences of religion then demanded were very different from what would now be required. The moral arguments in the Sermons of Butler are less antiquated thru those of the Analogy It was with deists more or less pronounced, and people liable to be influenced by their arguments, that Butler had to do, and it is by the cogency of his argument as addressed to them that he must be judged Butler's great influence, and the place his Sermons and the Analogy secured in the Church and at the universities, owe little to the superficial graces of style. He was a severely logical writer, often dry, sometimes cumbrous, generally vigorous, clear, and effective, at times attaining the force of aphorism, but even in the Sermons there is no declamation and little direct appeal to the feelings

Probability in Religion.

It has been thought by some persons that if the evidence of revelation appears doubtful, this itself turns into a positive argument against it, because it cannot be supposed that if it were true, it would be left to subsist upon doubtful evidence. And the objection against revelation from its not being universal, is often insisted upon as of great weight.

Now the weakness of these opinions may be shown by observing the suppositions on which they are founded, which are really such as these—that it cannot be thought God would have bestowed any favour at all upon us, unless in the degree which we think he might, and which we imagine would be most to our particular advantage, and also that it cannot be thought he would bestow a favour upon any, unless he bestowed the same upon all—suppositions which we find contradicted not by a few instances in God's natural government of the world, but by the general analogy of nature together

Persons who speak of the evidence of religion as doubtful, and of this supposed doubtfulness as a positive argument against it, should be put upon considering what that evidence indeed is which they act upon with regard to their temporal interests, for it is not only extremely difficult, but in many cases absolutely impossible, to balance pleasure and pain, satisfaction and uneasiness, so as to be alle to say on which side the overplus in the first temporal interests and impossibilities in maling the due also ances for a change of temper and taste, for satisty, disgusts, ill health-any of which render men incapable of enjoying, after they have obtained, what they most engerly desired. Numberless, too, are the accidents, besides that one of untimely death, which may even probably disappoint the best concerted schemes, and strong objections are often seen to lie against them, not to be removed or answered, but which seem overbalanced by reasons on the other side, so as that the certain difficulties and dangers of the pur suit arc by every one thought justly disregarded, upon account of the appearing greater advantages in case of success, though there be but little probability of it. Lastly, every one observes our liableness, if we be not upon our guard, to be deceived by the falsehood of men, and the false appearances of things, and this danger must be greatly increased if there be a strong bias within, supposed from indulged passion, to favour the deceit Hence arises that great uncertainty and doubtfulness of proof, wherein our temporal interest really consistswhat are the most probable means of attaining it, and whether those means will eventually be successful. And numberless instances there are in the daily course of life, in which all men think it reasonable to engage in pursuits, though the probability is greatly against succeeding, and to make such provision for themselves as it is supposable they may have occasion for, though the plain acknowledged probability is, that they never Then those who think the objection against revelation, from its light not being universal, to be of weight, should observe that the Author of Nature, in numberless instances, bestows that upon some which he does not upon others, who seem equally to stand in need Indeed he appears to bestow all his gifts with the most promiscuous variety among creatures of the same species-health and strength, capacities of prudence and of knowledge, means of improvement, riches, and all external advantages. And as there are not any two men found of exactly like shape and features, so it is probable there are not any two of an exactly like constitution, temper, and situation, with regard to the goods and evils of life. Yet notwithstanding these uncertainties and varieties, God does exercise a natural government over the world, and there is such a thing as a prudent and imprudent institution of life, with regard to our health and our affairs, under that his natural government (From the Analogy, Part n. Chap vl.)

See the splendid edition of Butler's Works by Mr Gladstone (s vols. 1896), his Subsidiary Studies on him (1896), Lives by Bartlett (1839), Collins (1881) and Spooner (1902) and Lightfoot's Leaders in the Northern Church (1890) and Mr Leslie Stephen's History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century (1876). The editions of the Sermons and of the Analogy are innumerable.

John Leland (1691-1766), born at Wigan and educated at Dublin, became a Presbyterian minister in Ireland. He wrote industriously against Tindal, Morgan, and other deists, but is remembered specially from the often-quoted View of the Principal Deistical Writers (1754-56)

William Wai burton (1698-1779), Bishop of Gloucester, had a bold and original way of thinking, indomitable self-will and arrogance, ponderous learning, and a gift of copious utterance, he was cager to astonish and arrest the attention of mankind, but his writings, after passing like a splendid meteor across the horizon of liis own age, have all but sunk into oblivion. He was the son of an attorney at Newark, and there he began by following the same profession A passion for study having led him to qualify meanwhile for the Church, in 1723 he took deacon's orders, and by the dedication of a volume of translations, obtained a presentation to a small vicarage. He now threw himself amidst the literary society of the metropolis, and sought for subsistence and advancement by his pen. On obtaining from a patron the rectory of Brant Broughton in Lincolnshire, he retired thither, and devoted himself for eighteen years to unremitting study work of any note was The Alliance between Church and State (1736), which, though scarcely calculated to please either party in the Church, brought the author into notice. But it was in The Divine Legation of Moses, demonstrated on the Principles of a Religious Deist from the Omission of the Doctrine of a Future State of Rewards and Punishments in the Jewish Dispensation (1738-41), that the scholarship of Warburton was first fairly displayed. It was objected to the fewish religion that it nowhere acknowledges a future state of rewards and punishments Warburton, who delighted in paradox, instead of attempting to deny this or explain it away, asserted that therein lav the strongest argument for the divine mission of Moses—because no mere human legislator would have dispensed with the supernatural sanction of morals and religion. Ransacking the domains of pagan antiquity, he reared such a mass of curious and confounding argument that mankind was awed into partial agreement with his views In support of his startling thesis, he wanders -discursively into endless subsidiary inquiries, and supplies lack of evidence by abusing all kinds of opponents in his footnotes-the place of execution' There is a constant polemic, either by violent assault or casual innuendo, on contemporary deists and freethinkers He never completed the worl, he became, indeed, weary of it, and perhaps the fallacy of the hypothesis was first secretly acknowledged by himself Gibbon, in his autobiography, called the work 'a monument already crumbling in the dust of the vigour and weakness of the human mind' Bentley said, 'The man has monstrous appetite and bad digestion.' He showed no real speculative power or profundity of thought.

The merits of the author, or his worldly wisdom, brought him preferment in the Church he rose through the grades of prebendary of Gloucester, prebendary of Durham, and Dean of Bristol to be (1759) Bishop of Gloucester He had early forced himself into notice by his writings, but one material cause of his advancement was his friend-ship with Pope. He had secured the poet's favour by defending the ethical and theological orthodoxy of the Essay on Man, and by writing commentaries on that and other poems, and Pope in return left him the property or copyright of his works, the value of which Johnson estimated at £,1000 Pope had also introduced him to Ralph Allen, one of the wealthiest and most benevolent men of his day, the Squire Allworthy of Fielding's Tour Jones, and Warburton took advantage of this introduction to secure the hand of Allen's niece and obtain a large fortune. To Pope he was also indebted for an acquaintance with Lord Mansfield, through whose influence he was made preacher of Lincoln's Inn (1746) He was remiss in episcopal duties, but was constantly at feud with Bolingbroke and Hume, Voltaire and the deists, as well as with fortin. Lowth, and Wesley, and his great learning was thrown away on paradoxical speculations His notes and commentaries on Shakespeare and Pope are lacking in taste and real insight-Douce said that of all Shakespeare's commentators he was 'surely the worst'-but they often display curious erudition and ingenuity. His arrogance and dogmatism became proverbial His force of character and various learning, always ostentatiously displayed, gave him a high name and authority in his own day, but posterity refused to ratify the judgment.

The Rationalizing of the Greek Mythology

Here matters rested, and the vulgar faith seems to have remained a long time undisturbed. But as the age grew refined, and the Greeks became inquisitive and learned, the common mythology began to give offence The speculative and more delicate were shocked at the absurd and immoral stories of their gods, and scandalised to find such things make an authentic part of their story It may indeed, be thought matter of wonder how such tales, taken up in a barbarous age, came not to sinl into oblivion as the age grew more knowing, from mere abhorrence of their indecencies and shame of their absurdities Without doubt, this had been their fortune but for an unlucky circumstance. The great poets of Greece, who had most contributed to refine the public taste and manners, and were now grown into a kind of sacred anthority, had sanctified these silly legends by their writings, which time had now consigned to immortality

Vulgar paganism, therefore, in such an age as this, lying open to the attacks of curious and inquisitive men, would not, we may well think, be long at rest. It is true, freethinking then lay under great difficulties and discouragements To insult the religion of one's country, which is now the mark of learned distinction, was branded in the ancient world with public infamy 1 ct freethinkers there were, who, as is their wont, together with the public worship of their country, threw off all reverence for religion in general. Amongst these was Euhemerus, the Messenian, and, by what we can learn, the most distinguished of this tribe. This man, in mere wintonness of heart, began his attacks on religion by divulging the secret of the mysteries. But as it was capital to do this directly and professedly, he contrived to cover his perfidy and malice by the intervention of a kind of Utopian romance. He pretended 'that in a certain city, which he came to in his travels, he found this grand secret, that the gods were dead men defied, preserved in their sacred writings, and confirmed by monumental records inscribed to the gods themselves, who were there said to be interred? So far was not amiss, but then, in the genuine spirit of his class, who never cultivate a truth but in order to graft a lie upon it, he pretended 'that dead mortals were the first gods, and that an imaginary divinity in these early heroes and conquerors created the idea of a superior power, and introduced the practice of religious worship amongst m n' The learned reader sees below, that our free thinler is true to his cause, and endeavours to verify the fundamental principle of his sect, that fear first made gods, even in that very instance where the contrary pastion seems to have been at its height, the time when men made gods of their deceased benefactors matter of addre shides the shame of so perverse a piece of malice. He represents those founders of society and fathers of their country under the idea of destructive conquerors, who, by mere force and fear, had brought men into subjection and slavery On this account it was that indignant antiquity concurred in giving Euliemerus the proper name of atheist, which however he would hardly have escaped though he had done no more than divulge the secret of the mysteries, and had not poisoned his discovery with this impious and foreign addition, so contrary to the true spirit of that secret

This detection had been long dreaded by the orthodox protectors of pagan wor hip and they were provided of a temporary defence in their intricate and properly perplexed system of symbolic adoration. But this would do only to stop a breach for the present, till a better could be provided, and was too weak to stand alone against so violent an attack. The philosophers, there fore, now took up the defence of paganism where the priests had left it, and to the others symbols added their own allegories, for a second cover to the absurdities of the ancient mythology [Here uncient authorities are quoted ] I or all the genuine seets of philosophy, as we have observed, were steady patriots, legislation making one essential part of their philosophy, and to legislate without the foundation of a national religion was, in their opinion, building eastles in the air So that we are not to wonder they took the alarm, and opposed these insulters of the public worship with all their But as they never lost sight of their proper character they so contrived that the defence of the national religion should terminate in a recommendation of their philosophie speculations. Hence their support of the public worship and their evasion of Euhemerus's charge turned upon this proposition, 'That the whole ancient inythology was no other than the vehicle of physical moral, and divine knowledge.' And to this it is that the learned Eusebius refers, where he says 'that a new race of men refined their old gross theology, and give it an honester look, and brought it nearer to the truth of thing '

However, this proved a troublesome work, and after all ineffectual for the security of men's private morals which the example of the heatitions story according to the letter would not fail to influence how well soever the allegorie interpretation was calculated to cover the public honour of religion, so that the more ethical of the plulo ophers grew prevish with what gave them so much trouble, and answered so little to the interior of religious practice. This made them break out from time to time into hest, resentments against their capital procts, unsuitable, one would than to the dignity of the authors of such noble recondite truths as they would persuade us to believe were treasured up in their writings. Hence it was that Plato banished Homer from his republic, and that Pythagoras, in one of his extra mundane adventures, saw both Homer and Hesiod doing penance in hell, and hung up there for example, to be bleached and purified from the grossness and pollution of their ideas.

The first of these allegorisers, as we learn from Lacr tius, was Anaxagoras, who, with his friend Metrodorus, turned Homer's mythology into a system of ethics. Next came Hereelides Ponticus, and of the same fables made as good a system of physics. And last of all, when the necessity became more pressing, Proclus undertook to shew that all Homer's fables were no other than physical, ethical, and moral allegories.

(From The Divine Legation, Book iii. Section 6.)

Bishop Hurd published a sumptious edition of Warburtons works in seven quartos (1788), a later edition (1811) was in twelve volume. In The Principles of Natural and Revealed Religion we have sermons.

Colley Cibber (1671-1757), actor, manager, and dramatist, was born in London, the son of the Holstein sculptor, Caius Gabriel Cibber or Cibert, who settled in England during the Com monwealth, and executed sculptures for the London Monument, the old Royal Exchange, Bethlehem Hospital, St Paul's, and Chatsworth Young Colley, named after his mother's family, was educated at Grantham, and in 1690 joined the Theatre Royal in Drury Lane, where he remained, with short intervals, during his whole theatrical career of forty-three years In 1696 he produced his first comedy, Love's Last Shift, himself playing Sir Novelty Fashion, and so established his fame both as dramatist and actor thirty pieces are ascribed to him, some of them tragedies and some 'musical entertainments and farces' Not a few are rechauffes from Shake speare, Beaumont and Fletcher, Dryden, and others, two or more plays being sometimes in Several are geniously welded into a new one Among the best known are from the French Woman's Wit, She Would and She Would Not, and The Provoked Husband (the latter completed from Vanbrugh's manuscript) Cibber contributed largely to the improvement in decency which fol lowed Jeremy Collier's famous philippic in 1698, his comedies do not rely for ludicrous effects on He was a strong Hanothe outraged husband verian, and as poet-laureate from 1730 onwards wrote some sufficiently tiresome and absurd odes But even they could not justify Pope in making Cibber the hero (in place of Theobald) in the 1743 issue of the Dunciad, where these lines occur

How with less reading than makes felons 'scape, Less human genius than God gives an ape, Small thanks to France and none to Rome or Greece, A past, vamped, future, old, revived, new piece 'Twixt Plautus, Fletcher, Congreve and Corneille Can make a Cibber, Johnson, or Ozell

Cibber was no poet, he was vain and a loose liver, but he was assuredly not a dullard. Pope's first sneers, in the early editions of the Duncial and elsewhere, Cibber took good-humouredly As Pope grew more abusive, the other became aggressive in self-defence, and by his retalintory pamphlets and scurrilous stories had the satisfaction of making his sensitive foe writhe with vexation Cibber had the misfortune to have Fielding also for a persistent enemy, for reasons not so easily discovered Fielding was severe on him for his alterations on Shakespeare's plays, of one of which Cibber had self-complacently said. 'I have endeavoured to make it more like a play than I found it in Shakespeare.' Strange to say, Cibber's modification of Richard III., with the famous line 'Off with his head I so much for Buckingham!' had almost undisputed possession of the stage in London till Mr Irving re stored the Shakespearean tradition The Nomin or. an adaptation of Molicre's Tartuffe, was of course ultra loyal, and survives in The Hypocrite, still occasionally performed Towards the close of the nineteenth century Mr Augustus Daly and his American company revived She Would and She Would Not, unquestionably one of Cibber's best comedies His own Apology for the Life of Mr Colley Cibber, Comedian (1740, new edition by Lowe, 1888), is a greater literary success than any of his plays, it is a really interesting autobiography as well as a lively history of the stage in his own time, though the statements are at times both vague and inaccurate -His son, Theophilus (1703-58), was also an actor and dramatist. The following extract from She Would and

The following extract from She Would and She Would Not deals with two ladies travelling disguised as men, an attendant, and

On his Critics

Here perhaps I may again seem to be vain, but if all these facts are true (as true they are) how can I help it? Why ain I obliged to conceal them? The merit of the best of them is not so extraordinary as to have warned me to be nice upon it, and the praise due to them is so small a fish, it was scarce worth while to throw my line into the water for it. If I confess my vanity while a boy, can it be vanity when a man to remember it? And if I have a tolerable feature, will not that as much belong to my picture as an imperfection? In a word, from what I have mentioned, I would observe only this, that when we are conscious of the least comparative merit in our selves, we should take as much care to concerl the value we set upon it as if it were a real defect. To be elated or vain upon it, is showing your money before people in want, ten to one but some who may think you have too much mny borrow, or pick your pocket, before you get home. He who assumes praise to himself, the world will think overpays himself. Even the suspicion of being vain ought as much to be dreaded as the guilt itself Cusar was of the same opinion in regard to his wife's Praise, though it may be our due, is not like a bankbill, to be paid upon demand, to be valuable it must be voluntary. When we are dunned for it, -we have a right and privilege to refuse it. If compulsion insists upon it, it can only be paid, as persecution in points of faith is, in a counterfeit coin, and who ever believed occasional conformity to be sincere? Nero, the most vain coxcomb of a tyrant that ever breathed, could not ruse nn unfeigned applituse of his harp by military execution, even where praise is deserved, ill inture and self conceit (pressions that poll a inajority of mankind) will with less reluctance part with their money than their approbation. Men of the greatest ment are forced to stay till they die, before the world will furly make up their necount, then indeed you have a chance for your full due, because it is less grudged when you are incapable of enjoying it then perhaps even malice shall heap praises upon your memory, though not for your sake, but that your surviving competitors may suffer by a comparison. It is from the same principle that satire shall have a thousand readers where panegyric has one. When I therefore find my nan e at length in the satirical works of our most celebrated living author, I never look upon those lines as malice meant to me (for he knows I never provoked it) but profit to himself one of his points must be to live many readers. He considers that my face and name are more known than those of many thousands of more consequence in the kingdom that therefore, right or wrong, a lick at the laureat will always le a sure but, ad captandum vulyus, to eateh him little realer. and that to gratify the unlearned, by no vand then interspersing those merry sacrifices of an oll acquaintance to their taste, is a piece of quite right poetical craft but as a little bad poetry is the greatest crime he lays to my charge, I am willing to subscribe to his opinion of it. That this sort of wit is one of the easiest ways too of Heasing the generality of readers, is evident from the comfortable subsistence which our weekly retailers of politics have been known to pick up, merely by making hold with a government that had unfortunately neglected to find their general better employment.

Hence too arises all that flat poverty of censure and invective that lo often has a run in our public papers, upon the success of a new author, when, God knows, there is seldom above one writer, among hundreds in being at the same time, whose satire a man of common sense ought to be moved at. When a master in the art is angry, then indeed we ought to be alarmed! How terrible a weapon is satire in the hand of a great genius! Yet even there how hable is prejudice to misuse it! How far, when general, it may reform our morals, or what cruelties it may inflict by being angrily particular, is perhaps above in reach to determine shall therefore only beg leave to interpose what I feel for others whom it may personally have fallen upon When I read those mortifying lines of our most eminent author in his character of Attiens-(Attieus, whose genius in verse, and whose morality in prose, has been so justly admired)-though I ain charmed with the poctry, my imagination is hurt at the severity of it, and though I allow the saturist to have had personal provocation, yet methinks, for that very reason, he ought not to have troubled the public with it. For, as it is observed in the 242d Tatler, 'in all terms of reproof, where the sentence appears to arise from personal hatred or passion, it is not then made the cause of mankind, but a misunderstanding between two persons? But if such kind of satire has its incon testable greatness if its exemplary brightness may not mislead inferior wits into a barbirous imitation of its severity, then I have only admired the verses, and expo el myself by bringing them under so scrupulous But the pain which the acrimony of a reflection those verses give me is in some measure allayed, in funding that this immitable writer, as he advances in years, has since had candour enough to celebrate the same person for his visible merit. Happy genius l whose verse, like the eye of beauty, can heal the deepest wounds with the least glance of favour

Since I am got so far into this subject, you must give me leave to go through all I have a mind to say upon it, because I am not sure that in a more proper place my memory may be so full of it. I cannot find therefore from what reason satire is allowed more license than comedy, or why either of them (to be admired) ought not to be limited by decency and justice Let Juvenal and Aristophanes have taken what liberties they please, if the learned have nothing more than their antiquity to justify their laying about them at that enormous rate, I shall wish they had a better excuse for them. The personal relicule and scurrility thrown upon Socrates, which Platarch too condenins, and the boldness of Juvenal in writing real names over guilty characters, I canno' that are to be pleaded in right of our modern liberties of the same kind Facil indignatio versum may be a very spirited expression, and seems to give a render hopes of a lively entertainment, but I am afruid reproof is in unequal hands, when anger is its executioner, and though an outrageous invective may carry some truth in it, yet it will never have that natural easy credit with us which we give to the laughing ironies of a cool head The satire that can smile arcum pracordia ludit, and seldom fails to bring the reader quite over to his side, whenever ridicule and folly are at variance. But when a person satirized is used with the extremest ingour, he may sometimes meet with compassion instead of con tempt, and throw back the odium that was designed for When I would therefore disarm him upon the author the saturist of this indignation, I mean little more than that I would take from him all private or personal prejudice, and would still leave him as much general vice to seourge as he pleases, and that with as much fire and spirit as art and nature demand to enliven his work and keep his reader awake (From the Apology)

Charles Macklin (born between 1690 and 1697, died 1797), actor and playwright, was born in the north of Ireland, the son of William After a wild, unsettled youth he M'Laughlin went on the stage, and in 1733 was at Drury Lane, and, steadily rising in public favour, in 1741 he appeared as Shylock From this time till his retirement in 1789 he was accounted one of the best actors whether in tragedy or comedy, in Generous, high spirited, passion or buffoonery but irascible, in 1735 he killed a brother actor in a quarrel over a wig, and was tried for murder, and he died in extreme old age, at least a centenarian, in 1797 He wrote a tragedy and several farces and comedies, the farce Love à-la Mode (1759) and farcical comedy The Man of the World (1781) only were printed Sir Pertinay Macsycophant, a burlesque character, has become part of our literary tradition The dialect he uses belongs also to the realm of burlesque. What are supposed to be Scotch words and Scotch pronunciations of Eng lish words are scattered irregularly and arbitrarily through the speeches of the Scottish interlocutors. Most of these are actually Scottish in some sense, but by no means show the peculiarities that then clung to the utterance of well-born Scotsmen and And many Scotch words are in Scotswomen vented (as they still are in England) on false analogies Thus because batth in Scotch corre sponds to the English both, and aith to oath, it is assumed (quite erroneously) that traith will be Scotch for troth-hence we have 'gude traith' constantly and absurdly So because bone in England is bane in Scotland, only is made to become amb in a Scottish mouth! Nai does duty for a Scotsman's nac, na, and no, a past tense ganged is supplied to gang, and the provincial English thef (for though) is taken as normal Scotch

Sir Pertinax's son Egerton, in love with a penniless girl, has refused to become a party to his father's scheme to secure for him the daughter of a dissolute (Scotch) peer, and in a heated conversation between father and son we have a luminous exposition of

Sir Pertinax's Rule of Life

Sir Pertmar Zounds! sir, I will not hear a word about it I insist upon it you are wrong, you should have paid your court till my lord, and not have scrupled swallowing a bimper or twa, or twenty till obbge him.

Egerton Sir, I did drinl his toast in a bumper

Sir P Yes, you did, but how, how? just as a bairn takes physic, with aversions and wry faces, which my lord observed then, to mend the matter, the moment that he and the Colonel got intill a drunken dispute about religion, you slyly slunged away

Eger I thought, sir, it was time to go, when my lord insisted npon half pint bumpers

Sir P Sir, that was not levelled at you, but at the Colonel, in order to try his bottom, but they aw agreed that you and I should drink out of sma' glasses.

Eser But, sir, I beg pardon I did not choose to drink any more.

Sir P Lut, zoons! sir, I tell you there was a necessity for your drinling more

Lger A necessity 1 in what respect, pray, sir 2

Sir P Why, sir, I have a certain point to carry, independent of the lawvers, with my lord, in this agreement of your marriage, about which I am afraid we shall have a warm squabble, and therefore I wanted your assistance in it.

Eger But how, sir, could my drinking contribute to assist you in your squabble?

Sir P Yes, sir, it would have contributed—and greatly have contributed to assist me.

Eger How so sir?

Sir P Nay, sir, it might have prevented the squabble entirely, for as my lord is proud of you for a son in law, and is fond of your little French songs, your stories, and your bon mots, when you are in the humour, and guin you had but staid, and been a little jolly, and drank half a score bumpers vith him, till he had got a little tipsy, I am sure, when we had him in that mood, we might have settled the point as I could wish it among ourselves, before the lawyers came but now, sir, I do not ken what will be the consequence

Eger But when a man is intoxicated, would that have been a seasonable time to settle business, sur?

Sir P The most seasonable, sir, for sir, when my lord is in his cups, his suspicion is asleep, and his heart is aw jollity, finn, and guid fellowship, and sir, can there be a happier moment than that for a bargain, or to settle a dispute with a friend? What is it you shrug up your shoulders at, sir?

Eger At my own ignorance, sir for I understand neither the philosophy nor the morality of your doctrine.

Sir P I know you do not, sir and, what is worse, you never will understand it, as you proceed in one word, Charles, I have often told you, and nov again I tell you, once for aw, that the manœuvres of pliability are as necessary to rise in the world, as wrangling and logical subtlety are to rise at the bar why you see, sir, I have acquired a noble fortune, a princely fortune and how do you think I raised it?

Eger Doubtless, sir, by your abilities

Sir P Doubtless, sir, you are a blockhead nac, sir, I'll tell you how I raised it sir, I raised it—by booing, [bows ridiculously low] by booing sir, I never could stand straight in the presence of a great mon, but always booed, and booed, and booed—as it were by instinct.

Eger How do you mean by instinct, sir?

Sir P How do I mean by instinct! Why, sir, I mean by by by the instinct of interest, sir, which is the universal instinct of manlind. Sir, it is wonderful to think what a cordial, what an amicable—nay, what an infallible influence booing has noon the pride and vanity of human nature. Charles, answer me sincerely, have you a mind to be convinced of the force of my doctrine by example and demonstration?

Leer Certainly, sir

Sir P Then, sir, as the greatest favour I can confer upon vou, I'll give you a short sketch of the stages of my booing, as an excitement, and a landmark for you to boo by, and as an infallible nostrum for a man of the world to rise in the world

Eger Sir, I shall be prond to profit by your expen-

Sir P Vary weel, sir, sit ye down theu, sit you down here. [They sit down] And now, sir, you must recall to your thoughts, that your grandfather was a mon whose penurious income of captain's half pay was the sum total of his fortune, and, sir, aw my provision fra him was a modicum of Latin, an experiness in arithmetic, and a short system of worldly counsel, the principal ingredients of which were, a persevering industry, a rigid economy, a smooth tongue, a pliability of temper, and a constant attention to make every mon well pleased with himself

Eger Very prudent advice, sir

Sir P Therefore, sir, I lay it before you. Now, sir, with these materials, I set out a raw boned stripling fra the North, to try my fortune vith them here in the south, and my first step in the world was a beggarly clerkship in Sawny Gordon's counting house, here, in the city of London which you'll say afforded but a barren sort of a prospect.

Eger It was not a very fertile one, indeed, sir

Sir P The reverse, the reverse weel, sir, seeing myself in this unprofitable situation, I reflected deeply, I cast about my thoughts morning, noon, and night, and marked every mou, and every mode of prosperity, at last, I concluded that a matrimonial adventure, prudently conducted, would be the readiest gait I could gang for the bettering of my condition, and accordingly I set about it. Now, sir, in this pursuit, beauty beauty is ah beauty often struck my een, and played about my heart and fluttered, and beat, and knocked, and knocked but the devil an entrance I ever let it get for I observed, sir, that beauty is, generally,—a proud, vain, saucy, expensive, impertment sort of a commodity

Eger Very justly observed

Sir P And therefore, sir, I left it to prodigals and coxcombs, that could afford to pay for it, and, in its stead, sir, mark —I looked ont for an ancient, weel jointured, superanninted dowager, a consumptive, tooth less, phthisicky, wealthy widow, or a shrivelled, cadaverous piece of deformity, in the shape of an izzard, or an appersi and—or, in short, ainything, ainything that had the siller—the siller—for that, sir, was the north star of my affections. Do you take me, sir was nae that right?

Eger O1 doubtless, doubtless, sir

Sir P Now, sir, where do you think I ganged to look for this woman with the siller? nae till court, nae till phyloures or assemblies, nine, sir, I ganged till the kirk, till the analoptist, independent, Bradlonian, and Muggletonian meetings, till the morning and even ing service of chirches and chapels of ease, and till the midnight, incling conciliating love feasts of the methodists, and there, sir, at last, I fell upon an old, slighted, antiquated, musty maiden, that looked—ha, ha, ha' she looked just like a skeleton in a sur geon's glass case. Now, sir, this miserable object was religiously angry with herself and aw the world, had nac coinfort but in metaphysical visions and supernatural deliriums—ha, ha, ha' Sir, she was as mad—as mad as a Bellmuite.

I ser Not improbable, sir there are numbers of poor creatures in the same condition

Now, sir, this cracked Sir P O' numbers—numbers creature used to pray, and sing, and sigh, and groan, and weep, and wal, and gnash her teeth constantly, morning and evening, at the tabernacle in Moor And as soon as I found she had the siller, aha l good truth, I plumped me down upon my knees, close by her-cheek by jowl-and prayed, and sighed, and sung and groaned, and gnashed my teeth as vehemently as she could do for the life of her, ay, and turned up the whites of mine cen, till the strings awmost cracked again I watched her motions, handed her till her chair, writed on her home, got most religiously intimate with her in a week, married her in a fortnight, buried her in a month, touched the siller, and with a deep suit of inourning, a melancholy port, a sorrowful visage, and a joyful heart, I began the world aguin, (rises) and this, sir, was the first boo, that is the first effectual boo I ever made till the vanity of human nature Now, sir, do you understand this doctrine?

Egy Perfectly well, sir

Sir P Ay, but was it not right? was it not ingenious, and weel litt off?

Lger Certainly, sir extremely well

Sir P My next boo, sir, was till your ain mother, whom I ran away with fra the boarding school, by the Interest of whose family I got a guid smart place in the treasury, and, sir, my vary next step was in till parlia ment, the which I entered with as ardent and as determined an ambition as ever agitated the heart of Crear lumself Sir, I bookd, and watched and hearkened. and run about, backwards and forwards, and attended, and dangled upon the then great mon, till I got into the vary bowels of his confidence, and then sir, I wriggled, and wrought, and wriggled, till I wriggled myself among the very thick of them IIn' I got my snack of the clothing, the foriging, the contracts, the lottery tickets. and all the political bonuses, till at length, sir, I became a much wealthier man than one half of the golden calves I had been so long a booing to and was nae that booing to come purpo e?

Eger It was indeed, sir

Sir P. But are you convinced of the guid effects and of the utility of booing?

Eger Thoroughly, sir

Sir P Sir, it is infallible. But, Charles, ali while I was thus been and wriggling, and ruising this princely fortun, ali I met with many heartsores and disappoint ments fra the want of literature, cloquence, and other popular abecute. Sir, guin I could but have spoken in the hone I should have done the deed in half the time, but the instant I opened my mouth there they aw fell a laughing at me, aw which deficiencies, sir, I determined, at any expense, to have supplied by the polished education of a son, who I hoped would one day raise the house of Macsycophant till the highest pitch of ministerial ambition. This, sir, is my plan, I have done my part of it, Nature has done hers, you are popular, you are eloquent, aw parties like and respect you, and now, sir, it only remains for you to be directed—com pletion follows

Ege: Your liberality, sir, in my education, is an obligation I shall ever remember with the deepest filial gratitude.

Str P Vary weel, sir but, Charles, have you had any conversation yet with Lady Rodolpha, about the day of your marriage, your liveries, your equipage, or your domestic establishment?

Eger Not yet, sir

Str P Poh! why there again, now, you are wrong, vary wrong

Lger Sir, we have not had an opportunity

Str P Why, Charles, you are very tardy in this business

Lord Lumbercourt [Sings without, flushed with wine]
'What have we with day to do?'

Sir P O! here comes my lord

Lord L 'Sons of care, 'twas made for you' [Enters, drinking a dish of coffee] 'Sons of care, 'twas made for you' Very good coffee indeed, Mr Tomlins. 'Sons of care, 'twas made for you' Here, Mr Tomlins.

Tom Will your lordship please to have another dish?

Lord L No more, Mr Tomlins Ha, ha, ha I my host of the Scotch pints we have had warm work

Sir P Yes, you pushed the bottle about, my lord, with the joy and vigour of a bacchianal

Lord I That I did, my dear Mac, no loss of time with me I have but three motions, old boy-charge, toast, fire—and off we go Ha, ha, ha, that's my exercise.

Sir P And fine warm exercise it is, my lord, especially with the half pint glasses.

Another characteristic speech by Sir Pertinny, addressed also to his son, is Conscience! why you are mad! Did you ever hear any man talk of conscience in political matters? Conscience, quotha! I have been in parliament these three and thraty years, and never heard the term made use of before. Sir, it is an unparliamentary word, and you will be laughed at for it

There are careful Lives of Macklin by F. A. Congreve (1798) and Parry (1891). Those by Kirkman (1799) and Cooke (1804) must be used with caution.

George Lillo (1693-1739), born in London of mixed Dutch and English Dissenting parentage, succeeded his father as a jeweller, carried on the business successfully, and left a modest fortune. Devoting his leisure hours to writing tragedies founded on the sorrows of real life in the lower and middling ranks, he wrote in all seven dramas, among them George Barnwell, Fatal Curiosity, and Arden of Feversham. The last is a weak version of an anonymous tragedy written in 1592, where, and in the Vorkshire Tragedy and one or two other plays founded on domestic occur rences, the style of Lillo may be said to have been foreshadov ed. These realistic plays, however (see Vol. I p 334), were rude and irregular, and were driven off the stage by the romantic drama of Shakespeare and his successors. At all events such 'domestic tragedies,' which had disappeared during the Commonwealth and Restoration, were revived by Lillo and his school, who had great influence on French dramatists. Lillo had a competent knowledge of dramatic art, and his style was generally smooth and easy. His George Barnwell (1731) describes the career of a London apprentice hurried on to ruin and murder by an infamous woman, who at last delivers him up to justice and to an ignominious death The characters are natural, and George Barnwell drew more tears than the rants of Alexander the Great' Lillo's Fatal Curiosity (1736) is a far higher work. Driven by destitution, an old man and his wife murder a rich stranger who takes shelter in their house, and discover too late that they have murdered their son returned after a long absence abroad. The harrowing details of this tragedy are power fully depicted, the agonies of old Wilmot, the father, make an appalling picture. The other plays were Marina, an adaptation of Shake speare's Pericles, Scanderbeg, or the Christian Hero, Elmerick, based on a passage of Hungarian history, and a feeble masque, Britannia and Batavia Fielding's friendship helped Lillo's popularity, and after the dramatist's death Fielding said of him that 'he had the spirit of an old Roman, joined to the innocence of a primitive Christian' A parallel to Lillo's realism has been sought, not merely in a succession of imitations on the stage, but in Fielding's novels and in Lessing's rebellion against French taste in the German theatre. The execution of Lillo's plays is unequal, and some of his characters are dull and commonplace, but he was a forcible painter of the darker shades of humble life. His plays kept the stage till the close of the century, since then the taste for murders and public executions has declined

From Fatal Curiosity'

[Young Wilmot unknown, enters the house of his parents, and, returng for an hour's rest, delivers them a casket. Act iii, opens on Agnes, the mother alone with the casket in her hand ]

Agnes Who should this stranger be? And then this He says it is of value, and yet trusts it, [casket--As if a trifle, to a stranger's hand His confidence amazes me. Perhaps It is not what he says. I'm strongly tempted To open it and see. No, let it rest Why should my curiosity excite me To search and pre into the affairs of others, Who have to employ my thoughts so many cares And sorrows of my own? With how much ease The spring gives way! Surprising! most prodigious! My eyes are dazzled, and my ravished heart Leaps at the glorions sight How bright's the lustre, How immense the worth of those fair jewels ! Ay, such a treasure would expel for ever

Base poverty and all its abject train, The mean devices we're reduced to use To keep ont famine, and preserve our lives From day to day, the cold neglect of friends. The galling scorn, or more provoking pity Of an insulting world Possessed of these-Plenty, content, and power, might take their turn. And lofty pride bare its aspiring head At our approach, and once more bend before us A pleasing dream 1 'Tis past, and now I wake More wretched by the happiness I've lost. For sure it was a happiness to think, Though but a moment, such a treasure mine. Nay, it was more than thought I saw and touched The bright temptation, and I see it yet. 'Tis here-'tis mine-I have it in possession Must I resign it? Must I give it back? Am I in love with misery and want. To rob myself and court so vast a loss? But how? There is a way Retain it then Why sinks my heart? Why does my blood run cold? Why am I thrilled with horror? 'Tis not choice, But dire necessity, suggests the thought. Old Wilmot [entering] The mind contented, with how The wandering senses yield to soft repose, And die to gain new life! He's fallen asleep Already-happy man! What dost thou think, My Agnes, of our unexpected guest? He seems to me a youth of great humanity Just ere he closed his eyes, that swam in tears, He wrung my hand, and pressed it to his lips, And with a look that pierced me to the soul, Begged me to comfort thee, and — Dost thou hear me? What art thou gazing on? Fie, 'tis not well. This casket was delivered to you closed Why have you opened it? Should this be known, How mean must we appear ! 4 encs And who shall know it?

Agnes And who shall know it?

Wil There is a kind of pride, a decent dignity

Due to ourselves, which, spite of our misfortunes,

May be maintained and cherished to the last.

To live without reproach, and without leave

To quit the world, shews sovereign contempt

And noble scorn of its relentless malice.

Agner Shews sovereign madness, and a scorn of sense!

Pursue no further this detested theme

I will not die I will not leave the world

For all that you can nrge, until compelled

Wil To chase a shadow when the setting sun
Is darting his last rays, were just as wise
As your anxiety for fleeting life,
Now the last means for its support are failing
Were famine not as mortal as the sword
This warmth might be excused. But take thy choice Die how you will, you shall not die alone.

Agnes Nor live, I hope.

Wil There is no fear of that.

Agnes Then we'll live both.

Wil Strange folly' Where's the means?

Aguer The means are there, those jewels

Wil Ha! take heed

Perhaps thou dost but try me, yet take heed There's nought so monstrous but the mind of man In some conditions may be brought to approve, Thest, sacrilege, treason, and parriende, When flattering opportunity enticed And desperation drove, have been committed By those who once would start to hear them named Agnes And add to these detested suicide, Which, by a crime much less, we may avoid Wil The inhospitable murder of our guest? How couldst thou form a thought so very tempting, So advantageous, so secure, and easy, And yet so cruel and so full of horror? Agnes 'Tis less impiety, less against nature, To take anothers life than end our own IVII It is no matter whether this or that Be in itself the less or greater crime Howe'er we may deceive ourselves or others, We act from inclination, not hy rule, Or none coul I act amiss And that all err, None but the conscious hypocrite denies Oh, what is man, his excellence and strength, When in an hour of trial and desertion, Reason, his noblest power, may be saborned To plead the cause of vile assassination ! Agnes I on 're too severe reason may justly plead For her own preservation Whate'er resistance I may seem to make, I am betrayed within my will's seduced, And my whole soul infected. The desire Of life returns, and brings with it a train Of appetites that rage to be supplied. Whoever stands to parley with temptation Does it to be o ercome.

Agues Then nought remains
But the swift execution of a deed
That is not to be thought on or delayed
We must despatch him sleeping should be wake,
'Twere madness to attempt it.

Iffil True, his strength,

Single, is more, much more than ours united, So may his life, perlups, as far exceed Ours in duration, should he 'scape this snare. Generous, unhappy man' Oh, what could move thee To put thy life and fortune in the hands Of wretches mad with anguish'

Agnes By what means By stabbing, suffocation, or by strungling, Shall we effect his death?

Why, what a fiend!

How cruel, how remorseless, how impatient
Have pride and poverty made thee!

Agnes
Barbarous man!
Whose wasteful riots ruined our estate,
And drove our son, ere the first down had spread

Whose wasteful nots ruined our estate,
And drove our son, ere the first down had spread
His rosy cheeks, spite of my sad presages,
Earnest entreaties, agonies, and tears,
To seek his bread 'mongst strangers, and to perish
In some remote inhospitable land
The loveliest youth in person and in mind
That ever crowned a groaning mother's pains!
Whire was thy pity, where thy patience then?
Thou cruel husband! thou unnatural father!
Thou most remorseless, most ungrateful man!
To waste my fortune, rob me of my son,
To drive me to despair, and then reproach me
For being what thou'st made me.

Wil Dry thy tears
I ought not to reproach thee. I confess
That thou hast suffered much so have we both

But chide no more I'm wrought up to thy purpose. The poor ill fated unsuspecting victim, Live he reclined him on the fatal couch,
From which he's ne'er to rise, took off the sash
And costly dagger that thou saw'st him wear,
And thus, unthinking, furnished us with arms Against himself What shall I use?

Agues The sash

If you male use of that, I can assist Wil No, 'tis a dreadful office, and I'll spare Steal to the door, Thy trembling hands the guilt And bring me word if he be still asleep Or I'm deceived, or he pronounced himself The happiest of mankind Deluded wretch 1 Thy thoughts are perishing, thy youthful jovs, Touched by the 1cy hand of grisly death, Are withering in their bloom But though extinguished, He'll never know the loss, nor feel the bitter Pangs of disappointment. Then I was wrong In counting him a wretch to die well pleased Is all the happiest of mankind can hope for To be a wretch is to survive the loss Of every joy, and even hope itself, As I have done. Why do I mourn him then? For, by the anguish of my tortured soul, He's to be envied, if compared with me.

There is a memoir of Lillo prefixed to an edition of his dramatic works by T Davies (and ed 1810).

John Byrom (1692-1763) was born near Manchester He took his degree at Trinity Col lege, Cambridge, in 1712, and studied medicine at Montpellier in France. On his return he applied himself to teach a system of shorthand which he had invented Among his pupils were Gibbon and Horace Walpole, Bentley, Hoadly, Bishop Butler, John Wesley, Hartley, and William Law were amongst his friends The latter part of Byrom's life was spent in easy circumstances, he succeeded by the death of an elder brother to the family property in and about Manchester, and there he lived highly respected His poetry has the virtue of a genuine simplicity, and is some times pointed and rhythmical, rarely melodious, often it is mere doggerel, or measured lengths of rhymed prose He put everything into rhymetheological and historical arguments, petitions to the king, and even translations from the mystical theology of Ruysbrock, Bochme, and Law (of the He was very much of a mystic Serious Call) himself, regarded Malebranche as the greatest of divines and philosophers, and admired Fénelon and the visionary Madame Bourignon, but he met in a friendly way heretics like Whiston and deists like Collins Throughout life he was strongly Jacobite, though he avoided compromising himself By rom's (not Swift's) was the famous epigram about the dispute between Handel and Buononcini

Some say, compared to Bononcini,
That Mynheer Handel's but a ninny,
Others aver that he to Handel
Is scarcely fit to hold a candle.
Strange all this difference should be 'Twirt tweedle dum and tweedle-dee'

His Latin verse also is pointed rather than poetical Some of his smartest things are in broad Lancashire dialect, such as the dialogue on the 'Heelanders' in Lancashire in 1745 His Colin ai d Phebe, contributed to the Spectator in 1714, gave him some standing as a poet. Phebe was said to have been Jug Bentley, the sprightly daughter of the great Master of Trinity But an early biographer earnestly denied this, and vith some reason said the poem was really addressed to his favourite sister, Phebe Byrom The Journal is a light, gossiping record, which adds little to our knowledge of the public events of the period, but exhibits its author as an opinionative, kindly, cheerful, and happy man

Colin and Phebe-A Pastoral.

My time, O ye Muses, was happily spent, When Phebe went with me wherever I went, Ten thousand so eet pleasures I felt in my breast Sure never fond shepherd like Colin was blest! But now she is gone, and has left me behind, What a marvellous change on a sudden I find! When things seemed as fine as could possibly be, I thought 'twas the Spring', but alas! it was she.

With such a companion to tend a fev sheep,
To rise up and play, or to lie down and sleep
So good humoured made me, so cheerful and gay,
My heart was as light as a feather all day,
But now I so cross and so peevish am grown,
So strangely uneasy, as never was known.
My fair one is gone, and my over all drowned,
And my heart, I am sure, weighs more than a pound.

The fountain that wont to run sweetly along, And dance to soft murmurs the pebbles among, Thou know'st, little Cupid, if Phebe v as there, 'Twas pleasure to look at, 'twas music to hear But now she is absent, I wa'k by its side, And still, as it murmurs, do nothing but chide 'Must you be so cheerful, while I go in pain? Peace there with your bubbling, and hear me complain'

My lambkins around me would oftentimes play
And Phobe and I were as joyful as they,
How pleasant their sporting, how happy their time,
When Spring, Love, and Beauty were all in their prime!
But now, in their frolics when by me they pass,
I fling at their fleeces a handful of grass,
'Be still,' then I ery, 'for it makes me quite mad
To see you so merry while I am so sad'

My dog I was ever well pleased to see Come wagging his tail to my fair one and me
And Phebe was pleased too, and to my dog said
'Come hither, poor fellow,' and patted his head
But now, when he's fawning I with a sonr look Crv 'Sirrali,' and give him a blow with my erook
And I'll give him another, for why should not Tray
Be as dull as his master, when Phebe's away?

When wall ing with Phebe, what sights have I seen, How fair was the flower, how fresh was the green! What a lovely appearance the trees and the shade, The corn fields and hedges, and everything made!

But now she has left me, they all are in tears, Not one of them half so delightful appears Twas nought but the magic, I find, of her eyes Which made all these beautiful prospects arise.

Sweet music attended us all the wood through, The lark, linnet, throstle, and nightingale too, Winds over us whispered, flocks by its did bleat, And chirp went the grasshopper under our feet But now she is absent, though still they sing on, The woods are but lonely, the melody 's gone Her voice in the concert, as now I have found, Gave everything else its agreeable sound

Rose, what is become of thy delicate hue?
And where is the violet's beautiful blue?
Does aught of its sweetness the blossom beguile?
That meadow, those daisies, why do they not smile?
Ah rivals! I see what it was that you drest
And made yourselves fine for—a place in her breast.
You put on your colours to pleasure her eye,
To be plueled by her hand, on her bosom to die.

How slowly Time creeps till my Phebe return 'While amidst the soft zephyr's cool breezes I burn Methinks, if I knew whereabouts he would tread, I could breathe on his wings—it would melt down the lead

Ily swifter, ye minutes, bring hither my dear, And rest so much longer for 't when she is here. Ah Colin' old Time is quite full of delay, Nor will budge one foot faster for all thou canst say

Will no pitying power that hears me complain, Or cure my disquiet, or soften my pain?
To be cured, thou must, Colin, thy passion remove, But v hat swain is so sillv to live without love?
No, deitv bid the dear nymph to return,
For ne'er was poor shepherd so sadly forlorn.
Ah, what shall I do? I shall die with despair,
Take heed, all we swains, how ye part with vour fair

Of the following poem (in some editions described as in imitation of Sir Philip Sidney), Southey strained a good point when he said it was 'so perfectly in the manner of Elizabeth's age, that we can hardly believe it to be an imitation, but are almost disposed to think that Byrom had transscribed it from some old author'

Careless Content

I am content, I do not care,
Wag as it will the world for me,
When fuss and fret was all my fare,
It got no ground as I could see
So when away my caring went,
I counted cost, and was content.

With more of thanks and less of thought,
I strive to make my matters meet,
To seek what ancient sages sought,
Physic and food in sour and sweet
To take what passes in good part,
And keep the luccups from the heart.

With good and gentle humoured hearts, I choose to chat where'er I come, Whate er the subject be that starts, But if I get among the glum, I ho'd my tongue to tell the troth, And keep my breath to eool my broth

For chance or change of peace or pain,

I or I o-tune s favour or her frown,

I or lack or glut, for loss or gain,

I never do lge nor up nor down

But swing v hat wa, the ship shall swim,

Or tack about with equal trim

I suit not where I shall not speed,
Nor trace the turn of every tide,
If simple sense will not succeed,
I male no bushing but abide
For shining wealth, or scaring woe,
I force no friend, I fear no foe.

Of ups and downs, of ins and outs,
Of they 're i' the wrong, and we 're i' the right,
I shun the rancours and the routs,
And wishing well to every wight,
Whatever turn the matter takes,
I deem it all but ducks and drakes.

With whom I feast I do not fawn,
Nor if the folks should flout me, faint,
If v onted welcome be withdrawn,
I cook no kind of a complaint
With none disposed to disagree,
But like them best who best like me.

Not that I rate myself the rule
How all my betters should behave,
But fame shall find me no man's fool,
Nor to a set of men a slave
I love a friendship free and frank,
And hate to hang upon a hank

Fond of a true and trusty tie,

I never loose where'er I link,

Though if a business budges by,

I talk thereon just as I think,

My word, my work, my heart, my hand,

Still on a side together stand

If names or notions make a noise,
Whatever hap the question hath,
The point impartially I poise,
And read or write, but without writh,
For should I burn or break my brains,
Pray who will pay me for my pains?

I love my neighbour as myself,
Myself like him too, by his leave,
Nor to his pleasure, power, or pelf,
Came I to crouch, as I conceive Dame Nature doubtless has designed
A man the monarch of his mind

No s taste and try this t mper, sirs,
Mood it and brood it in your breast,
Or if we ween, for worl dy stirs,
That man does right to mar his rest,
Le' me be deft, and dibonair,
I am content I do not care

The following is a fair specimen of Byrom's theological argumentation (against Sherlock)

When tempted Adam, yielding to deceit,
Presumed of the fordidden tree to eat,
The Bishop tells us that he did not die
Pray will you ask him, sir, the reason why?
Why he would contradict the sacred text,
Where death to sin so surely is annexed
'The day thou eatest' are the words, you know,
And yet by his account, it was not so

The often-sung hymn, 'Christians awake, salute the happy morn,' is a selection from Byrom's Christmas Carol The following is his happiest jeu d'esprit

Jacobite Toast

God bless the king, God bless the Faith's Defender, God bless—no harm in blessing—the Pretender But who Pretender is, and who is king, God bless us all! that's quite another thing

Byroms poems were republished, with Life and notes, in 1814, were included in Chalmers's Poets, and were re-edited in 1894-95 by Prof Ward for the Chetham Society (4 vols.). The Journal and Literary Remains appeared in 1854-57 (2 vols., Chetham Society).

Thomas Amoly (1691?-1788) was a miscel laneous writer and humourist of an eccentric type. He was of Irish descent—his father acquired pro perty as secretary for the confiscated estatesand he went to school in Dublin, but he is found established in Westminster in 1757 published, anonymously, Memoirs containing the Lives of several Ladies of Great Britain, A History of Antiquities, Observations on the Christian Religion, with a variety of Disquisi tions (in two volumes)—an extraordinary miscel lany of religion, scenery, autobiography, and His next work is practically fictitious adventures The Life of John Buncle, Esq. a continuation The author's aim in both (2 vols 1756-66) works was to promote good morals and Unita rian doctrines, or rather a kind of 'Christian Deism,' the ladies whose charms and virtues are commemorated belong very obviously to the fictitious side of the enterprise. In the first he travels among the wild hills of Northumber land, and meets there, in a secluded spot (which he invests with all the beauty and softness of a scene in Kent or Devon), the daughter of a de ceased college friend, who had been disinherited for refusing to sign the Thirty nine Articles. The young lady entertains her father's friend, and introduces him to other ladies undertake a visit to the Western Islands, and encounter various adventures and vicissitudes, besides indulging in philosophical and polemical discussions. The Life of John Buncle is of like complexion, but in the form of an autobiography Buncle has in succession no less than seven wives, all wooed and won upon his peculiar 'Christian principles' To such reviewers as should attempt to raise the laugh against him he replies think it unreasonable and impious to grieve immoderately for the dead. A decent and proper tribute of tears and sorrow, humanity requires, but when that duty has been paid, we must remember that to lament a dead woman is not to lament a wife. A wife must be a living woman' And, fortified by this philosophy, John Buncle proceeds on his way undisturbed after each bereavement, usually in high spirits, relishing fine old ale and good cheer, and making fresh converts to his views and opinions. The personal attractions, literary and other acquirements. of each wife, her many virtues, and her family history, are related at length 'As I mention nothing of any children by so many wives,' he explains, 'some readers may perhaps wonder at this, and therefore, to give a general answer once for all, I think it sufficient to observe, that I had a great many to carry on the succession. but as they never were concerned in any extraordinary affairs, nor ever did any remarkable things, that I ever heard of-only rise and breakfast, read and saunter, drink and eat, it would not be fair, in my opinion, to make any one pay for their history' In lieu of this, the reader is treated to dissertations on the origin of language, the causes of earthquakes and of muscular motion, on phlogiston, fluxions, the Athanasian Creed. and fifty other topics brought together in heroic contempt of the unities of time and place. At a moment's notice the most unlikely personsfarmers' wives and country gentlemen's daughters -burst into long debates or disquisitions on the evidences for (improved) Christianity, the origin of language, phallic worship, the physical cause of the Deluge Between Cumberland and Yorkshire, Buncle discovers a 'fine romantic country,' a trackless and all but impressible wilderness, with mountains higher than 'Snowden or Kedar-Idris,' appalling precipices, deafening cataracts as high as Niagara, bottomless abysses, but here and there little companies of charming recluses, sometimes wholly women. He is great on 'natural curiosities' -caverns, fossils, odd shells, rare mushrooms There is a portentous account of a fight to the death (seen under a rather highly magnifying microscope I) between a 'gallant louse' and an active flea, who at one stage of the struggle 'fixes his flashing eyes on his foe.' The classical quotations and even the names of the authors cited leave much to be desired, and suggest second-hand (though miscellaneous and extensive) erudition There is a vast amount of irrelevant padding in One long note gives sketches of the the notes lives and works of St Jerome, St Ambrose, and the Gregories Another note, running on to a tenth page, discusses Madame de Guyon, Madame Bourignon, and several other mystics, male and female. Another describes various monuments of native Irish literature, with translations fantastic and desultory work is only tolerable in virtue of its portentous eccentricity and unlikeness to any other book, with its occasionally happy, original, and unexpected thoughts and locutions How Hazlitt could have said that the soul of | Rabelais had passed into Amory is r hensible, Mr Leslie Stephen, more reasonably, sees in his rhapsodies rather the 'light headed ramblings of delirium'. If Amory was not disordered in intellect, he had a marvellously ill balanced judgment, and probably no entirely sane person could ever read John Buncle from end to end without plentiful 'skipping'

The following, from the beginning of the Memoirs, is a portrait of the first of his heroines

Marinda Bruce

In the year 1739, I travelled many hundred miles to visit ancient monuments, and discover curious things. and as I wandered, to this purpose, among the vast hills of Northumberland, fortune conducted me one evening, in the month of June, when I knew not where to rest, to the sweetest retirement my eyes have ever beheld This is Hali farm. It is a beautiful vale surrounded with rocks, forest, and water I found at the upper end of it the prettiest thatched house in the world, and a garden of the most artful confusion I had ever seen. The little mansion was covered on every side with the finest flowery greens. The streams all round were murmuring and falling a thousand ways. All the kind of singing birds were here collected, and in high harmony on the sprays The ruins of an abbey enhance the beauties of this place, they appear at the distance of four hundred yards from the house, and as some great trees are now grown up among the remains, and a river winds between the broken walls, the view is solemn, the picture fine

When I came up to the house, the first figure I saw was the lady whose story I am going to relate. She had the charms of an angel, but her dress was quite plain and clean as a country maid. Her person appeared faniliess, and of the middle size, between the disagree able extremes, her face, a sweet oval, and her complexion the brinette of the bright rich kind, her mouth, like a rose bud that is just heginning to blow, and a fugitive dimple, by fits, would lighten and disappear. The finest passions were always passing in her face, and in her long, even chestnut eyes, there was a fluid fire, sufficient for half a dozen pur

She had a volume of Shakspear in her hand as I came softly towards her, having left my horse at a distance with my servant, and her attention was so much engaged with the extremely poetical and fine lines which Titania speaks in the third act of the 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' that she did not see me till I was quite n-ar her She seemed then in great amazement She could not be much more surprised if I had dropped from the clouds. But this was soon over, upon my ask ing her if she was not the daughter of Mr John Bruce, as I supposed, from a similitude of faces, and informing her that her father, if I was right, was my near friend, and would be glad to see his chum in that part of the Marinda replied 'You are not wrong,' and immediately asked me in She conducted me to a parlour that was quite beautiful in the rural way, and welcomed me to Hali farm, as her father would have done, she said, had I arrived before his removal to a hetter world She then left me for a while, and I had time to look over the room I was in. The floor was covered with rushes wrought into the prettiest mat, and the walls decorated all round with the d shells Robins and nightingales, linnet, were in the neatest reed cages of her own making, and at the upper end of the chamber, in a charming little open grotto, was the finest striv capite aurito, corpore rufo, that I have seen, that is, the great eagle owl. This beautiful bird, in a niche like a ruin, looked vastly fine. As to the flowers which adorned this room, I thought they were all natural at my first coming in, but on inspection, it appeared that several baskets of the tinest kinds were inimitably painted on the walls by Marinda's hand

These things afforded me a pleasing entertainment for about half an hour, and then Miss Bruce returned of the maids I rought in a supper-such fare, she said, as her little cottage afforded, and the table was covered with green peas and pigeons, cream cheese, new brend and butter Everything was excellent in its kind eider and ale were admirable. Discretion and dignity appeared in Miranda's behaviour, she talked with judg ment, and under the decencies of ignorance was con cealed a valuable knowledge. After supper she gave me the lustory of her father from the time he and I parted, and concluded with saying that by his death, a year before my arrival, she became the solitary thing I saw her, in the midst of untravelled mountains, and had not in the world one friend, excepting the poor rustics of her house and neighbourhood

Richard Savage was an undignified assistant of Pope's, who supplied the 'private intelligence and secret incidents' which add poignancy to the satire of the Dunciad Savage is better known for his misfortunes, as related by Dr Johnson, than for the charms of his poetry, which rarely rises above the level of mediocrity, whereas his melancholy story bears to be a romance in real life. It is almost certain, however, that Johnson's memoir, derived directly or indirectly from Savage himself, is little else than a romance, and its hero an impostor Together, often penniless, they had roumed the streets by night, and now, moved by pity to partiality, he wrote what is perhaps the most perfect short Life in the language That the story contains 'inherent improbabilities and proved falsehoods' was demonstrated by Moy Thomas in 1858 in Notes and Queries

Savage (1697-1743) was born in London, and according to his own account was the issue of a licison between the wife of Charles Lord Brandon, afterwards Earl of Macclesfield, and Richard Swage, Earl Rivers Lady Brandon had been separated from her husband about ten years when she formed a haison with Lord Rivers, by whom she had two children, a girl (who died in infancy, having been christened after the father and mother. 'Ann Swage') and a male child, baptised as 'Richard Smith' Richard Smith, like the pre ceding child, was removed and placed at nurse, being taken away by a baker's wife named Portlock, who said the child was her own, and from this time all trace of the infant is lost are to believe Savage's story, the Countess (from 1700 the wife of Colonel Brett) from the hour of his birth discovered a resolution of disowning him, and would never see him again suffered a large legacy left to him by his godmother to be embezzled for want of some one to prosecute his claim, told Earl Rivers, his father, on his deathbed (1712) that his child was dead, with the express object of depriving him of another legacy of £6000, endeavoured to have Richard kidnapped to the West Indies. and finally interfered to the utmost of her power, and by means of an 'atrocious calumny,' to pre vent his being saved from the hangmin Most of these assertions have been disproved deed, the story of the legacy is palpably untrue, for, as Croker remarked, if Swage had a title to the legacy, he could not have found any difficulty in recovering it. Had the executors resisted his claims, the whole costs, as well as the legacy, must have been paid by them, if he had been the child to whom it was given

The writer we know as Savage is first heard of in 1717, when was published The Convocation, or a Battle of Pamphlets, a Poem written by Mr Richard Savage Next year (1718) he produced a comedy, Love in a Veil, which was published by Curll, and stated on the title page to be 'written by Richard Savage, Gent, son of the late Earl Steele thought well of the play, and Rivers' became his friend for a time. In Jacob's Lives of the Poets (1719) the same story is repeated with additions, and Aaron Hill in his periodical, The Plain Dealer (1724), inserted letters and statements to the same effect, which were fur nished by Savage. His remarkable history thus became known, but the vices of his character displayed themselves He had some good m pulses, but his habits were low and sensual Histemper was irritable and capricious, and whatever money he received was instantly spent in obscure haunts of dissipation. In a tavern brawl in 1727 he had the misfortune to kill a young man called Sinclair, for which he was tried and condemned to death, but was pardoned by Queen Caroline and set at liberty He published poetical pieces for his living, addressed a birthday ode to the queen in 1732, calling himself the 'Volunteer Laureate' -to the annoyance, it is said, of Colley Cibber, the legitimate inheritor of the laurel, and received from Her Majesty a pension of £50 His threats, as well as the sympathetic interest of the public in the story of his wrongs, induced Lord Tyr connel, a friend of his reputed mother, to take him into his family, where he lived on equal terms and was allowed £200 a year This, as Johnson said, was the 'golden period' of Swige's life. But, as might have been foreseen, the habits of the poet differed widely from those of the peer, they soon quarrelled, and Savage was again set adrift on the world. The death of the queen also stopped his pension, but his friends mide up an annuity for him of equal amount, towhich Pope contributed £20 Savage agreed to withdraw to the country, to avoid the temptationsof London. He selected Swansea, but stopping at Bristol, was treated with great kindness by the opulent merchants and other inliabitants, whom he afterwards libelled in a sarcastic poem In Swansea he resided about a year, but on revisiting Bristol he was arrested for a small debt, and being unable to find bail, was thrown mto prison His folly, extravagance, and pride, though it was 'pride that licks the dust,' lind left him almost without a friend. He made no vigorous effort to extricate or maintain himself Pope continued his allowance, but being provoked by something in his conduct, he wrote to him, stating that he was 'determined to keep out of his suspicion by not being officious any longer, or obtruding into any of his concerns? Savage felt the force of this rebuke from the steadiest and most illustrious of his friends was soon afterwards taken ill, and, unable to procure medical assistance, was found dead in bed The kindly keeper of the prison buried the poor man at his own expense.

Savage was the author of two plays and a volume of miscellaneous poems. Of the latter, the principal piece is The Wanderer (1729), written with greater care than most of his things, it was the offspring of that happy period of his life when he lived with Lord Tyrconnel. Pope repeatedly read it and commended it. Amidst much puerile and tawdry description and many banalities, The Wanderer contains some impressive passages. There are obvious evidences that Savage studied The Seasons, of which part was published three years before. The Bastard (1728) is also a striking poem, and bears the impress of true feeling and vigorous thinking. One couplet is worthy of Pope. Of the bastard he says

He lives to build, not boast, a generous race No tenth transmitter of a foolish face

The concluding passage, in which he bewails the lot of his victim and of himself, has real pathos in it, though it ends in a bit of preposterous bombast, bathos, and bad taste.

From 'The Bastard.'

Is chance a guilt, that my disastrous heart, For mischief never meant, must ever smart? Can self-defence be sin? Ah, plead no more! What though no purposed make stained thee oer, Had heaven befriended thy unhappy side, Thou hadst not been provol ed—or thou hadst died

Far be the guilt of home shed blood from all
On v hom, unsonght, embroiling dangers fall!
Still the pale dead revives, and lives to me,
To me! through Pity's eve condemned to see Remembrance veils his rage, but swells his fate Grieved I forgive, and am grown cool too late Voung and unthoughtful then, who I nows one day,
What ripening virtues might have made their way!
He might have lived till folly died in shame,
Till kindling wisdom felt a thirst for fame
He might perhaps his country's friend have proved Both happy, generous, candid, and beloved,

He might have saved some worth, now doomed to fall, And I, perchance, in him have nurdered all

O fate of late repentance ' always vain
Thy remedies but lull undving pain.
Where shall my hope find rest? No mother's care Shielded my infant innocence with prayer
No father's guardian hand my youth maintained,
Called forth my virtues, or from vice restrained,
Is it not thine to snatch some powerful arm,
First to advance, then screen from future harm?
Am I returned from death to live in pain?
Or would imperial pity save in vain?
Distrust it not What blame can mercy find,
Which gives at once a life, and rears a mind?

Mother, miscalled, farewell—of soul severe, This sad reflection yet may force one tear All I was wretched by to you I owed, Alone from strangers every comfort flowed!

Lost to the life you gave, your son no more, And now adopted, who was doomed before, New born, I may a nobler mother claim, But dare not whisper her immortal name, Supremely lovely and serencly great, Majestic mother of a kneeling state, Queen of a people's heart, who ne'er before Agreed, yet now with one consent adore. One contest yet remains in this desire, Who most shall give applause where all admire

There is a certain parallelism in the passage quoted below to the survey of the city, its sins, sorrows, and close packed contrasts, in Dr Teufelsdrockh's garret-window in Weissnichtwo 'Bold bad spectre' sounds like a modern joke, although the collocation of 'bold' and 'bad' is as old at least as Spenser, and few even of Savage's poetical contemporaries would regard the epithet 'sapient bard' a compliment.

From The Wanderer

You mansion, made by beaming tapers gay. Drowns the dim night, and counterfeits the day, From 'lumined windows glancing on the eye, Around, athwart, the frisling shadows fly There midnight riot spreads illusive jovs, And fortune, health, and dearer time destroys. Soon death's dark agent to luxuriant ease Shall wal e sharp warnings in some fierce disease O man! thy fabrie's like a well formed state, Thy thoughts, first runked, were sure designed the great. Passions plebeians are, which factions raise, Wine, like poured oil, excites the raging blaze, Then giddy anarchy's rude triumphs rise Then sovereign Reason from her empire flies That ruler once deposed, wisdom and wit To noise and folly, place and power, submit, Lil e a fruil bark thy weakened mind is tost. Unsteered, unbalanced, till its wealth is lost.

The miser-spirit eyes the spendthrift heir,
And mourns, too late, effects of sordid care.
His treasures fit to clove eith fawning slave,
I et grudge a stone to dignify his grave.
For this, low thoughted craft his life employed,
For this, though wealthy he no wealth enjoyed,
Tor this he griped the poor and alms denied,
Unfriended lived and unlamented died

Yet smile, grieved shade! when that unprosperous store I ast lessens, when gay hours return no more, Smile at the heir, beholding, in his fall, Men once obliged, like him, ungrateful all! Then thought inspiring woe his heart shall mend, And prove his only wise, unflattering friend

Folly exhibits thus unmanly sport, While plotting Mischief keeps reserved her court Lo ! from that mount, in blasting sulphur broke, Stream flames voluminous, enwrapped with smoke ! In chariot shape they whill up yonder tower, Lean on its brow, and like destruction lower! From the black depth a fiery legion springs, Each bold bid spectre claps her sounding wings, And strught beneath a summoned, traitorous band, On horror bent, in darl convention stand From each fiend's mouth a ruddy vapour flows, Glides through the roof, and o'er the council glows The villains, close beneath the infection pent, Feel, all possessed, their rising galls ferment, And burn with faction, hate, and vengeful ire, For rapine, blood, and devastation dire! But Justice marks their ways slie waves in air The sword, lugh threatening, like a comet's glare

While here dark Villamy herself deceives,
There studious Honests our view relieves,
A feeble taper from you lonesome room,
Scattering thin rays, just gliminers through the gloom,
There sits the sapient bard in museful mood,
And glows impassioned for his country's good!
All the bright spirits of the just combined,
Inform, refine, and prompt his towering mind!
He takes the gifted quill from hands divine,
Around his temples rays refulgent shine
Now rapt, now more than man, I see him climb
To view this speck of earth from worlds sublime.
I see him now o'er nature's works preside,
How clear the vision! and the view how wide!

John Dver was born at Aberglasslyn, Carmarthenshire, about 1700, and on the death of his father, a solicitor, abandoned the profession of law He then took to art, and rambled over South Wales and the adjoining parts of England, filling his mind with a love of nature and his portfolio with sketches During his excursions he wrote Grongar Hill (1726), a poem remarkable in its period for simplicity, warm feeling, and fine description of natural scenery, it provokes com parison with Jonson's Penshurst and Denham's Cooper's Hill Grongar Hill, on the river Towy in Cardigan, commands a view noble enough to inspire any poet Dyer next made a tour to Italy, to study painting On his return in 1740 he published anonymously another poem, The Ruins of Rome, in blank verse of this pattern

Behold the pride of pomp,
The throne of nations fallen, obscured in dust,
Even yet majestical—the solemn scene
Elates the soul, while now the rising sun
Flames on the ruins in the purer air
Towering aloft, upon the glittering plain,
Like broken rocks, a vast circumference,
Rent palaces, crushed columns, ritted moles,
Fancs rolled on fanes, and tombs on buried tombs

One short passage Johnson specially noted as 'concerned with the mind of a poet'—it is certainly neither smooth (even if we agree to mispronounce or ison) nor in Johnson's own manner

The pilgrim oft At dead of night, 'mid his orison, hears, Aghast, the voice of time, disparting towers, Tumbling all precipitate down dashed, Rattling around, loud thundering to the moon

Seeing that he had little chance of succeeding as an artist, Dyer entered the Church, and obtained successively the vacarage of Catthorpe in Leicester slure and the Lincolnshire livings of Belchford, Coningsby, and Kirkby-on-Bain He published in 1757 his longest poetical work, The Fleece, devoted to 'the care of sheep, the labours of the loom.' The subject was hardly a promising one How can a man write poetically, said Johnson, of serges and druggets? Yet Dyer did write a not un pleasing didactic poem on this theme, Akenside assisted him with some finishing touches, and Wordsworth praised the result in a sonnet One critic, learning from Dodsley that the author of The Fluce was no longer young, threatened 'He will be buried in woollen! He did die the year after the publication (Samuel Dyer, translator and Johnson's friend, was a younger contem-Dier's poetical pictures are happy minintures of nature, enrefully drawn, prettily coloured, and grouped with the taste of an artist. His versification is musical, and his moralisings Byron thought the six lines relevant enough towards the close of Grongar Hill beginning 'As you summits soft and fair' had suggested Campbell's famous opening of the 'Pleasures of Hope.

Grongar Hill.

Silent nymph, with curious eye, Who, the purple evening, he On the mountain's lonely van, Beyond the noise of busy man, Painting fair the form of things, While the vellow linnet sings, Or the tuneful nightingale Charms the forest with her tale, Come, with all thy various hues, Come, and aid thy sister muse, Now, while Phœbus, riding high, Gives lustre to the land and sky 1 Grongar Hill invites my song, Draw the landskip bright and strong, Grongar, in whose mossy cells Sweetly musing quiet dwells, Grongar, in whose silent shade, For the modest Muses made, So oft I have, the evening still, At the fountain of a rill, Sat upon a flowery bed, With my hand beneath my head, While strayed my cyes o'er Towy's flood, Over mend, and over wood, From house to house, from hill to hill, Till contemplation had her fill.

About his checkered sides I wind,
And leave his brooks and meads behind,
And groves, and grottoes where I lay,
And vistas shooting beams of day
Wide and wider spreads the vale,
As circles on a smooth canal
The mountains round, unhappy fate,
Sooner or later, of all height,
Withdraw their summits from the skies,
And lessen as the others rise
Still the prospect wider spreads,
Adds a thousand woods and meads,
Still it widens, widens still,
And sinks the newly risen hill.

Now I gain the monntain's brow, What a landskip lies below! No clouds, no vapours intervene, But the gay, the open scene Does the face of nature shew, In all the hues of heaven's bow, And, swelling to embrace the light, Spreads around beneath the sight

Old castles on the cliffs arise, Proudly towering in the skies! Lushing from the woods, the spires Seem from hence ascending fires! Half his beams Apollo sheds On the yellow mountain heads! Gilds the fleeces of the flocks, And glitters on the broken rocks!

Below me trees nnnumbered rise, Beautiful in various dyes The gloomy pine, the poplar blue, The yellow beech, the sable yew, The slender fir that taper grows, The sturdy oak with broad spread boughs And beyond the purple grove, Haunt of Phillis, queen of love 1 Gaudy as the opening dawn, Lies a long and level lawn, On which a dark hill, steep and high, Holds and charms the wandering eye I Deep are his feet in Towy's flood, His sides are cloathed with waving wood, And ancient towers crown his brow, That cast an aweful look below, Whose ragged walls the ivy creeps, And with her arms from falling keeps So both a safety from the wind On mntual dependence find 'Tis now the raven's bleak abode, 'Is now the apartment of the toad, And there the fox securely feeds, And there the poisonous adder breeds, Concealed in ruins, moss, and weeds, While, ever and anon, there falls Huge heaps of hoary mouldered walls. Yet time has seen, that lifts the low, And level lays the lofty brow, Has seen this broken pile complete, Big with the vanity of state, But transient is the smile of fate! A little rule, a little sway, A snnbeam in a winter's day, Is all the proud and mighty have Between the cradle and the grave

And see the rivers, how they run
Through woods and meads, in shade and sun, Sometimes swift, sometimes slow,
Wave succeeding wave, they go
A various journey to the deep,
Like human life, to endless sleep!
Thus is nature's vesture wrought,
To instruct our windering thought,
Thus she dresses green and gay,
To disperse our cares away

Ever charming, ever new,
When will the landskip tire the view l
The fountains fall, the rivers flow,
The woody valleys, warm and low,
The windy summit, wild and high,
Roughly rushing on the sky l
The pleasant seat, the ruined tower,
The naked rock, the shady bower,
The town and village, dome and farm,
Each give each a double charm
As pearls upon an Athiop's arm

See, on the mountain's southern side, Where the prospect opens wide, Where the evening gilds the tide, How close and small the hedges lie! What streaks of meadows cross the eye! A step, methinks, may pass the stream, So little distant dangers seem, So we mistake the future's face, Eyed thro' hope's deluding glass, As yon summits soft and fair, Clad in colours of the air, Which to those who journey near, Barren, brown, and rough appear, Still we tread the same coarse way, The present's still a cloudy day

O may I with myself agree, And never covet what I see. Content me with an humble shade, My passions tamed, my wishes laid, For while our wishes wildly roll, We banish quiet from the soul 'Tis thus the busy beat the air, And misers gather wealth and care. Now, even now, my joys run high, As on the mountain turf I lie, While the wanton zepliyr sings, And in the vale perfumes his wings, While the waters murmur deep, While the shepherd charms his sheep, While the birds unbounded fly, And with music fill the sky Now, even now, my joys run high

Be full, ye courts, be great who will, Search for peace with all your skill, Open wide the lofty door,
Seek her on the marble floor
In vain you search, she is not there,
In vain you search the donies of care!
Grass and flowers Quiet treads,
On the meads and mountain heads,
Along with Pleasure close allied,
Ever by each other's side
And often, by the murmuring rill, Hears the thrush, while all is still,
Within the groves of Grongar Hill

The Fleece, in blank verse, is not an English pastoral Georgic on sheep and the shepherd's cares and joys, but sees the fleece through the shearing, washing, dyeing, carding, spinning, and weaving, and even follows English woollens on their last journey by land and sea to France, Russia, Siberia, India, China, the United States, South America, and all the world, it is a patriotic poem on the woollen manufacture and the seaborne trade of the nation of shopleepers scription of the land suitable for rearing sheep leads quite naturally to pictures of life in Lapland and Arabia, which are not good for sheep breeding, the voyages of Jason and the argonauts of the golden fleece presented inevitable attractions, and the Miltonic and sonorous lists of places to which English manufactures find their way leave room for references to Vasco da Gama, Columbus, and Not content with the processes of woollen Anson manufacture, this poet of the woollen interest in its widest sense bursts into an enthusiastic excursus on the forging and sharpening of sheep shears and cutlery at Leeds Dyer had a warm affection for his native Wales, and Welsh sheep, Demetra, Siluria, the banks of the Wye and Severn, occupy disproportionate space in a survey of British sheep farming And repeated returns to the magnificence of Phynlimmon, Cader Idris, and other Welsh hills show that Dyer and his contemporaries were by no means so dead to the glories of mountain scenery as is often assumed Amid the comically prostic details and tedious didacticism there are fine passages and admirable lines in The Fleece, to which Mr Leslie Stephen is unjust in dismissing it as simply unreadable combination of true simplicity and eighteenth-century artificiality is curiously entertaining frank enthusiasm for the English climate, its refreshing fogs and rains, and the perennial verdure and purling brooks thereby nourished, is unconventional, frank, and infectious

Those slow descending showers, Those hovering fogs, that bathe our growing vales In deep November (loathed by trifling Ganl, Effeminate), are gifts the Pleiads shed, Britannia's handmids. As the beverage falls, Her hills rejoice, her valleys laugh and sing

Hail noble Albion where no golden mines,
No soft perfumes, nor oils, nor inyrtle bowers,
The vigorous frame and lofty heart of man
Enervate round whose stern cerulean brows
White winged snow, and cloud, and pearly rain,
Frequent attend, with solemn myesty
Rich queen of mists and vapours! These thy sons
With their cool arms compress, and twist their nerves
For deeds of excellence and high renown
Thus formed, our Edwards, Henrys, Churchills, Blakes,
Our Lockes, our Newtons, and our Miltons, rose

See, the sun gleams, the living pastures rise, After the nurture of the fallen shower, How beautiful! How blue the ethereal vault, How verdurous the lawns, how clear the brooks! Such noble warlike steeds, such herds of kine,

So sleek, so vast, such spreads flocks of sheep, I she flakes of gold illumining the green, What other paradise adorn but thine, Britannia? happy, if thy sons would know Their happiness

This English 'Cotter's Saturday Night' is not without a charming and truthful realism

Only a slander tuft of useful ash,
And numbed beech and alm, securely tall,
The little smiling cottage warm embowered,
The little smiling cottage, where at eve
He meets his rosy children at the door,
Prattling their welcomes, and his honest wife,
With good brown cake and becon slice, intent
To cheer his hunger after labour hard

This is part of the shepherd's duties But spread around thy tenderest diligence In flowery spring time, when the new dropt lamb, Tottering with weakness by his mother's side, reals the fresh world about him, and each thorn, Hillock, or furrow trips his feeble feet O guard his meek sweet innocence from all The innumerous ills that rush around his life! Mark the quick kite, with beal and talons prone, Circling the skies to snatch him from the plain, Observe the lurling erows, beware the brale, There the sly for the careless minute writs, Nor trust thy neighbour's dog, nor earth, nor sky, Between the larl's note and the nightingale's, His hungry bleating still with tepid milk In this soft office may thy children join, And charitable habits learn in sport

Colin, on the top of Cruig v-Breiddyn in Mont gomervshire, laments like a modern philanthropic economist the rush to the towns

What various views unnumbered spread beneath! Woods, towers, vales, caves, dells, eliffs, and torrent And here and there, between the spiry rocks, [floods, The broad flat sea. Far nobler prospects these, Than gardens black with smole in dusty towns, Where stenely vapours often blot the sun Yet flying from his quiet, thither crowds Lach greedy wretch for tardy rising wealth, Which comes too late, that courts the taste in vain, Or nauscates with distempers—Yes, ye rich, Still, still be rich, if thus ye fishion life, And piping, careless, silly shepherds we, We silly shepherds, all intent to feed Our snowy flocks, and wind the sleeky fleece.

Dyer rejoiced in the present and prospective well being of the American colonies

Happy the vovage, o'er the Atlantic brine, By active Kaleigh made, and great the joy, When he discerned above the foamy surge A rising coast, for future colonies, Opening her bays and figuring her capes, Even from the northern tropic to the pole. No land gives more employment to the loom, Or kindher feeds the indigent, no land With more variety of wealth rewards. The hand of labour—thither from the wrongs Of lawless rule the free born spirit flies, Thither affliction, thither poverty,

And arts and sciences thrice happy clime, Which Britain mal es the asylum of mankind.

But jov superior far his bosom warms, Who views those shores in every culture dressed, With habitations gay, and numerons towns, On hill and valley, and his countrymen Formed into various states, powerful and rich, In regious far remote—who from our looms Take largely for themselves, and for those tribes Of Indians, ancient tenants of the land, In amity conjoined, of civil life The comforts taught, and various new desires, Which kindle arts, and occupy the poor, And spread Britannia's flocks o'er every dale.

But he quite foresees American rivalry in raw material, if not in manufacture, and warns Britons, then as now too secure, of the dangers of slackness

Even in the new Columbian world appears
The woolly covering Apacheria's glades,
And Canses', echo to the pipes and flocks
Of foreign swains While Time shakes down his sands,
And works continual change, be none secure
Quicken your labours, brace your slackening nerves,
Ye Britons, nor sleep careless on the lap
Of bounteous Nature, she is elsewhere kind.
See Mississippi lengthen on her lawns,
Propitious to the shepherds—see the sheep
Of fertile Arica, like camels formed,
Which bear huge burdens to the sea beat shore,
And shine with fleeces soft as feathery down

The country of the Apache Indians—parts of Texas, New Mexico and Arizona—was even farther away in the Wild West than Kansas. The sheep of Arica are of course llamas.

Isaac Hawkins Browne (1705-60), son of the vicar of Burton on-Trent, was educated at Oxford, and in 1736 published a clever series of six imitations of then living authors which obtained great popularity They naturally suggest a comparison with the parodies in the Rejected Addresses Browne, who was called to the Bar, resided mainly on his family estate, but sat in Parliament for some time as member for Wenlock in Shropshire He wrote a Latin poem, De Animi Immortalitate, which was much praised and repeatedly translated (as by Soame Jenyns), and an English poem on the subject of Design and Beauty Johnson said that 'of all conversers he was the most delightful with whom I ever was in company,' and gave the sympathetic Boswell food for comfort when he told him that Browne 'drank freely for thirty years' His imitations are his happiest work, the subject of the whole being A Pipe of Tobacco The first of the series, A New Year's Ode, appropriately parodies the manner of Colley Cibber, then poet laureate, in recitative and airs, and begins

Old battle array, big with horror, is fled, And olive robed Peace again lifts up her head, Sing, ye Muses, tobacco, the blessing of peace, Was ever a nation so blessed as this?

Arr —When summer suns grow red with heat,
Tobacco tempers Phœbus' ire,
When wintry storms around us beat,
Tobacco chears with gentle fire.

Yellow autumn, youthful spring, In thy praises jointly sing

Like Neptune, Cæsar guards Virginian flects, Fraught with tobacco's balmy sweets, Old Ocean trembles at Britannia's power, And Boreas is afraid to roar

Cibber's laureate effusions are here happily travestied Ambrose Philips is also well hit off—not by Browne himself, but by 'an ingentous friend'

> Little thbe of mighty power, Charmer of an idle hour, Object of my warm desire, Lip of wax and eye of fire, And thy snowy taper waist With my finger gently braced, And thy pretty swelling crest, With my little stopper pressed, And the sweetest bliss of blisses Breathing from thy balmy kisses

Thomson is the subject of the third imitation

O thou, matured by glad Hesperian suns, Tobacco, fountain pure of limpid truth, That looks the very soul, whence pouring thought, Swarms all the mind, absorpt is yellow care, And at each puff imagination burns, Flash on thy bard, and with exalting fires Touch the mysterious lip that chants thy praise. In strains to mortal sons of earth unknown Behold an engine, wrought from tawny mines Of ductile clay, with plastic virtue formed, And glazed magnifick o'cr, I grasp, I fill From Patotheke with pungent powers perfumed Itself one tortoise all, where shines imbibed Each parent ray, then rudely rammed illume, With the red touch of zeal enkindling sheet, Marked with Gibsonian lore, forth issue clouds, Thought thrilling, thirst inciting clouds around, And many mining fires I all the while, Lolling at ease, inhale the breezy balm But chief, when Bacchus wont with thee to join In genial strife and orthodoxal ale, Stream life and joy into the Muse's bowl. Oh, be thou still my great inspirer, thou My Muse oh, fan me with thy zephyr's boon, While I, in clouded tabernacle shrined, Burst forth all oracle and mystick song

Many of the lines and phrases are from Thomson's poem of Liberly (1732), which also explains Gib sonian lore. Patotheke is a pedantic coinage for a tobacco-box. Such a smart parody of Thomson's magniloquent style and diction being inevitably ludicrous, the usually good-natured poet was offended, and indited some ingry lines in reply The fourth imitation is in the style of Young's Satires, which are less strongly marked by mannerism than the Night Thoughts, not then written The parody begins

Criticks awaint, Tobacco is my theme, Tremble like liornets at the blasting steam And you, court insects, flutter not too near Its light, nor buzz within the scorching splice Pollio, with flame like thine my verse inspire, So shall the Muse from smoke elicit fire.

It is Pope of course who is thus imitated

Blest leaf! whose aromatic gales dispense To templars modesty, to parsons sense So raptured priests, at famed Dodona's shrine, Drank inspiration from the steam divine. Poison that cures, a vapour that affords Content more solid than the smile of lords Rest to the weary, to the hungry food, The last kind refuge of the wise and good Inspired by thee, dull cits adjust the seale Of Europe's peace, when other statesmen fail By thee protected, and thy sister beer, Poets rejoice, nor think the bailiff near Nor less the critic owns thy genial aid, While supperless he plies the piddling trade. What though to love and soft delights a foe, By ladies hated, linted by the beau, Yet social freedom long to courts unknown, Fur health, fair truth, and virtue are thy own Come to thy poet, come with healing wings, And let me taste thee unexcised by kings !

In the last, beginning

Boy' bring an ounce of I reeman's best, And bid the vicar be my guest—

Browne not merely caught the manner of Swift, but successfully reproduced his coarseness

Matthew Green (1696-1737), author of The Spicen, praised by Pope and Gray, left the austere Dissenting communion of his parents, had a post as clerk in the London Custom House, performed his duties faithfully, and from time to time wrote and published verses He was a witty and entertrining companion, but seems to have had personal experience of 'the spleen,' to judge by the aptness with which he discusses its various forms and their appropriate remedies, in comic verse like that of Hudibras and of some of Swift's poems The poem was first published by Glover, the nuthor of Leonidas, after Green's death Gray thought that 'even the wood-notes of Green often break out into strains of real poetry and music,' and the fourth line of the first of the following extracts from The Spleen (alluding to David and Goliath, and not unlike Shakespeare's > Man but a rush against Othello's breast, And he retires), soon attained to the dignity of a stock quotation

Cures for Melancholy

Fo cure the mind's wrong hias, spleen,
Some recommend the bowling green,
Some hilly walks, all exercise,
Fling but a stone, the giant dies,
Laugh and be well Monkeys have been Extreme good doctors for the spleen,
And kitten, if the humour list,
Has harlequined away the fit
Since mirth is good in this behalf,
At some particulars let us laugh
If spleen fogs rise at break of day,
I clear my evening with a play,
Or to some concert take my way

The company, the shine of lights, The seenes of humour, music's flights, Adjust and set the soul to rights.

In rainy days keep double guard, Or spleen will surely be too hard, Which, like those fish by sailors met, Tly highest while their wings are wet. In such dull weather, so unfit To enterprise a work of wit. When clouds one yard of azure sky, That's fit for simile, deny, I dress my face with studious looks, And shorten tedious hours with books. But if dull fogs invade the head, That memory minds not what is read, I sit in window dry as ark, And on the drowning world remark Or to some coffee house I stray For news, the manna of a day, And from the hipped discourses gather That politics go by the weather

Sometimes I dress, with women sit, And chat away the gloomy fit, Quit the stiff garb of serious sense, And wear a gay impertinence, Nor think nor speak with any pains, But lay on Fancy's neck the reins

I never game, and rarely bet,
Am louth to lend or run in debt
No Compter writs me agitate,
Who moralising pass the gate,
And there mine eyes on spendthrifts turn,
Who vainly o'er their bondage mourn
Wisdom, before beneath their care,
Pays her upbraiding visits there,
And forces Folly through the grate
Her panegyric to repeat.
Experience, joined with common sense,
To mortals is a providence.

Happy the man who, innocent, Grieves not at ills he can't prevent, His skiff does with the current glide, Not puffing pulled against the tide He, paddling by the senffling crowd, Sees unconcerned life's wager rowed, And when he can't prevent foul play, Enjoys the folly of the fray

The gate is the gate of the Compter or debtor s prison, me is the antecedent to the who that follows.

Contentment-A Wish

May Heaven-it's all I wish for-send One genial room to treat a friend, Where decent cupboard, little plate, Display benevolence, not state And may my humble dwelling stand Upon some chosen spot of land A pond before full to the brim, Where cows may cool, and geese may swim, Behind, a green, like velvet neat, Soft to the eye, and to the feet, Where odorous plants in evening fur Breathe all around ambrosial air, From Eurus, foe to kitchen ground, renced by a slope with bushes crowned, Fit dwelling for the fcathered throng, Who pay their quit rents with a song,

With opening views of hill and dale, Which sense and fancy do regale, Where the half cirque, which vision bounds, Lil e amphitheatre surrounds And woods impervious to the breeze, Thick phalanx of embodied trees, From hills through plams in dusl array, Extended far, repel the day, Here stillness, height, and solemn shade Invite, and contemplation aid Here nymphs from hollow oaks relate The dark decrees and vill of fate, And dreams, beneath the spreading beech, Inspire, and docile fancy teach, While soft as breezy breath of wind, Impulses rustle through the mind Here Dryads, scorning Phœbus' ray, While Pan melodious pipes away, In measured motions frisk about, Till old Silenus puts them out There see the clover, pea, and bean Vie in variety of green, Fresh pastures speckled o'er with sheep, Brown fields their fallow Sabbaths I eep, Plump Ceres golden tresses wear, And poppy top I nots deck her hair, And silver streams through meadows stray, And Natads on the margin play, And lesser nymphs on side of hills, From plaything urns pour down the rills

Lord Hervey (1696-1743), the son of a Suffolk knight, is well known as the Sporus of Pope and as husband of the much besung and bcautiful Mary Levell A supple politician and a good parliamentary debater, he was successively Vice-Chamberlain and Lord Privy Seal, and a great favourite with Queen Caroline. His history, called Memoirs of the Reign of George II from his Accession till the Death of Queen Caroline, edited in 1848 by John Wilson Croker, is very valuable It abounds in minute details drawn from personal observation, the characters are cleverly drawn, and he has described at length all the vices, coarseness, and duliness of the court, in a style concisc and pointed. His portraits are often spiteful, and he rarely does justice to the good qualities of those-and they were manywhom he disliked Besides his Memoirs, Lord Hervey published many pamphlets, wrote occasional verses, and joined with Lady Mary Wortley Montagu in endeavouring vainly to repel the envenomed shafts of Pope. He was a man of talent and energy, though contending with wretched health, drinling asses' milk, and rouging his countenance to conceal his ghastly appearance, of moral principle or public honour he appears to have been destitute A fen neeks before his death we find him writing thus characteristically to Lady Mary 'The last stages of an infirm life are filthy roads, and, like all other roads, I find the further one goes from the capital, the more tedious the miles grow, and the more ?

turnpiles to mend them, medicine pretends to be such, but doctors who have the management of it, like the commissioners for most other tumpikes, seldom execute what they undertake, they only put the toll of the poor cheated passenger in their pockets, and leave every jolt at least as bad as they found it, if not worse' The extracts that follow are from the Memous

Traits of George II and Queen Caroline

The Duke of Richmond asked the king immediately to succeed Lord Scarborough, and the ling was not averse to granting his request any further than he was always averse to giving anything to anybody ingredients concurred to form this reluctance in his majesty to bestowing. One was that, taling all his notions from a German measure, he thought every man who served him in England overpaid, another was, that while employments were vacant he saved the salary, but the most prevalent of all was his never having the least inclination to oblige I do not believe there ever lived a man to whose temper benevolence was so abso Intely a stranger It was a sensation that, I dare say. never accompanied any one act of his power, so that whatever good he did was either extorted from him, or was the adventitious effect of some self interested act of policy consequently, if any seeming favour he conferred ever obliged the receiver, it must have been because the man on whom it fell was ignorant of the motives from which the giver bestowed I remember Sir Robert Walpole saying once, in speaking to me of the king, that to tall with him of compassion, consideration of past services, charity, and bounty, was making use of words that with him had no meaning The queen, by long studying and long experience of his temper, knew how to instil her own sentiments—whilst she affected to receive his majesty's, she could appear convinced whilst she was controverting, and obedient whilst she was ruling, and by this means her dexterity and address made it impossible for anybody to persuade him what was truly his case—that whilst she was seem ingly on every occasion giving up her opinion and her vall to his, she was always in reality turning his opinion and bending his will to hers. She managed this deified image as the heathen priests used to do the oracles of old, when, kneeling and prostrate before the altars of a pageant god, they received with the greatest devotion and reverence those directions in public which they had before instilled and regulated in private. And as these idols consequently were only propitious to the favourites of the angurers, so nobody who had not tampered with our chief priestiss ever received a favourable answer from our god storms and thunder greeted every votary that entered the temple without her protection-calms and sunshine those who obtained it The ling himself was so little sensible of this being his case, that one day, enumerating the people who had governed this country in other reigns, he said Charles L was governed by his wife, Charles II by his mistresses, King James by his priests, King William by his men, and Queen Anne by His fither, he added, had been her women—favourites governed by anybody that could get at him end of this compendious listory of our great and wise monarchs, with a significant, satisfied, triumphant air, he turned about, smiling to one of his auditors, and asked rough and disagreeable the way I know of no | him 'And who do they say governs now?' Whether this is a true or a false story of the king I know not, but it was currently reported and generally believed (From Chap iv)

Her predominant passion was pride, and the darling pleasure of her soul was power, but she was forced to gratify one to gain the other, as some people do health, by a strict and painful regime, which few besides herself could have had patience to support or resolution to adhere to She was at least seven or eight hours tête à tete with the king every day, during which time she was generally saying what she did not think, assenting to what she did not believe, and prusing what she did not approve, for they were seldom of the same opinion, and he too fond of his own for her ever at first to dare to controvert it ('Consilir quamvis egregii quod ipse non afferret immicus'-'An enemy to any eounsel, however excellent, which he himself had not suggested '- Tacitus' She used to give him her opinion as jugglers do a card, by changing it imperceptibly, and making him believe he held the same with that he first pitched upon that which made these têle à têles seem heaviest was that he neither liked reading nor being read to (unless it was to sleep) she was forced, like a spider, to spin out of her own bowels all the conversation with which the fly However, to all this she submitted, for the sake of power, and for the reputation of having it, for the vanity of being thought to possess what she desired was equal to the pleasure of the possession itself either for the appearance or the reality, she knew it was absolutely necessary to have interest in her husband, as she was sensible that interest was the measure by which people would always judge of her power Her every thought, word, and act therefore tended and was cal culated to preserve her influence there, to him she sae rificed her time, for him she mortified her inclination, she looked, spake, and breathed but for him, like a weathercock to every capricious blast of his uncertain temper, and governed him (if such influence so gained can bear the name of government) by being as great a slave to him thus ruled as any other wife could be to a man who ruled her For all the tedious hours she spent then in watching him whilst he slept, or the heavier task of entertaining him whilst he was awake, her single consolation was in reflecting she had power, and that people in coffee houses and ruelles were saying she governed this country, without knowing how dear the government of it cost her (From Chap xiil.)

Barton Booth (1681-1733), son of a Lancashire squire of good family, was educated at Westminster, and, spite of opposition, carried out his wish to become an actor and a famous one, his Cato in Addison's play being his greatest part He wrote a masque on the death of Dido, and a number of poems, many of them to his wife and some of them sprightly. From one of his songs come the lines (based on Hudibras, III, ii 175)

True as the needle to the pole Or as the dial to the sun

Thomas Cooke (1703-1756), the son of an innkeeper at Bruntree, studied the classics at Filstend School and privately, and became a Whig journalist. He was the author of dramatic pieces, poems, and translations, his translation of Hesiod secured him the nickname of 'Hesiod Cooke' An assault on Pope, Swift, and others in his Battle of the Poets began a lifelong feud. He was editor of the Craftsman

Francis Hutcheson (1694–1746) was the son of a Presbyterian minister at Armagh, himself the son of a minister of good Ayrshire stock who had settled in Ireland Francis studied for the ministry at the University of Glasgow, and was tutor to the young Earl of Kilmarnock who was executed for his share in the rebellion of 1745 As a licentiate he was thought to incline too much to a modified or 'new light' Calvinism, and shortly after the completion of his theological course he was in vited to open a private academy in Dublin, which proved highly successful. In 1720 he published his Inquiry into the Original of our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue, and so became known to many influential personages, such as Lord Gran ville, then Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, Archbishop This work was followed in King, and others 1728 by his Essay on the Nature and Conduct of the Passions, and in the year after he was called to be professor of Moral Philosophy in In his lifetime he the University of Glasgow published various minor books, including a small treatise on Logic, his largest work, A System of Moral Philosophy, was published by his son after his death (with a Life, 1755) classical and literary sympathies, largely learnt from Shaftesbury, Hutcheson rescued philosophy from aridity, and conciliated a new interest in He may in some respects speculative thought be considered a pioneer of the so called 'Scotch school' and of the common sense philosophy, although he was an eclectic, and was largely influenced by Locke, from his professorial work Dugald Stewart dated the metaphysical philosophy But it is as a moral philosopher, of Scotland rather than as a metaphysician, that Hutcheson His system is to a large extent was conspicuous that of Shaftesbury, but it is more complete, coherent, and clearly illustrated He took over the term 'moral sense' (rarely used by his pre decessor) and greatly developed the doctrine. He was a strong opponent of the theory that benevolence has a selfish origin, he was practically an For insisting that 'we have a early utilitarian knowledge of good and evil without and prior to a knowledge of God,' and like unwonted teach ing, he was (unavailingly) prosecuted for heresy by the Presbytery, and his influence powerfully promoted a liberal theology in Scotland consulted Hutcheson, Adam Smith studied under him, and was much influenced by him too, was first stirred by his works to philosophical interests, but Hutcheson's greatest strength lay in his spoken utterances and not in his printed books

The Earl of Chesterfield.

Philip Dormer Stanhope (1694-1773) vas an enlightened statesman, an orator, a conspicuous wit, and a man of almost universal accomplishments, but he is chiefly remembered as the author of the famous Letters written to his natural son, Philip Stanhope. Son of the third Earl of Chesterfield, he studied at Cambridge, made the grand tour, and sat in the House of Commons as member for St Germains in Cornwall from 1716 to 1726, when be succeeded his father as fourth Earl. In 1730 he was made Lord Steward of the Housebold. Until then, as a Whig, he had supported Walpole, but being ousted from office for voting against an excise bill, he went over to the Opposition, and was one of Walpole's bitterest antagonists. He was above bribes, and, according to his lights, an honest statesman and a true patriot. He joined the Pelham Ministry in 1744, in 1745-46 was a judicious, able, and conciliator, Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, and was in 1746 one of the principal Secretaries of State, but in 1748 was compelled by ill-bealth and deaf ness to retire from public life. He was at one time on terms of intimacy with Swift, Pope, and Bolingbroke, and he patronised Colley Cibber and many other men of letters Later in life, by obtruding on Samuel Johnson the patronage which he had vithheld till the publication of the Dictionary, he drew from the lexicographer the famous indignant letter. The story that Johnson was kept waiting in an anteroom in Chesterfield's house while fops and fribbles passed freely into the presence is not true, and was denied by Johnson himself

Chesterfield's ambition was gratified neither by success in public life nor in court society Besides several series of letters, he wrote articles for periodicals and produced some political tracts The letters to his son were meant to form the young man's mind, mould his manners, and make him an exceptionally accomplished man of the They were carried on from the time the boy was five years old till his death as envoy at Dresden at the age of thirty six. As it happened, though Philip was good natured and sensible, he was singularly deficient in the graces his courtly father so sedulously inculcated, he filled several minor diplomatic posts with credit, but was shy and diffident in manner and incapable of elegant accomplishments The correspondence began with 'the dawnings of instruction adapted to the capacity of a boy, rising gradually, by precepts and monition calculated to direct and guard the age of incautious youth, to the advice and knowledge requisite to form the man ambitious to shine as an accomplished courtier, an orator in the senate, or a minister at foreign courts.' The letters contain a vast deal of shrewd advice and observation, show a highly refined taste in literary matters, and are written in singularly pure, perspicuous, and graceful English. Their ethical level is not highthough Johnson spoke quite unfairly when he said they taught the morals of a whore and the manners of a dancing-master Chesterfield carefully distinguished between the manners of a gentleman and those of a dancing-master, which he abhorred. his morals, however unsatisfactory, were not those suggested by Johnson He earnestly reprobated what he regarded as the coarser forms of vice It might rather be said that he had neither real moral principles nor religious scruples, nor any higher rule of life than a regard for the conventional decencies prescribed by the code of his time-gentlemanliness as then understood was not an age of pure lives or lofty aspirations, and Chesterfield was perhaps not far below the level of the contemporary man of the world, whose supreme aim in life was to shine in public life or in society The tone is cynical, self-control and regard for the feelings of others are necessary for our own well-being Gallantry, its justifications, etiquette, and proper management, are discussed with unpleasant iteration, most unedifying maxims being seriously inculcated A recent editor apologises for Chesterfield's remarkable counsel to his son to cultivate irregular relations with married women, on the ground that of a total of four hundred and twenty-one letters printed by him only seven or eight gave this unholy advice! The 121st letter—to the boy of eighteen -says women are children of a larger growth, without good sense, 'a man of sense only trifles with them, plays with them? The 180th has the first actual suggestion, the notorious 202nd opens,

'I have seldom or never written to you on the subject of religion and morality,' insists that 'your moral character [1 e. on the side of honour and truthfulness, not of sexual purity] must be not only pure, but, like Cæsar's wife, unsuspected,' and, characteristically, proceeds explicitly to re-The letters were never decommend adultery signed for publication. After the death of Mr Stanhope in 1768, it was found that he had been secretly married, and had left a widow and two The widow made over the original children letters to their proper owner, Lord Chesterfield, but she preserved copies, and immediately after the death of the eminent wit and statesman, the letters were committed to the press The copyright was sold for  $f_{1500}$ —a sum almost unprecedented for such a work-and five editions were called for within twelve months In the later years of his life, when almost totally deaf and afflicted by increasing ill health, Chesterfield wrote another long series of letters to his youthful Linsman, godson, and successor in the earldom -letters similar to the earlier ones in general nim, but less remarkable and less exceptionable On his deathbed he still endeavoured to carry out his own maxims of punctilious courtesy towards those about him

On Good-Breeding

A friend of yours and mine has very justly defined good breeding to be, 'the result of much good-sense, some good nature, and a little self-denial for the sake of others, and with a view to obtain the same indulgence from them' Taking this for granted-as I think it cannot be disputed—it is astonishing to me that anybody, who has good sense and good nature, can essentially fail in good breeding. As to the modes of it indeed, they vary according to persons, places, and circumstances, and are only to be acquired by observation and experience, but the substance of it is everywhere and eternally the same. manners are to particular societies what good morals are to society in general-their cement and their And as laws are enacted to enforce good morals, or at least to prevent the ill effects of bad ones, so there are certain rules of civility universally implied and received, to enforce good manners and And indeed there seems to me to punish bid ones be less difference both between the crimes and punish ments than at first one would imagine The immoral man who invades another's property is justly hanged for it, and the ill bred man, who by his ill manners invides and disturbs the quiet and comforts of private life, is by common consent as justly banished society Mutual complaisances, attentions, and sacrifices of little conveniences are as natural an implied compact between civilised people as protection and obedience are between kings and subjects, whoever in either case violates that compact, justly forfeits all advantages arising from it For my own part, I really think that, next to the consciousness of doing a good action, that of doing a civil one is the mot pleasing, and the epithet which I should covet the most, next to that of Aristides, would be that of well bred.

Judicious Flattery

If you would particularly gain the affection and friendship of particular people, whether men or women. endeavour to find out their predominant excellence, if they have one, and their prevailing weakness, which every body has, and do justice to the one, and something more than justice to the other. Men have various objects in which they may excel, or at least would be thought to excel, and, though they love to hear justice done to them where they know that they excel, yet they are most and best flattered upon those points where they wish to excel, and yet are doubtful whether they do As for example Cardinal Richelieu, who was undoubtedly the ablest statesman of his time, or perhaps of any other, had the idle vanity of being thought the best poet too he envied the great Corneille his repu tation, and ordered a criticism to be written upon the Cid Those therefore who flattered skilfully said little to him of his abilities in state affairs, or at least but en fassant, and as it might naturally occur But the incense which they gave him, the smoke of which they knew would turn his head in their favour, was as a bel esperat and a poet. Why? Because he was sure of one excellency, and distrustful as to the other \ \ \lambda ou mill easily discover every man's prevailing vanity, by observ ing his favourite topic of conversation, for every man talks most of what he has most a mind to be thought Touch him but there, and you touch him to excel in to the quick. The late Sir Robert Walpole (who was certainly an able man) was little open to flattery upon that head, for he was in no doubt himself about it, but his prevailing weakness was to be thought to have a polite and happy turn to gallantry, of which he had undoubtedly less than any man living it was his favourite and frequent subject of conversation, which proved to those who had any penetration that it was his prevailing weakness. And they applied to it with

Women have in general but one object, which is their beauty, upon which, scarce any flattery is too gross for them to swillow Nature has hardly formed a woman ugly enough to be insensible to flattery upon her person, if her face is so shocking that she must in some degree be conscious of it, her figure and air, she trusts, make ample amends for it If her figure is deformed, her face, she thinks, counterbalances it. If they are both bad, she comforts herself that she has graces, a certain manner, a je ne sçais quoi, still more engaging than This truth is evident from the studied and claborate dress of the ugliest women in the world An undoubted, uncontested, conscious beauty is of all women the least sensible of flatters upon that head she knows it is her due, and is therefore obliged to aobody for giving it her She must be flattered upon her under standing, which, though she may possibly not doubt of herself, yet she suspects that men may distrust.

Do not mistake me, and think that I mean to recommend to you abject and criminal flattery no, flatter nobody's vices or crimes, on the contrary, abhor and discourage them. But there is no living in the world without a complaisant indulgence for people's weaknesses, and innocent, though ridiculous vanities. If a man has a mind to be thought wiser, and a woman handsomer, than they really are, their error is a comfortable one to themselves, and an innocent one with regard to other people, and I vould rather make them my friends by indulging them in it, than my enemies, by endeavouring, and that to no purpose, to undeceive them

There are little attentions, likewise, which are infinitely engaging, and which sensibly affect that degree of pride and self love which is inseparable from human nature, as they are unquestionable proofs of the regard and consideration which we have for the person to whom we pay them. As for example, to observe the little habits, the lilings, the antipathies, and the tastes of those whom we would gain, and then tale care to provide them with the one, and to secure them from the other, giving them genteelly to understand, that you had observed they liked such a dish, or such a room, for which reason you had prepared it or, on the contrary, that having observed they had an aversion to such a dish, a dislike to such a person, &c., you had taken care to avoid presenting Such attention to such trifles flatters self love much more than greater things, as it makes people think themselves almost the only objects of your thoughts and

These are some of the arcana's necessary for your initiation in the great society of the world. I wish I had known them better at your age, I have paid the price of three and fifty years for them, and shall not grudge it, if you reap the advantage. Adieu.

Personal Dignity

There is a certain dignity of manners absolutely necessary to make even the most valuable character either respected or respectable

Horse play, romping, frequent and loud fits of laughter, jokes, waggery, and indiscriminate familiarity will sink both merit and knowledge into a degree of contempt They compose at most a merry fellow, and a merry Indiscriminate fellow was never yet a respectable man familiarity either offends your superiors, or else dubs you their dependent and led captain It gives your inferiors just but troublesome and improper claims of A joker is near akin to a buffoon, and neither of them is the least related to wit. Whoever is admitted or sought for in company upon any other account than that of his merit and manners is never respected there, but only made use of We will have such a one, for he sings prettily, we will invite such a one to a ball, for he dances well, ve will have such a one at supper, for he is always joking and laughing, we will ask mother, because he plays deep at all games, or because he can drink a great deal. These are all vilifying distinctions, mortifying preferences, and evelude all ideas of esteem and regard Whoever 15 bade (as it is called) in company for the sake of any one thing singly, is singly that thing, and will never be considered in any other light, consequently never respected, let his merits be what they

This dignity of manners which I recommend so much to you, is not only as different from pride as true courage is from blustering, or true wit from joking, but is absolutely inconsistent with it, for nothing vihites and degrades more than pride. The pretensions of the proud man are oftener treated with sneer and contempt than with indignation, as we offer ridiculously too little to a tradesman who asks ridiculously too much for his gools, but we do not haggle with one who only asks a just and reasonable price.

Abject flattery and indiscriminate assentation degrade as much as indiscriminate contradiction and noisy debate disgust But a modest assertion of one's own opinion, and a complaisant acquiescence in other people's, preserve dignity

Vulgar, low expressions, awkward motions and address, vilify, as they imply either a very low turn of mind, or low education and low company

Trivolous curiosity about trifles and a laborious attention to little objects, v litch neither require nor deserve a moment's thought, lower a man, who from thence is thought (and not unjustly) incapable of greater matters. Cardinal de Retz, very sagaciously, marked out Cardinal Chigi for a little mind, from the moment he told him he had wrote three years with the same pen, and that it was an excellent good one still

A certain degree of exterior seriousness in looks and motions gives dignity without evaluding wit and decent cheerfulness, which are always serious themselves. A constant smirk upon the face and a whiffling activity of the body are strong indications of fatility. Whoever is in a hurry shews that the thing he is about is too big for him. Haste and hurry are very different things.

Detached Thoughts

Men who converse only with women are frivolous, effeminate puppies, and those who never converse with them are bears

The desire of being pleased is universal. The desire of pleasing should be so too. Misers are not so much blamed for being misers as envied for being rich

Dissimulation to a certain degree is as necessary in business as clothes are in the common intercourse of life, and a man would be as imprudent who should exhibit his inside naked, as he would be indecent if he produced his outside so

Hymen comes whenever he is called, but Love only when he pleases

An abject flatterer has a worse opinion of others, and, if possible, of himself, than he ought to have

A woman will be implicitly governed by the man whom she is in love with, but will not be directed by the man whom she esteems the most. The former is the result of passion, which is her character, the latter must be the effect of reasoning, which is by no means of the feminine gender.

The best moral virtues are those of which the vulgar are, perhaps, the best judges.

A fool never lias thought, a madman has lost it, and an absent man is for the time without it

Advice is seldom welcome, and those who want it the most always like it the least

In spite of his courtly accomplishments, Chesterfield was of unimposing presence and rather distinctly plain looking. Some of his other correspondence memoirs, speeche, essays, and contri butions to the press were published in two volumes in 1777. All the miscellaneous works appeared in four volumes in 1779. Lord Mahon (afterwards Earl Stanhope) published the Letters and other pieces in five volumes in 1845-57 and Mr Bradshaw in three volumes in 1849. And the whole series of two hundred and thirty sir letters written to the Earl's godson and successor were published in 1830 by Lord Carmirvon. Oddly enough the god on, like the son was ill qualified to profit by Chesterfield's coun el He was good natured and shrewd, fond of field spirits and a country life, and rather decidedly defective in breeding. Another edition of the Letters by Mr C. Strachey appeared in 1901 Innumerable selections from the Letters have been published not merely in English but in Dutch German and Spanish. # Samuel Richardson.

From some unexplained circumstance, which certainly cannot be the lack of material, since there are no fewer than six huge volumes of his immoderate epistles in the Forster collection at South kensington, Richardson has not hitherto found a place in any of the numerous series of short biographies. Until recently, the lengthy memoir which Mrs A. L. Barbauld prefixed in 1801 to her selec tion (also in six volumes) of his letters, remained the chief authority for his life, but in 1900 a careful biographical and critical study was published by Miss C L Thomson Richardson's father, like Prior's, 1 as a joiner, 'a very honest man (says his son), descended of a family of middling note, in the County of Surrev,' his mother, 'a good woman, of a family not ungenteel' At the time of the Monmouth rebellion the elder Richardson retired to Derbyslure and here in 1689 Samuel Richardson was born He was at first designed for the Church, but means were wanting, and, with nothing more than 'common school learning,' he began life in 1706 as a printer's apprentice, his master being Mr John Wilde of Aldersgate Street had selected this calling, he tells us, because he thought it would gratify his thirst for reading due time he became a compositor and corrector of the press, married, set up for himself (1719), printed newspapers, wrote 'honest dedications' and prefaces for the booksellers, and was made successively Printer of the Journals of the House of Commons, Master of the Stationers' Company, and finally King's Law Printer His first London place of business was in Fleet Street itself Afterwards he moved to Salisbury Square (then Court), where his last house (now demolished) was at No 11, in the north west corner, and his offices in the present Bell's Buildings Besides his city residence, he had a country box at North End, Fulhum, which he occupied from 1739, or earlier, to 1754, when he moved to Parson's Green. His three novels, the last of which was completed early in 1754 by the issue of the final volumes, were therefore written before he quitted North End At Parson's Green, on the 4th July 1761, he died, and was buried in the middle aisle of St Bride's, Fleet Street, near the pulpit

Such a career, so laborious, so methodical, so monotonous, is not usually found to be fertile in inci dent, and the story of Richard son is the story of his works, the insensible pre paration for which began betimes As a child he was a letter-writer, and even a moral letter-writer One of his school mates invited him, at a very early age, to attempt the history of a ser vant man (virtu ous) who marned his young mistress, and before he was eleven he had spontaneously addressed a hor tatory epistle to a backbiting widow of near fifty His gift with the pen made him the chosen and will ing scribe of the of the epistles prepared for this purpose suggested a separate story 'And hence,' in the writer's own words, 'sprung Paniela'

Virtue Rewarded, the second title of Pamela, (whose name, by the way, is borrowed from Sidney's Arcadia), sufficiently indicates the object of the book But the precise author added further explanatory details It was, he said, 'a series of familiar letters from a beautiful young damsel to her parents, published in order to cultivate the principles of virtue and religion in the vouth of both sexes' It was besides 'a narrative which had its foundation in truth and nature, and, at the same time that it agreeably entertained by a variety of curious and affecting incidents, was entirely divested of all those images which, in too many pieces, calculated for amusement only, tend to inflame the minds they should instruct.' As to these last pretensions, it is possible that the modern reader, like the excellent Dr Watts, may have his doubts, but there can be no doubt as to the success of the book. Issued in two volumes in November 1740, by February it had reached a second edition, to be followed by a third in March, and a fourth in May Gentleman's Magazine, in a rapture of admiration, declared that it was 'judged in Town as great a Sign of Want of Curiosity not to have read Pamela, as not to have seen the French and Italian dancers' A Southwark clergyman extolled it from the pulpit, the great Mr Pope was alleged to have said that it would 'do more good than many volumes of sermons,' and profance persons went as far as to compare it with the Bible. Fine ladies at public gardens (Mrs Barbauld says Ranelagh, but Ranelagh was not opened) held up the popular tomes to one another 'to shew they had got the book that every one was talking of' In short, its vogue was undeniable. It interested, it held the reader, it dealt with existing men and women, and it was as different as possible from the 'huge folios of manity,' the Clelias and the Cassandras, which then constituted the light reading of Those who examine it now, while the period thoroughly recognising the sincerity of its intention, will probably be repelled both by its manner and its morality They will also conclude that the prolonged defence of the heroine's chastity smacks unpleasantly of expediency and calculation it is a peculiarity of the writer's minute and exasperating method that its cumulative effect is difficult to resist. Attracting at first insensibly, it gradually fascinates, and finally absorbs over, its patient analysis of motive is akin to genius, and its knowledge of the female heart extraordinary from the outset. The quotation from Horace which Fielding afterwards applied to the author of Clarissa is already true of the author of this earlier book upon which he built up his own brilliant reputation

Pectus maniter angit,
Irritat, mulcet, falsis terroribus implet
Ut Magus. (Hor. Epist II L)

The story of Fielding's Joseph Andrews, and the connection with Pamela of what Richardson not unnaturally styled its 'lewd and ungenerous engraftment,' belongs, however, to our account of Fielding Of the other works which owe their origin to Richardson's book, it is only necessary to recall the names Panula's Conduct in High Life, Pamela Censured, Anti Pamela, The Apology for the Life of Mrs Shamela Andrews, &c., had nevertheless this effect, that they prompted the author to produce two supplementary volumes. 'Second parts are never good,' says the bachelor Samson Carrasco in Don Quixote, and these supplementary volumes, which appeared in December 1741, were no exception to the rule. They were dull they were heavy, and they were 'less a continuation than the author's defence of himself' But two years later he was already engaged upon a far greater work than Pamela, the book entitled Clarissa, or, the History of a Young Lady, of which the further object, as particularised upon the title page, was to show 'the Distresses that may attend the Misconduct both of Parents and Children in Relation to Marriage.' The first two volumes were published in November 1747, and in April and December of the following year the book was completed by five more. Notwithstanding its extent, it is Richardson's masterpiece. Its subject is not, like that of Pamela, 'virtue rewarded,' but rather virtue hunted down and outraged the author has rendered such a theme endurable through so many pages-which pages, moreover, cover only a period of eleven months-is an unanswerable proof of his genius And not only is his heroine one of the most beautiful, as she is the noblest and purest of her sex, but her creator, whose strength hitherto had not lain in the delineation of men, has achieved, in her seducer, Lovelace (whether he built him on the lines of Rowe's Lothario or not), one of the most attractive villains of fiction In addition to this, the book, as a narrative, straggles less than its predecessor, there is no wandering from the plain path of the story, and no dallying with details which retard the carrying onward of the Unhasting, unresting, unrelenting, the author progresses to his foreseen conclusion with all the inexorable impetus of Fate. Clarissa, or (as it is popularly and erroneously called) Clarissa Harlowe, was, and deserved to be, a success. From persons of quality like Lady Mary Wortley Montagu and Lady Hervey, down to the seamstress behind her Cheapside or Ludgate counter, the little printer's book set all England sobbing, and the wave of sentiment spread from England to the Continent, where the sorrows of Richardson's heroine delighted the great critic Diderot, and stimulated the super-sensitised spirit of Rousseau. Jean-Jacques, who remembered Clarissa in his Nouvelle Heloise, declared that nothing equal to or approaching it had been written in any language, while Diderot placed its author on the some shelf with Moses and Homer, Euripides and Sophocles. History, he said, painted individuals, Richardson had painted the human species. In Germany, Klopstock, Gellert, and Wieland added their voices to the chorus. The book was promptly translated into German, Dutch, and French—the French translator being none else than the Abbé Prevost, himself the author of another epochmaking novel, Manon Lescant. Prévost had already translated the first two volumes of Pamela, and he also made a version of Grandison.

Six years clapsed before Richardson again came forward as a novelist In Classes he had intended the portrait of a good woman, in his next and last worl he essayed the (to him) more difficult task of depicting a good man-'a man of true honour' Sir Charles Grandison (whose surname lins become synonymous with a certain frigid and formal politeness) represents the beau-ideal of a perfect gentleman and Christian He disapproves of duelling as fervently as Steele, declines to dock the trils of his horses, and comports himself generally, on all occasions, including the Macheath-like dilemma of loving two ladies at once, with a most edifying dis-But, although lie is drawn with strokes as minute and patient, he never quite 'comes off' in the same way as Clarissa. He is too superfine, too courteous, too impeccable for 'human nature's duly food,' and one can understand, and even excuse, the burst of unwonted levity with which I have eventually dismisses him 'He is great, he is generous, he is delicate, he is pious, he is irreproachable, he has never done a dirty action or been betrayed into a false gesture. His conscience and his wig are intact. So be it. He shall be canonised and stuffed' But if the hero of the book never attains to the faultless monsterhood at which the author aimed, in the feminine characters, Clementina, Harriet Byron, Charlotte Grandison, and so forth, he is again at his best. And though Su Charles Grandison does not equal Clarissa, it is immeasurably superior to Pamela

Besides the volume of model letters with which Pamela originated, a pamphlet dealing with the treatment he had experienced at the hands of the Dublin bool sellers, and a paper in the Rambler (No 97, on 'Virtuous Courtship'), in the introductors sentence to which Johnson describes him as an author who had 'enlarged the knowledge of human nature, and taught the passions to move at the command of virtue,' Richardson made no further contributions to literature of any importance. He continued to write at inordinate length to his friends and admirers, mostly of the opposite sex, and to receive complacently the unstinted tribute of their adulation. A nervous, sentimental little man, a vegetarian and water-drinker, his health, undermined by long scdentury occupation, declined as he gren older, and he became subject to fits of diviness. His chief mode of exercise was walking, with alternative of that recently-revived | substitute for equitation, the chamber-hobby or horse. He quitted London rarely, and then got no farther than Bath or Tunbridge Wells, where he might be seen in his flaxen wig, furtively shuffling along the side-walks, one hand in his bosom, the other at his chin or grasping his cane head beneath his coat-tails, shyly distrustful of strangers, but brightening into a fluttered benignity upon the approach of Miss Highmore, Miss Fielding, Miss Mulso, Miss Talbot, Miss Collier, or some other member of the little consistory of fem nine flatterers when he called 'my ladges' whom he called 'my ladies' His three novels, as already stated, belong to his residence at North End, which seems at one time to have been known, either actually or familiarly, as Selby House (Corr 1 clv1), after the 'Selby House' in Grandison His favourite writing place was a grotto or arbour in the middle of the garden at the back, where he had a seat with an ink horn on the side He has also an ink-pot let into the handle of his chair in Highmore's portrait lt was his practice to write his letters, either feigned or real, upon a little board which he held in his hand, and this is shown in another picture by Mason Chamberlin, which has been engraved. Some of his work must have been done at Salisbury Court, but it is probable that the greater part of Clarissa and Grandison had its birth in the grotto at North End. To this, says Mrs Barbauld, he used to retreat in the morning 'before the family were up, and, when they met at breakfist, he communicated the progress of his story, which, by that means, had every day a fresh and lively interest. Then began the criticisms, the pleadings, for Harriet Byron or Clementina, every turn and every incident was eagerly canvassed, and the author enjoyed the benefit of knowing beforehand how his situations would strike.' One of these sessions, which sometimes took place in the grotto itself, is depicted in a little sketch by Miss High more, where Richardson is shown reading the manuscript of Grandison to a circle of friends. These readings must have been invaluable to lim in shaping and modifying the course of his story They must also be responsible, in some measure, for its exceptional length, if, as he told Young, he was apt to add three pages for every one that he retrenched But his prolivity was innate. It was a part of his minute method, and it is also part of his strength 'You have,' said Aaron Hill, who tried vainly to abridge him, 'formed a style where verbosity becomes a virtue, because, in pictures which you draw with such a skilful negli, gence, redundance but conveys resemblance, and to contract the strokes would be to spoil the like ness' This is the verdict of an admirer, but it Richardson's style is not good, it is is true colloquial, it is pedestrian, it is diffuse. But it is also direct and unaffected, and, what is more, in the much-debated metaphor of Buffon, it is the man himself—the sentient being, Phonine même

I had taken care to have ready, within a little distance, a surgeon and his assistant, to whom, under an oath of ecreey, I had revealed the matter (though I did not own it to the two gentlemen) so that they were prepared with bandages, and all things proper. For well was I acquainted with the bravery and skill of my chevalier, and had heard the character of the other, and knew the animosity of both. A post chaise was ready, with each of their footnen, at a little distance.

The two chevaliers came exactly at their time—they were attended by Monsieur Margate (the Colonel's gentleman) and myself. They had given orders over night, and now repeated them in each other's presence, that we should observe a strict impartiality between them and that, if one fell, each of its should lool upon himself, as to any needful help or retreat, as the servant of the survivor, and take his commands accordingly

After a few compliments, both the gentlemen, with the greatest presence of mind that I ever beheld in men, stript to their shirts, and drew

They parried with equal judgment several passes. My chevalur drew the first blood, making a desperate push, which, by a sudden turn of his antagonist, missed going clear through him, and wounded him on the fleshy part of the ribs of his right side, which part the sword tore out, being on the extremity of the body but, before my chevalure could recover himself, the Colonel, in return, pushed him into the inside of the left ann, near the shoulder and the sword (raking his breast as it passed) being followed by a great effusion of blood, the Colonel said, sir, I believe you have enough

We gave the signal agreed upon to the footmen, and they to the surgeons, who instantly came up

Colonel Morden, I found, was too well used to the bloody work, for he was as cool as if nothing extra ordinary had happened, assisting the surgeons, though his own wound bled much. But my dear chevalier fainted away two or three times running, and vomited blood besides

However, they stopped the bleeding for the present, and we helped him into the voiture, and then the Colonel suffered his own wound to be dressed, and appeared concerned that my chevalier was between while (when he could speak, and struggle) extremely outrageous.—Poor gentleman! he had made quite sure of victory!

The Colonel, against the surgeons' advice, would mount on horseback to pass into the Venetian territories, and generously gave me a purse of gold to pay the surgeons, desiring me to make a present to the footman, and to accept of the remainder, as a mark of his catisfaction in my conduct, and in my care and tenderness of my master

The surgeon told him, that my chevalier could not live over the day

When the Colonel took leave of him, Mr Lovelace said, You have well revenged the dear creature.

I have, sir, said Mr Morden and perhaps shall be sorry that you called upon me to this work, while I was balancing whether to obey, or disobey, the dear angel

There is a fate in it 1 replied my chevalier—a cursed fate 1—or this could not have been 1—but be je all witnesses, that I have provoked my destiny, and acknowledge that I fall by a man of honour

Sir, said the Colonel, with the piety of a confessor (wringing Mr Lovelace's hand), snatch these few fleeting moments, and commend yourself to God

And so he rode off

The voiture proceeded slowly with my chevalier, yet the motion set both his wounds bleeding afresh, and it was with difficulty that they again stopped the blood.

We brought him alive to the nearest cottage, and he give orders to me to dispatch to you the packet I herewith send sealed up, and bid me write to you the particulars of this most unhappy affair, and give you thanks, in his name, for all your favours and friend ship to him

Contrary to all expectation, he lived over the night but suffered much, as well from his impatience and dis appointment as from his wounds, for he seemed very unwilling to die

He was delirious, at times, in the two last hours, and then several times cried out, as if he had seen some frightful specific. Take her away! Take her away! but named nolody. And sometimes praised some lady (that Clarissa, I surpose, whom he had invoked when he received his death's wound), calling her, Sweet Excellence! Divine Creature! Fair Sufferer!—and once he said, Look down, Blessed Spirit, look down!—and there stopped,—his hips however moving

At nine in the morning, he was seized with convul sions, and fainted away, and it was a quarter of an hour before he came out of them

His few last words I must not omit, as they show an ultimate composure, which may administer some consolation to his honourable friends

Blessed—said he, addressing himself no doubt to Heaven, for his dying eyes were lifted up—a strong convulsion prevented him for a few moments saying more—but recovering, he again with great fervour (lifting up his eyes, and his spread hands) pronounced the word blessed—then, in a seeming ejaculation, he spoke inwardly so as not to be understood at last, he distinctly pronounced these three words,

LET THIS EXPIATE!

and then, his head sinking on his pillow, he expired, at about half an hour after ten

He little thought, poor gentleman! his end so near so had given no direction about his body. I have caused it to be embowelled, and deposited in a vault, till I have orders from England.

This is a favour that was procured with difficulty, and would have been refused, had he not been an English man of rank a nation with reason respected in every Austrian government—for he had refused ghostly attend ance, and the sacriments in the Catholic way May his soul be happy, I pray God l

I have had some trouble also, on account of the manner of his death, from the magistraey here who have taken the requisite informations in the affair And it has cost some money. Of which, and of the dear chevalier's effects, I will give you a faithful account in my next. And so, waiting at this place your commands, I am, sir.

Your most faithful and obedient servant,

Γ J DE LA TOUR.

Sir Charles Grandison.

Sir Charles Grandison, in his person, is really a very fine man. He is tall, rather slender than full his face in shape is a fine oval, he seems to have florid health, health confirmed by exercise.

His complexion seems to have been naturally too fine for a man but, as if he were above being regardful of it, his face is overspread with a manly sinniness, [I want a word,] that shows he has been in warmer climates than England and so it seems he has, since the tour of Europe has not contented him. He has visited some parts of Asia, and even of Afric, Egypt particularly

I vonder what business a man has for such fine teeth, and so fine a month, as Sir Charles Grandison might boast of, were he vain

In his aspect there is something great and noble, that shews him to be of rank. Were kings to be chosen for beauty and majesty of person, Sir Charles Grandison would have few competitors. His eye—Indeed, my Lucy, his eye shews, if possible, more of sparkling in telligence than that of his sister——

Now pray be quiet, my dear uncle Selby! What is beauty in a man to me? You all know that I never thought beauty a qualification in a man

And yet, this grandeur in his person and air is accompanied with so much ease and freedom of manners, as engages one's love with one's reverence. His good breeding renders him very necessible. His sister says, he is always the first to break through the restraints, and to banish the diffidences, that will generally attend persons on a quite new acquaintance. He may, for he is sure of being acceptable in whatever he does or says

Very true, Lucy shake your head if you please.

In a word, he has such an easy, yet manly politeness, as well in his dress as in his address, (no singularity appearing in either), that were he not a fine figure of a man, but were even plain and hard featured, he would be thought (what is far more eligible in a man than mere beauty) very agreeable.

Sir Charles Grandison, my dear, has travelled, we may say, to some purpose.

Well might his sister tell Mr Reeves, that whenever he married he would break half a score hearts.

Upon my word, Lucy, he has too many personal ad vantages for a woman, who loved him with feculiarity, to be easy with, whatever may be his virtne, from the foible our sex in general love to indalge for handsome men. For, O my dear! women's eyes are sad giddy things, and will run away with their sense, with their understandings, beyond the power of being overtaken either by stop-thief, or hue and cry

I know that here you will bid me take care not to increase the number of the giddy, and so I will, my I us.

The good sense of this real fine gentleman is not, as I can find, rusted over by sourness, by moroseness he is above quarrelling with the world for trifles but he is still more above making such compliances with it as would impeach either his honour or conscience. Once Miss Grandison, speaking of her brother, said. My brother is valued by those who know him best, not so much for being a handsome man, not so much for his birth and fortune, nor for this or that single worthiness, as for being, in the great and yet comprehensive sense of the word, a good man And at another time she said. that he lived to himself, and to his own heart, and though he had the happiness to please every body, yet he made the indement or approbation of the world matter but of second consideration. In a word, added she, Sir Charles Grandison, my brother, (and when she looks proud, it is when she says, no brother), is not to be misled either by false glory, or false shame, which he calls. The great snares of virtue.

What a man is this, so to act '-What a woman is this, so to distinguish her brother's excellencies'

What a poor creature am I, compared to either of them! And yet I have had my admirers. So perhaps may still more faulty creatures among their inferiors. If, my Lucy, we have so much good sense as to make fair comparisons, what have we to do but to look forward rather than backward, in order to obtain the grace of humility?

But let me tell you, my dear, that Sir Charles does not look to be so great a self denier, as his sister seems to think him, when she says, he lives to himself, and to his own heart, rather than to the opinion of the world

He dresses to the fashion, rather richly, 'tis true, than gaudily, but still righly so that he gives his fine person its full consideration. He has a great deal of vivacity in his whole aspect, as well as in his eye. Mrs Tenny says, that he is a great admirer of handsome women. His equipage is perfectly in taste, though not so much to the glare of taste, as if he aimed either to inspire or shew emulation He seldom travels without a set, and suit able attendants, and what I think seems a little to savonr of singularity, his horses are not docked their tails are only tied up when they are on the road I took notice of when we came to town I want, me thinks, my dear, to find some fault in his outward appearance, were it but to make you think me impar tial, my gratitude to him and my veneration for him notwitbstanding

But if he be of opinion that the tails of these noble animals are not only a natural ornament, but are of real use to defend them from the vexatious insects that in summer are so apt to annoy them (as Jenny just now told me was thought to be his reason for not depriving his cattle of a defence, which nature gave them), how far from a dispraise is this humane consideration! And how, in the more minute as well as we may suppose in the greater instances, does he deserve the character of the man of mercy, who will be mercifal to his beast!

I have met with persons, who call those men good, that yet allow themselves in liberties which no good man can take. But I dare say, that Miss Grandison means by good, when she calls her brother, with so much pride, a good man, what I, and what you, my Lucy, would understand by the word

Addison signed his papers in the Speciator with the letters of the name Cho, and this is the couplet which so delighted Johnson

The following little anacreontic has been universally credited to the pen of Oldys, who, according to a later antiquary and herald, Francis Grose, occasionally indulged in too deep potations of ale. It was published anonymously as 'made extempore by a gentleman, occasioned by a fly drinking out of his cup of ale.'

John Jortin (1698–1770), the son of a Huguenot refugee, born in London, became a prebendary of St Paul's and Archdeacon of London His chief works are Miscellaneous Observations upon Authors, Ancient and Modern (1731–32), Remarks on Ecclesiastical History (1751–53), a Life of Erasmus (1758–60), which was for a century the standard English book on the subject, and Tracts (1790) Dr Parr, the literary dictator, said of him 'Wit without ill-nature and sense without effort he could at will scatter on every subject.'

With a tragedy, Cleone (1758), acted at Covent Garden with extraordinary success, he closed his career as a dramatist. Dodsley is chiefly remembered by his Sclect Collection of Old Plays (12 vols 1744, 4th ed by W C Hazlitt, 15 vols 1874-76) and his Poems by Several Hands (3 vols 1748, 6 vols 1758) See Austin Dobson's Lighteenth Century Vignetics (2nd series, 1894) This was Dodsley's own

Though we sever, my fond heart,
Till we meet, shall pant for you.

Patrick Abercrombie (1656-17161), a descendant of an old Scottish Catholic family and younger brother of the first Lord Glassford, was born at Forfar, graduated at St Andrews, and practised medicine in Edinburgh, being appointed physician to James II in 1685 A strong Jacobite and nationalist, he published two anti-Union pamphlets in 1707, one of them a reply to Daniel His patriotism, however, found more notable utterance in his Martial Achievements of the Scots Nation (1711-16), a popular and discursive history of the national wars and struggles from the time of the mythical King Fergus I, three centuries before Christ, to the battle of Flodden Abercrombie's aim was to defend the legendary antiquity of Scotland against the sceptical criticism which as yet had got no hearing or tolerance north of the Tweed, and in his earlier chapters he repeats and elaborates the fables about Caractacus, Corbredus Galdus, and Achaius v hich had been concocted by Fordun and Boece (or by the annalists they took them from, see the next article, also Vol I pp 182, 212, 256) He shows an abundance of absolutely uncritical learning, and, in spite of his frequent divergence into contro versy, his style is easy and fluent enough to justify the esteem and popularity which he enjoyed for a while as the patriotic historian of Scotland.

The Antiquity of the Scottish Monarchy

Scotland boasts of an uninterrupted series of 112 sovereigns, that till this time have swayed its sceptre, since Fergus I, who began to reign 330 years before the Christian rera commenced, than which there's nothing so glorious, nothing equal or secondary in its kind. By this account Scotland has remained a monarchy, and monarchs of the same unspotted blood and royal line have governed it upwards of 2000 years, v hereas, according to their own historians, France has lasted littlerto but 1309, Spain 1306, England 918, Poland 719 (111), Denmark 920, Sweden 900, the Limpire of the Romans in Germany 831, and that of the Turks but 420. The empire or kingdom of China, 'tis owned, is of an older date than Scotland, but then, six several times, upon their own records, the race of their Kings has been changed by eavil wars, and they have been four times conquered by foreign and barbarous forces, nay at this very day a Tartar race sits on the throne instead of a Chinese Since, therefore, Scotland has such a pre eminence over the very pretensions of all other nations with reference to their respective antiquities and races of kings, 'tis no great wonder that some of our neighbours (and these are but few and late authors) have, through emulation and jealousy, attempted to strike out of the catalogue of Scots monarchs no less than 39, and to date the Scots government in North Britain from about the year of our This controversy was started by Luddus in the year 1572, Camden took the hint from him, as did afterwards the Bishop of St Asaph, and Dr Stilling fleet from both The last three were men emment for their learning and parts, but, as Englishmen in all ages, prejudiced against a rival but lesser nation, which nevertheless the immense treasure, refined policy, nor numerous, well disciplined and better paid forces of mighty England could never deject from equality in all things but wealth Archbishop Usher, a man whose excellencies the learned and pious will ever respect, and the Irish of L e (for of old they thought otherwise), have made the like attempts upon the Scots antiquities, and the race of their Kings Men of such a character, Loth English and Irish, could not fail to proselyte some www.iore.gners, as Duchesne, Père L'Abbé, and Thomas -25 its, at an opinion which, by depressing but one no ion, flatters the pride and raises the pretensions of most others, their own in particular But all in vain Scots writers have muntained with their pens the rights and territories Scots heroes first gained and then preserved with their arms, and what these effected by dint of sword, those have made good by dint of thought and force of argum at

Thomas Innes (1662-1744), a cadet of a gentle Catholic family in Aberdeenshire, was bred n priest in France, and studied and taught at the Scots College in Paris, of which he ultimately became Vice Principal in 1727 From 1698 to 1701 he was in Scotland as a missionary priest, and in 1724 Wodrow saw him in Edinburgh consulting the Advocates' Library, and described him as 'a monkish bookish person who meddles with nothing but literature' His historical studies, which seem to have begun with his share in the arrangement of the records of Glasgon Cathedral, possessed by the Scots College, bore good fruit in his Critical Essay on the Ancient Inhabitants of Scotland (1729), and his Ecclesiastical History of Scotland A D 80 to 818, first published by the Spalding Club in 1853 The former of these works has been justly described by Pinkerton as marking 'a grand epoch' in Scottish antiquities, and leading the way to 'rational criticism upon them' Innes was the first to assail the fabric of spurious history founded by Fordun and completed and adorned by Boece and Buchanan, and in the Critical Essay he dispressionately and laboriously demolished the whole legendary series of kings-the portruts of them are still in Holyrood-with which our ancestors had peopled the seven dark centuries preceding the actual settlement of the Scots in Dalriada. As the earliest to apply scientific methods to the Scottish historic legends and to print the authentic Pictish chronicles, Innes takes rank as the veritable father of Scottish history, nor is his position at all weakened by the pretty evident fact that he was stimulated partly by a Jacobite dislike of Buchanan and a desire to disprove the numerous stories of rebellion and deposition in the legendary chronicles. The Critical Essay is reprinted as volume viii of the 'Historians of Scotland' series, Edinburgh, 1879.

Thomas Boston (1676–1732), author of The Fourfold State, was born at Duns in Berwick shire, and educated there and at Edinburgh Uni For a time minister of Simprin (from 1699), he was in 1707 translated to Ettrick in Selkirkshire, and there he died His Fourfold State (1720) discourses, not without flashes of insight and felicity of diction, on human nature in its fourfold state of primitive integrity (in Eden), entire depravity (by the fall), recovery begun on earth, and happiness or misery consummate here after, and in Scotland was long recognised as a standard exposition of Calvinistic theology such it ranked in the esteem of clergy and laity next the Bible and the Confession of Futh, and in most pious Scottish households a copy of it was kept and studied by successive generations The Crook in the Lot, a little book written in a quant and striking style, was also a great favourite with the Scottish people. Many single sermons and collections of his sermons were published both during his life and after his death humous Memoirs-detailed, shrewd, kindly, tender, humorous, sincere—deserves a high place aniongst Christian biographies His entirely human frailies are as frankly recorded as his religious aspirations and fallings away Diametrically opposed as were their temperaments and views of life, Boston was one of R L Stevenson's recognised masters in Characteristic amongst Boston's phrase makings is his warning to loose livers not to expect the chance of 'a leap out of Delilah's hip into Abraham's bosom' In the ecclesiastical courts Boston distinguished himself by his zeal for the Church's independence, and in the controversy regarding the Marrow of Modern Divinity, he defended the anonymous Puritan soldier's book against the charge that it was too free in its offers Though by outsiders he is generally of salvation regarded as a typical high Presbyterian, he lad much trouble at Ettrick from the open hostility of the still 'higher' Presbyterian Cameronians or Macmillanites, of whom, in his Memons, he speaks very sharply, almost bitterly, and even his own flock suspected him as too near of kin to an Thus, unlike some of his brethren, he Erastian had no difficulty in proclaiming fasts appointed by secular government At the end of the Memours he thus gives a judicial view of

His own Character

That east of temper, whereby I was naturally slow. timorous, and diffident, but eager in pursuit when once engaged, as it early discovered itself, so I think it hath spread itself all along through the whole of my course It hath been a spring of much uneasiness to me in the course of my life, in that I was thereby naturally fond, where I loved Yet I cannot but observe, that my God hath made a valuable use of it, especially in my studies, combating special difficulties therein, till surmounted by Agreeable unto it, I was not of a quick apprehension, but had a gift of application and things being once discovered. I was no more wavening in them. I was addicted to silence, rather than to talking I was no good spokesman, but very unready, even in common conversation, and in disputes especially at a loss, when engaged with persons of great assurance the disadvan tage of which last I often found in Etterick, where an uncommon assurance reigned. The touching of my spirit. so as to set me above fear, the moving of my affec tions, and being once well dipped into the matter, were necessary to give me an easy exercise of my faculties, in these and other extempore performances My talent lay in doing things by a close application, with pains I had a tolerable faculty at drawing of and labour papers yet no faculty at dictating, but behoved to have the pen in my own hand, and even in that case it vould often have been a while ere I could enter on Accordingly, as for my sermons, it was often hard for me to fix on a text, the which hath oft times been more wasting and weakening to me than the study of my sermon thereon. I studied my sermons with the pen in my hand, my matter coming to me as I wrote, and the bread increasing in the breaking of it if at any time I walked, it was occasioned by my sticking Meanwhile, it would frequently have been long ere I got the vein of my subject struck but then I could not be easy, unless I thought I had hit it. Thence it was, I often tore out what I had written, and began anew again, but ordi narrly I found this turned to my greatest comfort and satisfaction, in end falling upon the vein. Hence it was not my manner to shift from text to text, but to insist long on an ordinary, the closing of which at length I readily found to relish as much with myself and the serious godly as the other parts preceding

Thus also I was much addicted to peace, and averse to controversy, though once engaged therein, I was set to go through with it I had no great difficulty to retain a due honour and charity for my brethren differing from me in opinion and practice, but then I was in no great hazard neither of being swayed by them to depart from what I judged truth or duty Withal it was easy to me to yield to them in things wherein I found not myself in conscience bound up Whatever precipitant steps I have made in the course of my life, which I desire to be humbled for, rashness in conduct was not my weak side But since the Lord by his grace brought me to consider things, it was much my exercise to discern sin and duty in particular cases, being afraid to venture on things until I should see myself called thereto but when the matter was cleared to me, I generally stuck fast by it, being as much afraid to desert the way which I took to be pointed out to me And this I sincerely judge to have been the spring of that course of conduct upon which Mr James Ramsy above mentioned did, before the commission anno 1717, in my hearing, give me the following character, viz. That if I thought myself right, there would be no diverting of me by uny means.

I never had the art of making rich, nor could I ever heartily apply myself to the managing of secular affairs. Even the secular way of managing the discipline of the church was so unacceptable to me that I had no heart to dip in the public church management. What uppear ances I made at any time in these matters were not readily in that way. I had a certain averseness to the being laid under any notable obligation to others, and so was not fond of gifts, especially in the case of any whom I had to deal with as a minister. And Providence so ordered that I had little trial of that kind. I easily perceived that in that case, 'the borrower is servant to the lender'

Martin Martin, born in Skye, took his M D at Leyden, and about 1685 was already factor, or estate agent, for Macleod (the laird) in Skye, and he died in 1719. In 1698 he published a Voyage to St Kilda, narrating his own observations, and, in 1703, 4 Description of the Western Islands of Scotland Dr Johnson had read Martin's book when he was very young, and was particularly struck with the St Kilda man's notion that the High Church of Glasgow had been hollowed out of a rock. This 'notion' had probably struck Addison also, as in the Spectator (No 50) he makes, as Mr Croker has remarked, the Indian king suppose that St Paul's was carred out of a rock. Martin's work is but poorly written. as Dr Johnson said, but the out of the-way information it contains, and even the credulity of the writer, gave it an interest and value it has not vet lost. Martin gives a long account of the secondsight or taish, as it is called in Grelic, in which he was a firm believer, though he admitted that it had greatly declined. In the dozen of pages he devotes to the subject he gives numerous authenticated cases, with names and addresses as in the transactions of the Psychical Research Society. including those that converted himself

The Second-sight

The second sight is a singular faculty of seeing an otherwise invisible object, without any previous means used by the person that sees it for that end. The vision makes such a lively impression upon the seers, that they neither see nor think of anything else except the vision, as long as it continues, and then they appear pensive or jovial, according to the object which was represented to them. At the sight of a vision the cyclids of the person are erected, and the eyes continue staring until the object vanish

If an object is seen early in a morning (which is not frequent), it will be accomplished in a few hours after wards, if at noon, it will commonly he necomplished that very day, if in the evening, perhaps that night if after candles be lighted, it will be accomplished that night, the latter always in accomplishment by weeks, months, and sometimes years, according to the time of night the vision is seen. When a shroud is perceived

Thomas Ruddiman (1674-1757), the chief of Scottish Latinists since the age of Buchanan, wrote little in the vernacular, but his editions of some earlier Scottish writers, his share in Scottish historical controversy, and his general literary activity give him the right to be mentioned here Born in Banffshire, and educated at King's College, Aberdeen, he became parish schoolmaster of Laurencekirk, but went thence to Edinburgh at the suggestion of Dr Pitcairne in 1700 assistant and latterly chief librarian of the Advo cates' Library, he was also a book auctioneer, a newspaper proprietor, and a successful printer. and did much good scholarly work, both original and editorial His well-known Rudiments (1714) and Institutions (1725-32) of the Latin tongue, and his 'immaculate' edition of Livy (1751), were his main achievements in classical philology. while to Scottish literature he contributed a reprint of Gawin Douglas's version of the Encid, with an excellent glossary, in 1710, and a fine edition of the works of George Buchanan (1715) which has not yet been superseded Ruddiman was a stout Royalist and Jacobite in politics, and his criticisms on Buchanan entangled him in a prolonged controversy (1746-50) on the right of succession to the crown of Scotland, in which his chief antagonist was a Presbyterian minister named George Logan Much more valuable than his polemical tracts were his contributions to James Anderson's Diplomata Scotiæ (1739), the first and for long the only monument of Scottish palæography A sound scholar and a worthy man, Ruddiman was praised by Dr Johnson, who stopped at Laurencekirk on his Scottish tour to remember the man 'by whose labours,' writes Boswell despondently, 'a knowledge of the Latin language will be preserved in Scotland if it shall be preserved at all' Boswell himself at one time intended to write the life of Ruddiman, but the work was left for the far less competent hand of George Chalmers (1794)

Robert Keitli (1681-1756), a bishop and primus in the Scottish Episcopal Church, was born in Kincardineshire of a younger branch of the family of the Earls Marischal, and spent most of his life in Edinburgh as the pastor of an A diligent student of Episcopal congregation Scottish antiquities, he published in 1735 a History of the Affairs of Church and State in Scotland during the Reformation, which, while strongly prelatist and Royalist in tone, sliows careful research and incorporates many valuable It has been reprinted by historical documents the Spottiswoode Society (1844-45), and is interesting—a good way after Innes's Critical Essay -as an evidence of the development of historic method in Scotland Keith is best known as an antiquary by his Catalogue of the Bishops of Scotland (1755), a laborious and praiseworthy compila tion for its time, but long liopelessly out of date

Robert Blair (1699-1746), author of The Grave, was an accomplished Scottish minister. who enjoyed some private fortune, lived in better style than his brother ministers, cultivated botany and general literature, and cherished the society of the neighbouring gentry He was born in Edinburgh, his father being minister of the Old Church there, and at Edinburgh University and in Holland he was educated In 1731 he was appointed to the living of Athelstaneford, the East Lothian parish in which Home, author of Douglas, was his successor Before his ordina tion, he had begun The Grave, and in 1742 he submitted the manuscript to Watts and Doddridge Watts offered it to two publishers in vain, as both thought it rather heavy for the times, but it appeared in 1743, and immediately became popular His one considerable work (besides lie published only an elegy and one or two paraphrases of Scripture), it is a sombre but suggestive poem of near eight hundred lines in blank verse, and is almost inevitably unoriginal in scope and plan. but vigorous in execution, harmonising well with the genius of Scottish Presbyterianism monotony of its didactic meditations is relieved by occasional flashes of true inspiration, and novel and graphic ways of wording hackneyed The variations on the great theme sometimes, indeed, are so unconventional as to have been denounced as low and vulgar both in thought and expression—'crammed' and 'tumbled flat upon his back' in the first extract may suffice as examples The versification (more like that of the drama than of poetry proper, as Professor Saintsbury says) is less rhythmical than Young's, and constantly admits a redundant syllable.

It has been matter of controversy whether Blur inspired Young, or contrariwise, practically the poems were contemporary (the Night Thoughts dated from 1742-44), but, as has been said, Young was doubtless encouraged in his longer task by the immediate success of Blur. It was no smill honour to Blur that William Blake put some of his best and best-known work into designs illustrating the congenial poem, notably 'Death's Door' and 'The Soul parting from the Body'. And in dedicating the edition with his twelve illustrations to the Queen (1808), Blake himself bursts into poetical criticism, and speaking apparently as much of his own share as of Blur's in the hand some quarto, proclaims

Bowing before my sovereign's feet,
'The grave produced these blossoms sweet,
In mild repose from earthly strife,
The blossoms of eternal strife.'

Deep groan, indeed, With anguish heavy laden ! let me trace it From yonder bed it comes, where the strong man, By stronger arm belaboured, gasps for breath Like a hard hunted beast. How his great heart Beats thick ! his roomy chest by far too scant To give the lungs full play 1 What now avail The strong built sinewy limbs and well spread shoulders? See how he tugs for life, and lays about him, Mad with his pain! Eager he catches hold Of what comes next to hand, and grasps it hard Just like a creature drowning Hideous sight! O how his eyes stand out, and stare full gliastly ! While the distemper's rank and deadly venom Shoots like a burning arrow 'cross his bowels, And drinks his marrow up Heard you that groan? It was his last. See how the great Goliah, Just like a child that brawled itself to rest, Lies still What mean'st thou then, O mighty borster, To vaunt of nerves of thine? What means the bull, Unconscious of his strength, to play the coward, And flee before a feeble thing like man That, knowing well the slackness of his arm, Trusts only in the well invented knife?

'Angel visits, short and bright' came from Norris of Bemerton (see above, page 259) to Blair, and from Blair to Campbell

What though my winged hours of bliss have been, Like angel visits, few and far between

The passage so often quoted by Burns (surely for the idea rather than for the characteristically conversational and unrhythmical expression of it) also contains a reminiscence of Norris

THE SCOTTISH VERNACULAR REVIVAL

Union in 1707 the Scottish Chancellor, Scafield, uttered his memorable saying, 'Now there's ane end of ane old song,' the echo of his words sent a chill to the hearts of all good Scotsmen, whatever their party or politics The bulk of the people not merely regretted but resented the loss of their Parliament, last con spicuous emblem of 'Scotland a nation' And the gradual introduction of English coinage, English weights and measures, English taxation, and English ways produced a vehement nationalism of which the Jacobite risings in the '15 and the '45 were but one consequence. A more permanent outcome was (not the revival of the national literature, but) the revival of the native speech as a literary vehicle. In one thing at least Scotticism might be cherished with even varmer affection than heretofore-but within well-understood limits, the revival of the old Scots for general literary purposes was forever out of the question The native tongue was not dead, but it had been too long divorced from the national culture to be a natural or sufficient instrument for expressing the various interests of the eighteenth Scotland was now a part of Europe. Scottish writers justly ambitious of a European audience would stultify themselves by harking back to a local dialect that for a hundred years had lived on mainly in the mouths of country-folks, fishers, and handicraftsmen, and become greatly limited in its scope and capacities. Scotsmen were about to claim a very conspicuous place in English literature, and, writing in English to bestow on posterity a richer bequest than the old Scottish authors of Scotland's first golden age, Edinburgh was to be recognised as the Modern Athens we-speaking only of the works of men born before the end of the first quarter of the eighteenth century—imagine Hume's Essays in 'broad Scotch,' or his History of England? or Reid's Pullosophy of the Intellectual Powers? Thomson's Seasons? Robertson's Charles V? or Adam Smith's Wealth of Vations? The old literary tongue was, as such, dead, nor could any combination of wit and wisdom put back the shadow on the dial

Long before Scotch ceased to be a literary tongue in the full sense, the chief models for Scottish writers were their great English predecessors and contemporaries After the Reformation the language of literature, of the Church, and of public life came to be normally English-English with a difference—and the language of

HEN on signing the Act of | Scottish civic society became increasingly anglicised. Bible, psalm-book, confession, catechism, were in English, made in England The books of devotion were English, at most, like Rutherford's letters. English with Scotch words brought in with effect at wide intervals By the end of the seventeenth century books were no longer printed in Scotch, and for more than half a century nobody had been taught to spell or write Scotch Scottish authors wrote regularly in English Nothing but occasional songs, pasquils, or chap books appeared in Scotch, and then the Scotch was seldom Scotch throughout. All but the utterly uneducated were. in town or country, constantly hearing English. reading nothing but English, and, even if they spoke Scotch, writing their letters in English

> Yet then and now, in spite of adverse circumstances, this mixed dialect lived on in surprising vigour amongst the humbler classes, and was not merely a pithy spoken vernacular, but (for specific uses) an admirably effective literary instrument It was least anglicised amongst those living farthest from the towns Most largely anglicised was the macaronic used by the edu cated who condescended to the vernacular in conversation with their illiterate neighbours, in hours of relaxation or domesticity, and for jests and anecdotes The 'broad Scotch' heard by Dr Johnson amongst Scottish literati was substantially English spoken with a markedly Scottish intonation. The old heroic ballads, even, were rarely in quite broad Scotch, never in the broadest Scotch To make Blind Harry's Hallace intelligible to his contemporaries, higher and lower, Hamilton of Gilbertfield in 1722 translated the poem from old Scots into English, and it was this version that, half a century later, poured a flood of Scottish prejudice into Burns's breast writing for Scotsmen even on Scottish subjects employed English regularly -as vitness the authors dealt with above at pages 301-305

> A prose treatise wholly in Scotch on any subject whatever was impossible, so was a sustained and dignified poem. But verse-writing in the vernacular had never wholly ceased, and was practised sporadically in various kinds with curious limita-Jocular, facetious, and satirical verse was produced in as broad a form of the vernacular as the writer could attain, love poems also, when they professed to reproduce the lovers' spoken utterance, and in a less broad form. Very much in proportion as the subject was serious was the English tinge or element in vernacular verse conspicuously large, often even passing into English altogether Beattie, author of the Isinsticl, who vas publishing his first poems about the middle of the century, did write admirable and pithy ver nacular verse on occasion, but said, not long before Burns's time. To vitte in the vulgar broad Scotch, and vet seriously, is now impossible, for more than balf a century it has by the Scots been considered a dialect of the vulgar.

About the time Beattic speaks of, Allan Ramsay was of another opinion. It was Ramsay who fixed the standard for the revived Scottish vernacular poetising, a stundard in rhyme and diction so closely followed by his successors, Fergusson and Burnsthough both I ergusson and Burns worded many of the traps into which honest Allan fell open eyed, and, with truer humour and better taste, recognised the limits within which the vernacular was available vithout becoming grotesque. Allan even wrote clegies in Scotch in which noble Scottish ladies are incongruously addressed by the pseudo classic names of Keitha and Southeska! And profitably to paraphrase Horace, the most courtly and elegant of Litin poets, in a dialect deliberately rejected by the educated and resigned to the special use of the day labourer and the mechanic, is about as feasible as it would be to reproduce Aschylus in Ur harnes's excellent Dorsetshire, or to render the gems of the Greek anthology in the actually spoken and pithy dialect of the Old Kent Road

Ramsay had acquired some credit as the laureate of a club, and as author of a few pithy occasional and saturical verses in the manner of Scripill, before he conceived the patriotic ambition of awalening interest in old Scottish poetry, and of continuing the production of it on a larger His loose and sadly vulgarised version of pirt of Christ's Kirl on the Green, as well as his editing of the Evergreen, shows how illequipped he was for undertaking this work from the historical and philological side. The dialogue of his Gentle Shipherd is about as far removed from the actual rough and ready speech of contemporary Scottish country folk as are the idyllic pictures of their amiable occupations from a representation of actual life on a Lowland farm And his songs remain to show how little sense he had for a pure style of Scotch, the sub stance of them being at times sound vernacular (occasionally with an archaic word or two), at times ordinary English, at times the characteristic, stilted, and formal English poetic diction of the eighteenth century, already artificial enough, but made still more unnatural by being done over into a 1 and of fancy Scotch Ramsay wrote some poems in English throughout, and sometimes evidently meant to write in his mixed, artificial jargon of broken English But for him and his successors, it was perhaps almost inevitable that the typical Scotch should be that which was most patriotically unlike English did not distinguish between the purer Scots of the landward folks and the debased dialect of the Edinburgh slums, often London slang transported to the north, and the lingo that would have reproduced aptly enough in verse the actual speech of the haunters of low town pothouses was transferred simpliciter to poems in which noble ladies and gentlemen were the inter The academy for regulating the revived Scottish tongue was not even the man in the street and the man on the moors, but the men and women who spoke the most uncouth and even debased form of the tongue corruptions, monstrosities, and barbarisms, ignorant mispronunciations and illiterate misspellings, were equally welcome-not indeed to Ramsay, but to many of his initators. 'The Carritches' for the Catechism is as typical Scotch as sparrer grass or sparrow grass is the typically English form of asparagus, 'pockmantie' is an extraordinarily debased form of portmanteau, 1 large proportion of modern Scotch words are simply the result of slurred and slovenly utterance -'Embro' for Edinburgh and 'scomfish' for discomfit are parallel to 'gemman' and 'nuffink' in London, 'dinna' and 'canna,' now universally accepted in place of the old Scots 'do nocht' and 'can nocht,' are precisely on the same philological level as the Cockney "e dunno for he don't know,' and 'Ou ay, a' ae oo' for 'Oh ay, all one wool,' instead of being a triumph of expressiveness, shows how a nervous, pithy organism like the Scottish tongue can be degraded to boneless pulp.

Nothing more convincingly shows that a lan gunge has fallen out of the race than when its characteristic words and sounds are spelt, even by those who use them, in terms of another language, The practice of with another phonetic system spelling Scots words with the modern English power of the vowels, long established and now carried much further, shows that Scots was no longer a rule to itself A Scotsman who knows Scots can pronounce house, cow, town, round, die, without having the English phonetic equiva lents-hoose, coo, toon, roond, dee-provided for him as in a 'pronouncing' dictionary, 'ccevil' and 'peety' are not Scotch words, but English spellings of the way an old-fishioned Scotsman pronounces civil and pity And 'tae dae' are not words at all, but attempts, and extremely in accurate attempts, to indicate to an eye trained to English spelling the value given in old Scots to the vowels in 'to do,' the old and only genuine Seafield's words, 'Now there's Scots spelling ane end of ane old song,' might have been said of the Scots tongue as a literary language The very form of his utterance for general use proves it, as does the fact that when it is quoted it is almost never cited as lie said it and as it was reported at the time, but translated into some such form as 'Noo there's an en' o' an auld sang' But that the song was not yet at an end in various and admirable shapes and uses, the extracts from the following authors show DP.

Dr Alexander Pennecuik (1652-1722), son of a surgeon in the Swedish and Covenanting armies, practised physic himself in Pecblesshire, and wrote divers pieces of indifferent verse, which he reprinted in his Historical Description of Tweeddale in 1715 The chief of them is an allegorical rhyme entitled Truth's Travels, composed in a modification of the vernacular, after this manner

When lirk was shaeld and preaching done, dismis ed And men and women buth went hum, Nie man called Truth to his disjoun, breakfast

Albeit he was of noble fame. There was not one that I ept a craime, But they had bacon, beef, and ale,

In his attempts in English verse Pennecuik was not content with imitation, but would sometimes plagarise an entire passage from Rochester or Ayton There was another Meanuder Penneenth. possibly a relative (died 1730), an Edinburgh citizen who wrote Streams from Helicon (1720) and Flowers from Parnassus (1726) in the Scotch nernacular, and described the coarser aspects of Edinburgh life in the fashion set by Allan Ramsay One of his effusions tells the story of 'half-hangit Maggie Dickson,' who escaped so strangely from the executioner's hands in 1724. It ind others of this most characteristic verses appear in a Collection of Scots Poems on Several Occasions, printed at Edinburgh in 1756

Alexander Robertson of Strowan (1668-1749), a Pertlishire laird and irreconcilable Jacobite, who was in almost every rebellion from 1689 to 1745, wrote some verses which were published at Edinburgh in 1751 in a volume that is one of the curiosities sought after by Scottish bibliophiles It is described not unfairly by Macaulay as 'a volume of poems always very stupid and often very profligate, which, lind it been manufac tured in Grub Street, 'would scarcely have been lionoured with a quarter of a line in the Durciad' As the recreations of a Highland chief however, produced in a Highland liut before Culloden (for Strownn, through confiscation and dissipation, was reduced to sordid poverty), the verses have a certain historic interest, although the only good lines in them are nothing but an impudent theft from Butler's Hudibras

William Hamilton of Gilbertfield (1665?-1751), son of a Fife laird, served is a lieutenant in the army, and after his retirement made the requaintance of Allan Ramsay, with whom he corre-ponded in some rhyming epistles, which seem to have given Burns an occasional hint lins a minor place among Ramsay's contemporaries in virtue of his Last dying II ords of Bonrie Heck a poem in the 'Habbie Simpson' stanza and sentiment on the death of a famous Fife grey hound, which appeared in Witson's Creia Cellection in 1706 More notable historically was his metrical modernisation of Blind Harry's 'Willace, dedicated to the 'High Puissant and most noble Prince James. Duke of Hamilton,' and published in 1722 The version, as will be seen from the following specimen, is no better than doggerel, but it won instant popularity among the Scottish persenter, and is memorable in a way as the book which give Burns his boyish reading and 'poured a Scottish prejudice' into his veins. It is significant of the progress of anglicisation that in this highly successful attempt to popularise an old Scottish classic amongst the Scottish people, the medium adopted vas modern English

The Battle of Stirling

The day of buttle does approach at length. The English thus advance with all their strength And fifty thousand march in battle rank I ull six to one, yet Wallace never shrank The rest they lay about the castle hill, Both field and eastle thought to have at will The worthy Scots together close did bide In the plain field upon the other side Hugh Kirkingham the vanguard on led he Cre singham With twenty thousand likely men to see The Larl of Warren thirty thousan I had If all were good the number was not bad Thus fifty thousand silly Southron sots Proudly march up against nine thousand Scots, When Kirkingham his twenty thousand men Had passed the bridge, quite to the other end, Some of the Scots, in earnest without scorn, Thought it high time to blow the warning horn, But Wallace be marched stoutly through the plain, Led on his men, their number did disdain The hards Scots with heavy strokes and sore Attack the twenty thousand that came o'er Wallace and Ramsay, Lundie, Boyd, and Graham With dreadful strokes made them retire, for shame !

William Hamilton of Bangour (1704-54) was born at his father's estate of Bangour in Linkthgowshire, and was bred a Whig at North Berwick by his stepfather, Lord President Dil rymple. He was the delight of the fashionable circles of his native country, and became early distinguished as a poet by his contributions to Ramsay's Tea-table Miscellus (1724-27) Rome, whither he had been sent for his health he is said to have been converted to Jicobitism by Prince Charlie himself and in 1745 he joined his standard, and became the 'volunteer laureate' of the Jacobites by celebrating the battle of Gladsmur After Culloden he succeeded in escaping to France, and in Dennistoun's Veneurs of Sir Robert Strange there are some interesting notes of his residence at Rouen But, through his friends and admirers at home, a pardoux is procured for him, and in 1750 he succeeded his clder brother in the paternal estate. He did not live Ion, to enjoy his good fortune. his health had always been delicate, and a pulmoran attack forced him to seek the surmer climite of the Continent. He productly declined, and died as

Lyons In 1748 some person unknown to him (seemingly Adam Smith) collected and published his poems in Glasgov, but the first genuine and correct copy did not appear till 1760, after Hamilton's death, when a collection was made from his on minuscripis. A notable feature in his English verse is his ornate diction, and there he usually shows more fancy than feeling

In everlasting blushes seen,
Such I ringle shines of sprightly mien,
To her the power of love imparts,
I ich gift! the soft successful arts,
That best the lover's fire provole,
The hely step, the mirthful jole,
The spealing glance, the amorous vale,
The sportful laugh, the winning smile
Her soul awakening every grace,
Is all abroad upon her face,
In bloom of vouth still to survive,
All charms are there, and all alive.

Others of his amatory verses are full of conceits and chargerated expression, without a trace of real passion. He wrote a didactic poem, 'Contemplation,' and, in blink verse, a national one on the Illistic, and the order of larighthood named from it

How oft beneath
Its martial influence have Scotia's sons,
Through every age, with dauntless valour fought
On every hostile ground! While o'er their breast, Companion to the silver star, blest type
Of fame, unsulhed and superior deed,
Dis inguished ornament! this native plant
Surrounds the sainted cross, with costly row
Of gems emblazed, and flame of radiant gold,
A sacred mark, their glory and their pride!

His billed of 'The Braes of Yarrow' is his masterpiece, and in virtue of it he ranks high amongst the revicers of vernacular poetry. Suggested, it may be, by the old ballad of 'The Dowie Dens of Yarrow' (printed by Scott in the Border Minstrelsy), it has real nature, tenderness, and pastoral simplicity, and it struct the Leynote of Wordsworth's 'Three Yarrows'

The Braes of Yarrow

A Pullye, bushive, my bonnie, bonnie bride, Bullye, bushive, my winsome marrow! It kive, bullye, my bonnie, bonnie bride, and think nice mair on the Bracs of Varrow

B. Where gat ye that bonnie, bonnie bride?
Where gat ye that winsome marrow?
A. I gat here here I darena well be seen,
Paling the birks on the Braes of Yarrow

Weep not, weep no my bonnie, bonnie bride,
We progress teep not, my win-ome marror!
You't the heart lam nt to live
Puting the bit's on the Braes of Varrow

H. Why does, he meep, the bonnie, bonn e bride?

Why do ish exp, then insome marrow?

In Inh doe you me main not be seen,

I ung the brids on the Braes of Narrom?

A Lang maun she weep, lang maun she, maun she weep,
Lang maun she weep with dule and sorrow,
And lang maun I nae mair weil be seen
Pu ing the birks on the Braes of Yarrow

For she has tint her luver, luver dear,
Her luver dear, the cause of sorrow,
And I hae slain the comeliest swain
That e'er pu'd birks on the Braes of Yarrow

Why runs the stream, O Yarrow, I arrow, red?
Why on thy braces heard the voice of sorrow?
And why con melancholeous weids
Hung on the bonnie birks of Yarrow?

What's yonder floats on the rueful, rueful flude? What's yonder floats? O dule and sorrov! 'Tis he, the comely swain I slew Upon the duleful Braes of Yarrow

Wash, O wash his wounds, his wounds in tears, His wounds in tears with dule and sorrov, And wrap his limbs in mourning weeds, And lay him on the Braes of Yarrow

Then build, then build, ye sisters, sisters sad, Ye sisters sad, his tomb with sorrow, And weep around in waeful wise,
His helpless fate on the Braes of Yarrov

Curse ye, curse ye, his useless, nseless shield,
My arm that wrought the deed of sorrow,
The fatal spear that pierced his breast,
His comely breast, on the Braes of Yarrow

His comely breast, on the Braes of Yarrow Did I not warn thee not to lu'e, And warn from fight? but to my sorrow,

O'er rashly bald a stronger arm
Thou met'st, and fell on the Braes of Yarrow

Sweet smells the birk, green grows, green grows the gress, I ellow on Yarrow's bank the gowan, Fair hangs the apple frac the rock,

e xin

Sweet the wave of Yarrow flowan

Flor s Yarrow sweet? as sweet, as so eet flows Tweed, As green its grass, its gownn as yellow, As sweet smells on its bracs the birk, The apple frac the rock as mellor

Fair was thy luve, fair, fair indeed the luve, In howery bands thou him didst fetter, Though he was fair and weil believed again, Than me he never lu'ed thee better

Bush ye, then bush, my bonnie, bonnie bride,
Bush ye, bush ye, my winsome marrow,
Bush ye, and lu'e me on the banks of I weed,
And think my mair on the Brites of Narrow

And think not mair on the Braes of Yarrow C. How can I busk a bonnie, bonnie bride, How can I busk a vensome marrow, How life him on the banks of Tweed, That slew my luve on the Braes of Yarrow?

O Yarron fields! may never, never rain
Nor dev thy tender blossoms cover,
For there was basely slain my luve,
My luve, as he had not been a luver

The boy put on his robes, his robes of green,
His purple vest, 't as my ain sawing Ah' vretched me' I little little len'd
He was in these to meet his ruin

2.5

The boy took out his milk white, milk white steed, Unlikedful of my dule and sorrow,
But ere the to fall of the night,
He lay a corpse on the Bries of Yatroy

Much I rejoiced that waeful, v aeful day,
I sang, my voice the v oods returning.
But lang ere night, the spear was flown
That slev my luve, and left me mourning

What can my barburous, burbarous father do,
But with his cruel rage pursue me?
My luver's blood is on thy sprar,
How canst thou, barbarous man, then woo me?

My happy sisters may be, may be proud With cruel and ungentle scoffin, May bid me seek on Varrow Braes
My luver nailed in his coffin

My brother Douglas may upbraid, upbraid,
And strike with threatening words to muve me,
My luver's blood is on thy spear,
How canst thou ever bid me luve thee?

Yes, yes, prepare the bed, the bed of luve, With bridal sheets my body cover, Unbar, ye bridal maids, the door, Let in the expected husband luver

But who the expected husband, husband is?
His hands, methinds, are bothed in slaughter.
Ali me I what ghastly spectre's you,
Comes, in his pale shroud, bleeding after?

Pale as he 13, here lay him, lay him down,
O lay his cold head on my pilloy,
Tal c aff, take aff these bridal v cids,
And crown my careful head with willow

Pale though thou art, yet best, yet best beluved,
O could my warmth to life restore thee!
Le'd he all night between my breists,
No youth lay ever there before thee.

Pale, pale, indeed, O lively lively youth,
I orgive, forgive so foul a slaughter,
And he all night between my breats,
No youth shall ever he there after

I Return return, O mournful mournful bride, Return and dry thy useless sorrow Thy layer heeds nought of thy sighs He lies a corp e on the Brie of Yarrow

Hamilton's poems and songs (168 pages) were collected and ed/Lile by James 1 sterson in 1810

Lady Grizel Baillie (1665-1746), author of the song, 'Were no my Heart light 1 wad die,' which appeared in the Orfne is Caledonis about 1725, and was copied by Allan Ramsay into his Teata'le Viscellary, was the daughter of Sir Patricl Hume for Home', created Earl of Marchmont was born at Redbrues Castle, 25th December 1665, was married to George Bulke of Jeruswood in 1692 and died in London December 6, 1746. Stately stept he east the wa',
And stately stept he west,
Full seventy years he now had seen,
With scarce seven years of rest
He hved when Britons' breach of faith
Wrought Scotland mickle wae,
And aye his sword tauld to their cost,
He was their deadly fae

High on a hill his castle stood,

And goodly chambers fair to see,
Where he lodged mony a knight
His dame sae peerless ance and fair,
For chaste and beauty deemed,

'To horse, to horse, my royal hege,
Your free stand on the strand,
Full twenty thousand glittering spears
The king of Norse commands.'
'Bring me my steed, Madge dapple gray,'
Our good king rose and eried,
'A trustice beast in a' the land,

A Scots king never tried

Go, little page, tell Hardyknute,
That lives on hill sae hie,
To draw his sword, the dread of faes,
And haste and follow me.'
The little page flew swift as dart
Flung by his master's arm

Flung by his master's arm 'Come down, come down, Lord Hardyknute, And rid your king frae harm'

Then red, red grew his dark brown cheeks,
Sic did his dark brown brow,
His looks grew keen, as they were wont
In dangers great to do,
He's ta'en a horn as green as gliss,
And gi'en five sounds sae shrill,
That trees in greenwood shook thereat,
Sae loud rang ilka hill

Allan Ramsay

was the son of a mine manager at Leadhills, Lanarkshire, who traced descent to the Ramsays of Dalhousie, whence the poet's address to 'Dal housie of an auld descent, whom he apostrophised as 'My chief, my stoup, my ornament, His mother was the daughter of an Englishman settled in Scot land, and through her he claimed affinity with the Twelve months after his birth-Douglas family 15th October 1686—his father died, and his mother presently married a 'bonnet laird' named Crichton, who gave the lad as good an education as was to be had at the parish school, embracing a slight acquaintance with Latin, but his early reading In 1701, his mother is matter of conjecture only having died in the previous year, Ramsay was apprenticed to an Edinburgh wig-maker (not a barber), and, having served a seven years' appren iceship, he was, in the Union year, made free of his craft, and started business on his own account. At whatever period he acquired a taste for letters, it was plainly now that he set himself to a serious study of the vernacular Scottish poets, and aspired Hamilton of Gilbert to become one of them field's Dying Words of Bonnie Heck in particular, according to his own story, 'warm'd his breast' and caused emulation to 'pierce' him in 1712, having married Christian Ross, the daughter of an Edinburgh lawyer, he sought admission to the select society of the Easy Club, a convivial association of Jacobites, he was able to second his father-in-law's nomination with a versified address, and so conquered the suffrages of Ruddiman the grammarian, and Dr Pitcairn, the 'Scottish Voltaire' The club printed and published the address, and appointed Ramsay their poet-laureate. He was now launched in versifying An Elegi on Maggy Johnston (a disreputable female) took the fancy of the club, which published much if not all that he wrote for its delectation-The Qualifications of a Gentleman, The Great Eclipse of the Sun, and broadly humorous Elegies on John Cowper, the Kirk Treasurer's Man, and Lucky Wood, an alewife. The town began to look for the broadsides on which his successive productions were printed, and when in 1716 he essayed a continuation of the royal canto, Christ's Kirk on the Green. to which he added a third canto in 1718, he was acknowledged the Scottish poet of the day 1719, when he gave up wig-making and turned bookseller, we find Hamilton of Gilbertfield addressing him as

O fam'd and celebrated Allan!
Renowned Ramsay! Canty Callan! Joyous fellow
There's nowther Highland man nor Lawlan,
In poetrie,

But may as soon ding down Tantallan, knock
As match wi' thee.

In 1720 he published a collection of his pieces in a quarto volume, which included some English poems that were considered by his admirers as good as the best produced in the England of Pope, Steele, Arbuthnot, and Gay Pope's time were subscribers, and Arbuthnot, Philips, Tickell, and others flattered him to the top of his bentand his appetite for praise was egregious shop became the rendezvous of the literary and the fashionable in Edinburgh, whose patronage he retained by a steady production of verse-Fables and Tales and The Three Bonnets (1722). The Fair Assembly, a satire on the Puritan objection to dancing (1723), Health, containing portraits of contemporary debauchees (1724) In 1724 he commenced the publication of the Tea-table Miscellany a Collection of Scots Songs, in which 'new words' were wedded to 'known good tunes' mainly by himself, but partly by Hamilton, Mallet, This was followed by The Evergreen being ane Collection of Scots Poems, wrote by the Ingenious before 1600' The Miscellany was excellent work of its kind The Evergreen is a monument of editorial stupidity Ramsay had access to the Bannatyne MSS, but what he took from them he cut and carved and modernised according to his own taste, he passed off some of his own work as old Scots by the device of pseudo archaic spelling Finally, in 1725, he published The Gentle Shepherd, a dramatic pastoral, which his contemporaries esteemed not only his greatest work but a masterpiece of literature, poets and critics sang an unbroken chorus in its praise It was by way of a realistic picture of Scottish rural life as it was-in reality as false as much of the Kull yard literature of to-day—and had an enormous success Thenceforward the poet rested on his oars, adding nothing to his output during the rest of his life but a masque, a pastoral epitlialamium, a volume of fables, and an epistle to the Lords of Session. He was a prosperous man of business, and whether or not he was conscious that he had nothing more to say to his contemporaries. he was content to go on publishing, bookselling, managing a circulating library, and enjoying the society of his numerous friends He sustained serious losses in 1736 through building a theatre, which the dominant class-half-bigoted, but perhaps three parts rightly loath to allow the Restoration dramas, which were the vogue, to pollute the Edinburgh youth—did not allow him to open. his circulating library had barely escaped the Presbyterian Inquisition All his influence with the leading men of the day in Edinburgh could not save his theatre, and he had to wait other ten years for the popular sanction of a legal quirk through which a playhouse, thanks largely to his efforts, was erected and opened in the Canongate. Ramsay's shops were successively in the Grassmarket, the High Street, and the Luckenbooths He built a house for himself on the Castlehill in 1742, to a design by his son Allan the painter, and there spent the evening of his days. He died 7th January 1758

The 'science of heredity' being as yet in its infancy, it would be rash to speculate much or confidently as to the influence that the fact that Allan Ramsay had English blood in his veins may have had on his destiny as a man or his career as a poet. Yet there is nothing unreasonable in the supposition that this circumstance had a chastening effect upon the Scottish perfervidity which he inherited from his father, and may even liave qualified him for the position of 'leader of the Scottish poetical revival of the eighteenth century' by helping him to write Scottish verse that was popular in England, as well as English verse that, frankly imitative though it was of southern models, was not boycotted for 'patriotic' reasons in Scotland Ramsay was at his best when, through poetry, he preached the gospel of his own nature of the

he was not ashamed to describe himself nature, as set forth by himself, is less suggestive of typical Scottish 'canniness,' which is the shrewdness not of temperament but of calculation, than of English good temper, free from religious or moral austerity, not averse from the pleasure afforded by the 'tappit hen' for the sound practical reason that 'good claret best keeps out the cauld,' but distinctly averse from excess. At all events the 'canty callan,' the moderate convivialist of the Easy Club, the worldly bookseller who carried the courtly deference of the wig-maker into his poetic 'tributes to reigning beauties,' was eminently fitted to do justice to a period of literary transition, to recall Dunbar and Henryson, and prepare the way for Fergusson and Burns Although in almost everything he wrote he appealed, like the dedication of his Tea table Miscellany,

To ilka lovely British lass,
True ladies Charlotte, Anne, and Jean,
Doun to ilk bony singing Bess
Wha dances barefoot on the green—and although in his Gentle Shipherd he undoubtedly realised his comprehensive ambition, Ramsay desired primarily to please the well to do society of the Scottish capital, which was bent above all things on rivalling London, which re garded the 'rustic life' much as a later generation regarded the 'Kail yard,' and which wished to see expressed in not too strenuous verse its own epicurean rather than rationalistic rebellion against 'the Kirk' Ramsay made an admirable laureate for such a society He could hold his own with all but the greatest of his English contemporaries He could be sufficiently realistic when reproducing 'local' life, as in his Elegies on Maggy Johnston and Lucky Wood, he could even fall to the realism of the squalid picturesque, as in some portions of the Gentle Shepherd and in the cantos he added to Christ's Kirk While he advocated the pagan naturalism of 'puin' the gowan in its prime,' he did not carry his representation of passion to excess To the ecstasies of 'the cannie hour at e'en' he preferred the

of a transition period He was superficial, mistool vulgarity for humour, and could on occasions be commonplace in an appalling degree, not without reason has the charge of 'buffoonery' been preferred against him. In spite of 'The Lass of Patie's Mill,' 'Bessy Bell and Mary Gray,' and 'Fare well to Lochaber'—if indeed he wrote the last—he can be allowed a place only among the minor lyrists of Scotland. There is nothing classical or 'inevitable' in Ramsay, yet the fidelity to truth of three-fourths of the Gentle Shepherd, and the prudent and genuinely 'national' Horatianism of

A complete edition of Ramsay's poems, with a Inograph) by George Chaimers was published in 1800, and has been often reprinted. A selection by Mr Logic Robertson was issued in 15. The Teo table Miscelling and the Evergreen have been reprinted more than once. There is a short biography of Ramsay by Mr Oliphant Smeaton (1896) and an admirable essay in Preferen Masson's Edinburgh Sketches (1892).

WILLIAM WALLACE

William Weston (1688-1745), who aspired to write the Scottish Hudibras, was the son of an Aberdeenshire blacksmith, and, after an education at Marischal College, became one of the regents there through the influence of the noble family of Following his patrons, however, in the rebellion of 1715, he lost his office, and had to go for a while into hiding, and during the rest of his life he carned a precarious subsistence as schoolmaster and tutor in various places in the north of Scotland, under the protection of several Jacobite families His Knight of the Kirk (1723) shows a close and even servile imitation of the plot and metre of Butler Sir John Presbyter takes the place of the English Puritan knight, and that of Ralph is filled by a squire who evidently repre The poem had sents the Wild Westland Whigs a certain vogue among Scottish Jacobites, and it would seem that about five or six editions of it appeared within forty years But it shows no trace of original genius, and the almost entire lack of action in its pages makes it very tedious reading even in its fragmentary state. Meston's collected verses, which vere printed at Edinburgh in 1767. and reprinted at Aberdeen in 1802, include also a series of short stories in verse entitled Mother Grim's Tales

Robert Crawford (c 1695-1733), author of 'Tweedside' and 'The Bush aboon Traquair,' was the son of an Edinburgh merchant. He assisted Allan Ramsay in his Tea-table Miscellany, and, according to information obtained by Burns, was drowned in coming from France in May 1733. His two lyrics, admired by Burns and Allan Cunningham, now strike one as oddly conventional, though there is only one word of unmis takable Scotch in the two songs, we place him here with the vernacular and local poets

The Bush aboon Traquair

Hear me, ye nymphs, and every swain, I'll tell how Peggy grieves me. Though thus I languish and complain, Alas 1 she ne'er believes me My vows and sighs, like silent air, Unheeded, never move her. At the bonny Bush aboon Traquair, Twas there I first did love her

That day she smiled and made me glad, No maid seemed ever kinder, I thought myself the luckiest lad, So sweetly there to find her, I tried to soothe my amorous flame, In words that I thought tender. If more there passed, I'm not to blame-I meant not to offend her

Yet now she scornful flees the plain, The fields we then frequented, If e'er we meet she shews disdain, She looks as ne er acquainted The bonny bush bloomed fair in May, Its sweets I'll ave remember. But now her frowns make it decay-It fades as in December

Ye rural powers, who hear my strains, Why thus should Peggs grieve me? O make her partner in my pains, Then let lier smiles relieve me If not, my love will turn despair, My passion no more tender, I'll leave the Bush aboon Tragnair-To lonely wilds I'll wander

Tweedside

What beauties does Flora disclose ! How sweet are her smiles upon Tweed! Yet Mary's, still sweeter than those, Both nature and fancy exceed No daisy, nor sweet blushing rose, Not all the gay flowers of the field, Not Tweed, gliding gently through those, Such beauty and pleasure does yield

The warblers are heard in the grove, The linnet, the lark, and the thrush, The blackbird, and sweet cooing dove. With musick enchant every hush Come, let us go forth to the mead. Let us see how the primroses spring. We'll lodge in some village on Tweed, And love while the feathered foll sing

How does my love pass the long day? Does Mary not tend a few sheep? Do they never carelessly stray While happily she lyes asleep? Should Tweed's murmurs Inll her to rest. Kind nature mdulging my bliss. To ease the soft pains of my breast, I'd steal on ambrosial kiss

'Tis she does the virgins excel, No beauty with her niny compare, Love's graces around her do dwell. She's fairest where thousands are fair Say, charmer, where do thy flocks stray? Oh, tell me at morn where they feed? Shall I seek them on sweet winding Tay? Or the pleasanter banks of the Tweed?

Alexander Ross (1699-1784), from 1732 schoolmaster at Lochlee in Forfarshire, when nearly seventy years of age, in 1768, published at Aberdeen, by the advice of Dr Beattie, a volume entitled Helenore, or the Fortunate Shepherdess, a Pastoral Tale n the Scottish Dialect, to which are added a few Songs by the Author Some of his songs-as 'Woo'd, and Married, and a',' 'The Rock and the Wee Pickle Tow'-are still popular in Scotland Being chiefly written in the Buchan dialect-which differs in words and in pronunciation from the west-country Scotch of Burns-Ross's pastoral is little known even in Scotland Beattie took a warm interest in the 'goodhumoured, social, happy old man'-who was independent on £20 a year—and to promote the sale of his volume, he addressed a letter and a poetical epistle in praise of it in Aberdeenshire Scotch to the Aberdeen Journal

If I could get but a man'

John Skinner (1721-1807), by his 'Tullochgorum' and other songs, helped to inspire Burns, and in his life as in his versus sought to further kindliness and good will among men Birse in Aberdeenshire, the son of a Presbyterian schoolmaster, he was educated at Marischal College, Aberdeen, and, turning Episcopalian, from 1742 officiated as Episcopal minister of Longside near Peterhead. After the troubled period of the rebellion of 1745, when the Episcopal clergy of Scotland laboured under the charge of disaffection, Skinner was in 1753 imprisoned six months for preaching to more than four persons! He was a faithful pastor and a diligent student, setting little store by his verse writing gifts All his life he had a hard struggle with poverty, in venerable age he died in the house of his son, the Bishop of Aberdeen, having realised his wish of 'seeing once more his children's grandchildren, and peace upon Israel? His son edited the theological works (with Life, 3 vols 1809), the Ecclisiastical History of Scotland (2 vols 1788) begins with the conversion of Scotland, and is an authority for the history of the 'suffering and Episcopal remnant' There is also a most interesting life of him by Walker (1883) Skinner wrote a poem on football in imitation of Chrystis Kirk, which latter he did into Latin. He wrote Latin versions of some of the psalms, and several Latin poems, humorous and other 'The Ewie wi' the Crookit Horn' combines playful humour and tenderness, Burns's 'Death and Dying Words of Poor Mailie' has much in common with it Burns said (too complimentarily, writing to Skinner himself) "Tullochgorum" was the best Scotch song ever Scotland In Skinner's day 'Tullochgorum' was no song, but the name of a Highland reel tune, called after a holding of the Grants on Speyside.

THE REIGNS OF THE GERMAN-BORN GEORGES

HE accession of the Hanoverian dynasty made no very serious break in our history, the outward events it brought in its train—the Jacobite risings at home and the foreign complications—did not so deeply affect the life of the nation as is suggested by the disproportionate space their records occupy in the national annals. But under the first George, who did not know any English, and the second, who to the end of his life spoke it as a foreigner, notable changes and signs of greater change manifested themselves in our literature.

Most important is what is known as the return to nature, the revival of interest in the poetry of natural description the gradual transition from the poetry of formal culture, of critical disquisition, of philosophical reflection, to the poetry of emotion, of spontaneous jos in life and passion and beauty At no time had men or poets been wholly obtuse to the glorics of nature-of sea and sky, mountain and river, winter storms and summer sunsets But somehow in poetry and literature the expression of these emotions was obscured by much moralising and reflecting on them, and so making them, as it were, a background for philosophical and more or less artificial looking elucubrations The more Nature in the abstract was praised and invoked and personified in poetry and prose, the less room was left for taking concrete things and facts close to the The difference was not so much in what men felt, or in the way they felt, as in the things they were moved to put into words and to utter in song, and what other people cared to have them say Human nature remained fundamentally the same, but sought and found a new way of expressing itself, or at least of expressing itself more fully

Occasional utterances that reveal the new temper may be traced sporadically even in the writers at the end of the seventeenth century, but become more frequent and more marked early in the eighteenth. In Dyer, born towards the end of the seventeenth century, we found the new leaven working. Grongar IIill is largely a poem of nature, but has not wholly thrown off the old fetters. And in virtue of his principal poem. The Fleece, Dier must still be ranked with the didactics, though he is obviously happier when exulting over his Welsh mountains than in blessing English sheep-walks and their industries Young and Blair are far removed from Pope in temper as in versifica tion, but the Night Thoughts and the Grave, both printed in the period under review. belong clearly to the didactic category James Thomson, born in the very last months of the seventeenth century, literary historians have agreed to see the first whole-hearted prophet of the new movement, direct and licartfelt descriptions of natural scenery form the warp and woof of his fine spun web (see above at page 11) Yet the Scasons was being read while Pope's pre eminency was undisputed, and before the Essay on Man was written In Shenstone, along with much old artificiality, the new spirit is also stirring Gray and Collins combine with zeal for a classical perfection of form, a freedom and variety of verse and rhythm, a simplicity and spontaneity of thought and feeling, that point forward to the poetry of romanticism William and Margaret prepares the way for the work of Warton and Percy on the relics of the romantic past. The significance of Fielding's novels, and their modernness of spirit in contrast to Richardson, have been dealt with by Mr Dobson at pages 7 and 340 of this volume The rude realism of Fielding and Smollett is also an aspect of the naturalistic movement, and is reflected in the art of Hogarth Alenside, Thomson's younger contemporary, is even more didactic and pseudo-philosophical than many of his spiritual ancestors, and Dr Samuel Johnson, the dominant personality in his age, the most characteristic representative of eighteenth century England, in his poetry holds almost wholly of the past. The Great Cham of letters was too ponderous a figure to be easily swayed by new movements or the British Museum experts, positively denies that the writing of the second corrector is Pope, and Mr Churton Collins has argued strongly against the inherent improbability of Mitford's assumption. There is no ground to believe that Pope wrote blank verse at all, and it is certainly odd that none of the anecdotists or earlier biographers of Pope or Thomson should have recorded a fact so interesting as the collaboration of the two poets. It may well be that the handwriting of the second series of corrections was merely that of Thomson's amanuensis, and that the second corrector as well as the first was Thomson himself—for it is not fair to assume that the best of the alterations were beyond Thomson's own powers

One of the most remarkable alterations attributed by Mitford to Pope, which duly appeared in the later editions of the Seasons, was the famous passage about Lavinia. In the original edition of Autumn, Thomson's lines on Lavinia were Thoughtless of beauty, she was Beauty's self, Recluse among the woods, if city dames Will deign their faith—and thus she went, compelled By strong necessity, with as serene And pleased a look as Patienec e'er put on, To glean Palemon's fields.

This passage was deleted, and the following substituted for it

Thoughtless of beauty, she was Beauty's self, Recluse amid the close embowering woods As in the hollow breast of Apennine, Beneath the shelter of enericling hills, A myrtle rises, far from human eye, And breathes its balmy fragrance o'er the wild, So flourished blooming, and unseen by all, The sweet Lavinia, till at length, compelled By strong Necessity's supreme command, With smiling patience in her looks, she went To glean Palemon's fields

In writing the Seasons, Thomson is credited with having opened a new era in English literature, and with having produced the first conspicuous example of the poetry consisting mainly of the description of nature Hazlitt called him 'the best of our descriptive poets' It would be absurd to say that poets had ever been obtuse to the beauties and interests of nature, Dyer rejoiced in describing hills and valleys and glimpses of the distant sea, but in the bulk of Thomson's predecessors-in Shakespeare, for example, and Milton -nature, and the emotions evoked by nature, form rather an accidental background, in Thomson it becomes the essence of the poem Wordsworth, his most conspicuous successor in this sphere, was unfair in ascribing Thomson's popularity to 'false ornaments and sentimental commonplaces' It is Thomson's best that appealed then, that appeals still, to his readers, in spontaneous and genuine love of nature, in describing and in evoking the joy and love of nature in others, he led the way for a long band of followers He had the insight to I

sec that the heroic couplet, then so popular, was unsuited for his theme, no doubt his blank verse falls short of his great model, Milton, yet the poet of the Seasons wields his verse with power and musical charm

That Thomson's art was perfecting itself up to the end may be seen from the nobler style and diction of the Castle of Indolence, in which the imitation of Spenser is largely playful Thomson's natural gift included an exuberance which required to be disciplined and controlled He never slackens in an enthusiasm which fatigues his readers, nor tires of pointing out the beauties of nature, which, indolent as he was, he had surveyed under every aspect till he had become familiar with all There are many traces of minute and accurate observation at first hand But he looks also, as Johnson said, with the eye which nature bestows only on a poet -the eye that distinguishes, in everything presented to its view, whatever there is on which imagination can delight to be detained, and with a mind that at once comprehends the vast, and attends to the And everywhere we find evidences of minute' a genuinely sympathetic and kindly heart. His touching allusions to the poor and suffering, to hapless bird and beast in winter, the description of the peasant perishing in the snow, the Siberian evile, or the Arab pilgrims-all overflow with the true feeling which in part at least 'formed the magic of his song' His own impulses he has expressed with convincing sincerity in one lofty stanza of the Castle of Indolence

I care not, Tortune, what you me deny You cannot rob me of free Nature's grace, You cannot shut the windows of the sky, Through which Aurora shows her brightening face, You cannot bar my constant feet to trace. The woods and lawns, by living stream, at eve. Let health my nerves and finer fibres brace, And I their toys to the great children leave. Of fancy, reason, virtue, naught can me bereave.

'The love of nature,' in Coleridge's words, 'seems to have led Thomson to a cheerful religion, and a gloomy religion to have led Cowper to a love of The one would carry his fellow-men along nature with him into nature, the other flies to nature In chastity of diction, how from his fellow-men ever, and the harmony of blank verse, Comper leaves Thomson immeasurably below him, )et I still feel the latter to have been the born poet' The copiousness and fullness of Thomson's descriptions distinguish them, not always to their advantage, from those of the less buoyant Cowper, although Sainte-Beuve holds that he is better than the poet of the Task at large pictures and general effects, 'ily a des masses chez Thomson' Colendge also rather unkindly said that 'Thomson was a great poet rather than a good one, his style was as meretricious as his thoughts were natural? His work is at times as verbose as an elaborately descriptive catalogue, and is frequently disfigured by grandiose words and phrases and by superfluous Latinisms And it must be admitted that even the thought is often conventional and commonplace. He is terribly unequal, and though he has long passages of pleasing melody, though the exquisite note in his description of the Hebrides, 'placed far amid the melancholy main,' is but rarely heard, the diction of the Scasors, often admirable for its purpose, is too ambitious for ordinary themes. This, also on the Hebrides, is another wonderfully felicitous fragment.

Or where the northern ocean in vast whirls Boils round the naked melancholy isles Of farthest Thile, and the Atlantic surge Pours in among the stormy Hebrides

Thomson was not without a vein of quaint and even coarse humour, but when he descends to minute description, or to humorous or saturcal scenes—as in the account of the chase and forhunters' dinner in Autumn—the effect is grotesque and absurd.

As a man Thomson was kindly, easy, gay, indolent, and of a rare modesty. No wonder he was universally popular. Stanza levili Canto is ('written by a friend of the author'—Lord Lyttelton) of his last work pictures him as 'more fat than bard beseems,' as 'void of envy guile, and lust of gain,' as all

The world forsaking with a calm disdain,
Here laughed lie careless in his easy seat,
Here quaffed eneircled with the joyous train,
Oft moralising sage—his ditty sweet.
He loathed much to write, nor cared to repeat.

The Seasons powerfully influenced Kleist, and told on the attitude to nature of German poetry. The poem was translated by Brockes, and is still familiar to many in Germany and elsewhere in the selection set to music by Haydn. The Castle of Indolence, in Mr Gosse's opinion, had a marked influence in determining certain phases of the work of Shelley. The first seven of the following passages are from the Seasons, the next is from the beginning of Book 1 of the Castle of Indolence, by most critics admitted to be his masterpiece.

Showers in Spring

The North-east spends his rage, and now shit inp Within his iron cave, the effisive Sonth Warms the wide air, and o'er the void of heaven Breathes the big clouds with vernal showers distent. At first a dusky vreath they seem to rise, Scarce staining ether, but by fast degrees, In heaps on heaps the doubling vapour sails Along the loaded sky, and mingling deep Sits on the horizon round in settled gloom Not such as wintry storms on mortals shed, Oppressing life, but lovely, gentle, kind, And full of every hope and every jov, The wish of nature. Gradual sinks the breeze Into in perfect calm, that not a breath Is heard to quiver through the closing woods,

Or rustling turn the many twinkling leaves Of aspen tall. The uncurling floods, diffused In glassy breadth, seem through delusive lapse Forgetful of their course 'Tis silence all. And pleasing expectation. Herds and flocks Drop the dry sprig, and mute imploring, eve The falling verdure. Hushed in short suspense, The plumy people streak their wings with oil, To throw the lucid moisture trickling off, And wait the approaching sign to strike, at once, Into the general choir Even mountains, vales, And forests seem, impatient, to demand The promised sweetness Man superior walks Amid the glad creation, musing praise, And looking lively gratitude At last, The clouds consign their treasures to the fields, And, softly shaking on the dimpled pool Prelusive drops, let all their moisture flow. In large effusion, o'er the freshened world The stealing shower is scarce to patter heard. By such as wander through the forest walls, Beneath the umhrageous multitude of leaves

Birds in Spring

To the deep woods They haste away, all as their fancy leads, Pleasure, or food, or secret safety prompts, That Nature's great command may be obeyed Nor all the sweet sensations they perceive Indulged in vun. Some to the holly hedge Nestling repair, and to the thicket some. Some to the rude protection of the thorn Commit their feeble offspring the eleft tree Offers its kind concealment to a few. Their food its insects, and its moss their nests Others apart far in the grassy dale, Or roughening vaste, their humble texture weave. But most in woodland solitudes delight. In nnfrequented glooms, or shaggy banks, Steep, and divided by a bahbling brook, Whose murmurs soothe them all the live long day, When by kind duty fixed Among the roots Of hazel, pendent o'er the plaintive stream, They frame the first foundation of their domes Dry sprigs of trees, in artful fahrie laid, And bound with clay together Now 'tis nought But restless hurry through the busy air, Beat by unnumbered wings. The swallow sweeps The slimy pool, to build his hanging house Intent. And often, from the careless back Of herds and flocks n thousand tugging bills Plnck hair and wool, and oft, when unohserved, Steal from the barn n straw till soft and warm, Clean and complete, their habitation grows.

As thus the patient dam assiduous sits,
Not to be tempted from her tender task,
Or by sharp hunger, or by smooth delight,
Though the whole loosened Spring around her hlows,
Her sympathising lover takes his stand
High on the opponent bank, and ceaseless sings
The tedious time nway, or else supplies
Her place a moment, while she sudden flits
To pick the scanty meal. The appointed time
With pious toil fulfilled, the callow young,
Whitmed and expanded into perfect life,
Their brittle bondage break, and come to light,

A helpless family, demanding food
With constant clamour O what passions then,
What melting sentiments of kindly care,
On the new parents scize! away they fly
Affectionate, and undesiring bear
The most delicious morsel to their young,
Which equally distributed, again
The search begins Even so a gentle pair,
By fortune sank, but formed of generous mould,
And charmed with cares beyond the vulgar breast,
In some lone cot amid the distant woods,
Sustained alone by providential Heaven,
Oft, as they weeping eye their infant train,
Check their own appetites, and give them all

A Summer Morning

With quickened step, Brown Night retires young Day pours in apice, And opens all the lawny prospect wide The dripping rock, the mountain's misty top, Swell on the sight, and brighten with the dawn Blue, through the dusk, the smoking currents shine, And from the bladed field the fearful hare Limps, awkward while along the forest glade The wild deer trip, and, often turning, gaze At early passenger Music awakes The native voice of undissembled joy, And thick around the woodland hymns arise Roused by the cock, the soon clad shepherd leaves His mossy cottage, where with Peace he dwells, And from the crowded fold, in order, drives His flock, to taste the verdure of the morn

Summer Evening

Low walks the sun, and broadens by degrees, Just o'er the verge of day The shifting clouds Assembled gay, a richly gorgeous train, In all their pomp attend his sitting throne Air, earth, and ocean smile immense. And now, As if his weary chariot sought the bowers Of Amphitrité, and her tending nymphs (So Grecian fable sung), he dips his orb, Now half immersed, and now a golden curve Gives one bright glance, then total disappears

Confessed from yonder slow extinguished clouds, All ether softening, sober Evening takes Her wonted station in the middle air, A thousand shadows at her beck First this She sends on earth, then that, of deeper dye, Steals soft behind, and then a deeper still, In circle following circle, gathers round, Io close the face of things. A fresher gale Begins to wave the wood, and stir the stream, Sweeping with shadowy gust the fields of corn, While the quail clamours for his running mate. Wide o'er the thistly lawn, as swells the breeze,  $\Lambda$  whitening shower of vegetable down Amusive floats. The kind impartial care Of Nature nought disdains thoughtful to feed Her lowest sons, and clothc the coming year, From field to field the feathered seeds she wings.

His folded flock secure, the shepherd home Hies, merry hearted, and by turns relieves The ruddy milk maid of her brimming pail, The beauty whom perhaps his witless heart, Unknowing what the joy mixed anguish means, Sincerely loves, by that best language shown Of cordial glances and obliging deeds. Onward they pass, o'er many a panting height, And valley sunk and unfrequented, where At fall of eve the fairy people throng, In various game and revely to pass. The summer night, as village stories tell. But far about they wander from the grave. Of him whom his ungentle fortune urged Against his own sad breast to lift the hand. Of improus violence. The lonely tower. Is also shunned, whose monthful chambers hold, So night struck Fancy dreams, the yelling ghost.

Among the crooked lanes, on every hedge, The Glowworm lights his gem, and through the dark, A moving radiance twinkles Evening yields The world to Night, not in her winter robe Of massy Stygian woof, but loose arrived In mantle dun A faint erroncous ray, Glanced from the imperfect surfaces of things, Flings half an image on the straining eye, While wavering woods, and villages, and streams, And rocks, and mountain tops, that long retained The ascending gleam, are all one swimming scene, Uncertain if beheld Sudden to heaven Thence weary vision turns, where, leading soft The silent hours of love, with purest rav Sweet Venus shines, and, from her genial rise, When day light sickens, till it springs afresh, Unrivalled reigns, the fairest lamp of night

An Autumn Evening

But see, the fading many coloured woods, Shade deepening over shade, the country round Imbrown, a crowded umbrage, dusk and dun, Of every huc, from wan declining green To sooty dark. These now the lonesome Muse, Low whispering, lead into their leaf strewn walks, And give the season in its latest view.

Meantime, light shadowing all, a sober calm Fleeces inbounded ether, whose least wave Stands tremulous, uncertain where to turn The gentle current, while, illumined wide, The dewy skirted clouds imbibe the Sun, And through their lucid veil his softened force Shed o'er the peaceful world. Then is the time For those whom Wisdom and whom Nature charm To steal themselves from the degenerate crowd, And soar above this little scene of things, To tread low thoughted Vice beneath their feet, To soothe the throbbing passions into peace, And woo lone Quiet in her silent walks.

Thus solutary, and in persive guise,
Oft let me wander o'er the russet mead,
And through the saddened grove, where scarce is heard
One dying strain, to cheer the woodman's toil
Hiply some widowed songster pours his plant,
Far, in funt warblings, through the tawny copse,
While congregated thrushes, linnets, larks,
And each wild throat, whose artless strains so late Swelled all the music of the swarming shades, Robbed of their tuneful souls, now shivering sit On the dead tree, a dull despondent flock,
With not a brightness waving o'er their plumes,
And nought save chattering discord in their note.
O, let not, aimed from some inhuman eye,

The gun the music of the coming year Destroy, and harmless, unsuspecting harm, Lay the weak tribes a miserable prey, In mingled murder, fluttering on the ground to

The pale descending year, yet pleasing still, A gentler mood inspires, for now the leaf Incessant rustles from the mournful grove. Oft startling such as, studious, walk below, And slowly circles through the waving air But should a quicker breeze amid the boughs Sob. o er the sky the leafy deluge streams, Till, choked and matted with the dream shower, The forest walks, at every rising gale, Roll wide the withered vaste, and whistle bleak. Fled is the blasted verdure of the fields And, shrunk into their beds, the flowery race Their sunny robes resign Even what remained Of stronger fruits falls from the nul ed tree. And woods, fields gardens, orchards, all around The desolated prospect thrills the soul.

The western sun withdraws the shortened day. And humid Evening, gliding o'er the sky. In her chill progress, to the ground condensed The vapours throv s. Where creeping waters ooze, Where marshes stagnate, and where rivers wind, Cluster the rolling fogs, and swim along The dusky mantled lawn Meanwhile the Moon. Full orbed, and breaking through the scattered clouds. Shows her broad visage in the crimsoned east Turned to the Sun direct, her spotted disk-Where mountains rise, umbrageous dales descend, And caverns deep, as optic tube descries, A smaller earth-gives all his blaze again, Void of its flame, and sheds a softer day Now through the passing cloud she seems to stoop, Now up the pure cerulean rides sublime. Wide the pale deluge floats, and streaming mild O er the skied mountain to the shadowy vale, While rocks and floods reflect the quivering gleam, The whole air whiteus with a boundless tide Of silver radiance, trembling round the world.

The lengthened night elapsed the morning slunes Serene, in all her dewy beauty bright, Unfolding fur the last Autumnal day And now the mountain Sun dispels the fog, The rigid hoar frost melts before his beam, And, hung on every spray, on every blade Of grass, the myraid dew-drops twinkle round

A Winter Landscape

Through the hushed air the whitening shower descends, At fir t thin wavering, till at last the flakes Fall broad and wide and fast, dimming the day With a continual flow The chemshed helds Put on their winter robe of pure t white Tis brightness all, save where the new snow meets Along the mazy current I on the woods Bow their hoar heads, and cre the langual Sun Faint from the West emits his evening ray, Earth's universal face deep hid and chill, Is one wide drivling waste, that buries wide The works of man Drooping, the labourer ox S ands covered o er with snow, and then demands The fruit of all his toil. The fowls of hersen, Tamed by the cruel season crowd around The winnowing store, and claim the little boon

Which Providence assigns them One alone. The redbreast, sacred to the household gods, Wisely regardful of the embroiling sly. In joyless fields and thorny thickets leaves His shivering mates, and pays to trusted man His nanual visit Half afraid, he first Against the window beats, then, brisk, alights On the warm hearth, then, hopping o'er the floor, Eyes all the smiling family askance. And pecks, and starts, and wonders where he is Till, more familiar grown, the table crumbs Attract his slender feet. The foodless wilds Pour forth their brown inhabitants Though timorous of lieart, and liard beset By death in various forms-dark states, and dogs. And more unpitying men-the garden seeks, Urged on by fearless want. The bleating kine Eye the bleak heaven, and next the glistening earth. With looks of dumb despair, then, sad dispersed. Die for the withered herb through heaps of snow As thus the snows arise, and foul and fierce All Winter drives along the darkened air. In his own loose revolving fields the swain Disastered stands, sees other hills ascend. Of unknown, joyless brow, and other scenes, Of horrid prospect, shag the trickless plain, Nor finds the river, nor the forest, hid Beneath the formless wild, but wanders on From hill to dale, still more and more astray, Impatient flouncing through the drifted heaps, Stung with the thoughts of home the thoughts of home Rush on his nerves, and call their vicour forth In many a vain attempt. How sinks his soul! What black despair, what horror fills his heart, When, for the dusky spot which Fancy feigned His tufted cottage rising through the snow, He meets the roughness of the middle waste, I ar from the track and blest abode of man While round him night resistless closes fast, and every tempest, howling o'er his head. Renders the savage wilderness more wild? Then throng the busy shapes into his mind. Of covered pits, unfathomably deep, A dire descent ' beyond the power of frost, Of faithless boys, of precipiees huge Smoothed up with snow, and v hat is land, unknown, What water, of the still unfrozen spring In the loose marsh or solitary lake, Where the fresh fountain from the bottom boil There cheel his fearful steps, and down he sinks Beneath the shelter of the shapeless drift, Thinking o er all the bitternes of death, Mixed with the tender anguish Nature shoots Through the wrung besom of the dving man -His wife, his children and his friends unseen In vain for him the officious vife prepares The fire fair blazing and the vestment warm, In vain his little children preping out Into the mingling storm, demand the r s re, With tears of artless innocence Mast Nor wife, nor children, more shall be lighold, Nor friends nor sacred home. On every rer e The deadly Wirter enes; shut up sense And, o'er his immo ' vital creeping cold Law him along the shows a stiffened come Stretched out, and bleaching in the northern Hast

The Mecca Caravan

Breathed hot From all the boundless furnace of the sky, And the wide glittering waste of burning sand, A suffocating wind the pilgrim sinites With instant death Patient of thirst and toil, Son of the desert! e'en the camel feels, Shot through his withered heart, the fiery blast Or from the black red ether, bursting broad, Sallies the sudden whirlwind Straight the sands Commoved around, in gathering eddies play, Nearer and nearer still they darkening come, Till with the general all involving storm Swept up, the whole continuous wilds arise, And by their noonday fount dejected thrown, Or sunk at night in sad disastrous sleep, Beneath descending bills, the caravan In Cairo's crowded streets Is buried deep The impatient merchant, wondering, waits in vain, And Mecca saddens at the long delay

From 'The Castle of Indolence'

In lowly dale, fast by a river's side,
With woody hill o'er hill encompassed round,
A most enchanting wizard did abide,
Than whom a fiend more fell is nowhere found
It was, I ween, a lovely spot of ground,
And there a season atween June and May,
Half prankt with spring, with summer half imbrowned,
A listless climate made, where, sooth to say,
No living wight could work, ne cared even for play

Was nought around but images of rest
Sleep soothing groves, and quiet lawns between,
And flowery beds, that slumbrous influence kest,
From poppies breathed, and beds of pleasant green,
Where never yet was creeping creature seen
Meantime unnumbered glittering streamlets played,
And hurled everywhere their waters sheen,
That, as they bickered through the sunny glade,
Though restless still themselves, a lulling murmur made

Joined to the prattle of the purling rills,
Were heard the lowing herds along the vale,
And flocks loud bleating from the distant hills,
And vacant shepherds piping in the dile
And now and then sweet Philomel would wail,
Or stock doves plain amid the forest deep,
That drowsy rustled to the sighing gale,
And still a coil the grasshopper did keep Let all these sounds Johent inclined all to sleep

Full in the passage of the vale, above,
A sable, silent, solemn forest stood,
Where nought but shadowy forms were seen to move,
As Idless fancied in her dreaming mood
And np the hills, on either side, a wood
Of blackening pines, aye waving to and fro,
Sent forth a sleepy horror through the blood,
And where this valley winded out below,
The murmuring main was heard, and scarcely heard, to flow

A pleasing land of drowsy head it was, Of dreams that wave before the half shut eye, And of gay castles in the clouds that pass, For ever flushing round a summer sky There eke the soft delights, that witchingly Instil a wanton sweetness through the breast, And the calin pleasures, always hovered nigh, But whate'er smackt of noyance, or unrest, Was far, far off expelled from this delicious nest.

The landscape such, inspiring perfect case, Where Indolence (for so the wizard hight) Close hid his castle mid embowering trees, That half shut out the beams of Phœbus bright, And made a kind of checkered day and night. Meanwhile, unceasing at the massy gate, Beneath a spacious palm, the wicked wight Was placed, and to his lute of cruel fate And labour harsh, complained, lamenting man's estate.

Thither continual pilgrims crowded still, I rom all the roads of earth that pass there by I or, as they chanced to breathe on neighbouring hill, The freshness of this valley smote their eye, And drew them ever and anon more nigh, Till clustering round the enchanter false they hung, Ymolten with his syren melody,

While o'er the enfeebling lute his hand he flung, And to the trembling chords these tempting verses sung

'Behold! ye pilgrims of this earth, behold! See all but man with unearned pleasure gav See her bright robes the butterfly unfold, Broke from her wintry tomb in prime of May! What youthful bride can equal her array? Who can with her for easy pleasure vie? From mead to mead with gentle wing to stray, From flower to flower on balmy gales to fly, Is all she has to do beneath the radiant sky

'Behold the merry minstrels of the morn,
The swarming songsters of the careless grove,
Ten thousand throats that, from the flowering thom,
Hymn their good God, and carol sweet of love,
Such grateful kindly raptures them emove!
They neither plough, nor sow, ne, fit for flail, E'er to the barn the nodding sheaves they drove,
Yet theirs each harvest dancing in the gale,
Whatever crowns the hill, or smiles along the vale.

'Outcast of Nature, man' the wretched thrall
Of butter-dropping sweat, of sweltry pain,
Of cares that eat away the heart with gall,
And of the vices, an inhuman train,
That all proceed from savage thirst of gain
For when hard hearted Interest first began
To poison earth, Astrea left the plain,
Guile, Violence, and Murder, seized on man,
And, for soft milky streams, with blood the rivers ran.

'Come, ye who still the cumbrous load of hife Push hard up hill, but as the farthest steep
You trust to gain, and put an end to strife,
Down thunders back the stone with mighty sweep,
And hurls your labours to the valley deep,
For ever vain come, and, withouten fee,
I in oblivion will your sorrows steep,
Your cares, your toils, will steep you in a sea
Of full delight O come, ye weary wights, to me!

With me, you need not rise at early dawn, To pass the joyless day in various stounds, Or, louting low, on apstart Fortune fawn, And sell fair Honour for some paltry pounds,

Or through the city tal e your dirty rounds,
To cheat, and dun, and lie, and visit pay,
No r flattering base, now giving secret wounds,
Or prowl in courts of law for human prey,
In youal senate thieve, or rob on broad highway

'No cocl s, with me, to rustie labour call,
From village on to village sounding clear,
To tardy swun no shrill voiced matrons squall,
No dogs, no babes, no wives, to stun your ear,
No hammers thump, no horrid blacksmith sear,
Ne noisy tradesman your sweet slumbers start
With sounds that are a misery to hear
But all is calm,—as would delight the heart
Of Sybarite of old,—all Nature, and all Art.

'The best of men have ever loved repose
They hate to mingle in the filthy fray
Where the soul sours, and gradual raneour grows, Embittered more from peevish day to day
Even those whom Pame has lent her fairest ray,
The most renowned of worthy wights of yore,
Irom a base world at last have stolen away
So Scipio, to the soft Cumæan shore Retiring, tasted joy he never knew before

'But if a little exercise you choose,

Some zest for ease, 'tis not forbidden here.

Amid the groves you may indulge the Muse,

Or tend the blooms, and deck the vernal year,

Or, softly stealing, with your watery gear,

Along the brooks, the crimson spotted fry

You may delude, the whilst, amused, you hear

Now the hoarse stream, and now the Zephyr's sigh,

Attuned to the birds, and woodland melody

'O grievous folly ' to heap up estate,
Losing the days you see beneath the sun,
When, sudden, comes blind unrelenting Fate,
And gives the untasted portion you have won,
With ruthless toil and many a wretch undone,
To those who mock you gone to Pluto's reign,
There with sad ghosts to pine, and shadows dun,
But sure it is of vanities most vun,
To toil for what you here untoiling may obtain.'

He ceased. But still their trembling ears retained The deep vibrations of his witching song, That, by a kind of magic power, constrained To enter in, pell mell, the listening throng Heaps poured on heaps, and yet they slipped along, In silent case—as when beneath the beam Of summer moons, the distant woods among, Or hy some flood all silvered with the gleam, The soft-embodied Fays through any portal stream

Straight of these endless numbers, swarming round,
As thick as idle motes in sunny ray,
Not one eftsoons in view was to be found,
But every man strolled off his own glad way.
Wide o er this ample court's blank area.
With all the lodges that thereto pertained,
No living creature could be seen to stray.
While solutide and perfect silence reigned.
So that to think you dreamt you almost was constrained.

As when a shepherd of the Hebrid Isles, Placed far amid the melancholy main (Whether it be lone Paner him beguiles, Or that acral beings sometimes deign To stand embodied, to our senses plain),
Sees on the naked hill, or valley low,
The whilst in ocean Phoebus dips his wain
A vast assembly moving to and fro
Then all at once in air dissolves the wondrous show

The doors, that knew no shrill alarming bell,
Ne cursed I nocker plied by villain's hand,
Self opened into halls, where who can tell
What elegance and grandeur wide expand,
The pride of Turkey and of Persia land?
Soft quilts on quilts, on carpets carpets spread,
And conclies stretched around in seemly band,
And endless pillows rise to prop the head,
So that each spacious room was one full swelling bed

And every where huge covered tables stood,
With wines high flavoured and rich viands crowned,
Whatever sprightly juice or tasteful food
On the green bosom of this Earth are found,
And all old Ocean genders in his round
Some hand unseen these silently displayed,
Even undemanded by a sign or sound
You need but wish, and, instantly obeyed, Fair ranged the dishes rose, and thick the glasses played

The rooms with costly tripestry were hung,
Where was inwoven many a gentle tale,
Such as of old the rural poets sung,
Or of Arcadian or Sicilian vale
Reclining lovers, in the lonely dale,
Poured forth at large the sweetly tortured heart,
Or, sighing tender passion, swelled the gale,
And tanglit charmed Echo to resound their smart, While flocks, woods, streams, around, repose and peace impart.

Those pleased the most, where, by a cunning hand, Depainted was the patriarchal age, What time Dan Abraham left the Chaldee land, And pastured on from verdant stage to stage, Where fields and fountains fresh could best engage. Toil was not then. Of nothing took they heed, But with wild beasts the sylvan war to wage, And o'er vast plains their herds and flocks to feed Blessed sons of Nature they! true Golden Age indeed!

Sometimes the pencil, in cool airy halls,
Bade the gay bloom of vernal landscapes rise,
Or Autumn's varied shades imbrown the walls
Now the black tempest strikes the astonished eyes,
Now down the steep the flashing torrent flies,
The trembling sun now plays o'er ocean blue,
And now rude mountains frown amid the skies
Whate'er Lorraine light tonched with softening hue,
Or savage Rosa dashed, or learned Ponssin drew

A certain music, never known before
Here fulled the pensive, melancholy mind,
Full easily obtained—Belioves no more,
But sidelong to the gently waving wind
To lay the well tuned instrument reclined,
From which with airy flying fingers bight
Beyond each mortal touch the most refined,
The god of win is drew sounds of deep delight
Whence, with just cause, the harp of Eolu 1 hight.

Ah me what hand can touch the string so fine?
Who up the lofty drapason roll
Such sweet, such sad, such solemn airs divine,
Then let them down again into the soul!
Now rising love they funned, now pleasing dole
They breathed, in tender musings, through the heart,
And now a graver sacred strain they stole,
As when scraphic hands a hymn impart
Wild warbling Nature all, above the reach of Art!

Such the gay splendour, the luxurious state,
Of Caliphs old, v ho on the Tigris' shore,
In mighty Bagdad, populous and great,
Held their bright court, where was of ladies store,
And verse, love, music still the garland wore
When sleep was coy, the bard, in waiting there, Cheered the lone midnight with the Muse's lore,
Composing music bade his dreams be fur,
And music lent new gladness to the morning air

Near the pavilions where we slept, still ran Soft tinkling streams, and dashing waters fell, And sobbing breezes sighed, and oft began (So worked the wizard) wintry storms to swell, As heaven and earth they would together mell At doors and windows, threatening, seemed to call The demons of the tempest, growling fell, Yet the least entrance found they none at all, Whence sweeter grew our sleep, secure in massy hall

And hither Morpheus sent his kindest dreams, kuising a world of giver tinet and grace, O'er which were shadowy east Elysian gleanis, That played, in waving lights, from place to place, And shed a roseate smile on Nature's face Not Titian's peneil c'er could so array, So fleece with clouds, the pure ethereal space, Ne could it e'er such melting forms display, As loose on flowery beds all languishingly lay

No, fair illusions! artful phantoms, no!
My Muse will not attempt your fury land,
She has no colours that hi e you can glow
To catch your vivid scenes, too gross her hand
But sure it is, was ne'er a subtler band
Than these same guileful angel seeming sprites,
Who thus in dreams, voluptuous, soft, and bland,
Poured all the Arabian heaven upon our nights,
And blest them oft besides with more refined delights

They were in sooth a most enchanting truin,
Even feigning virtue, skilful to unite
With evil good, and strew with pleasure pain
But for those fiends whom blood and broils delight,
Who hurl the wretch, as if to hell outright,
Down, down black gulfs, where sullen waters sleep,
Or hold him clambering all the fearful night
On beetling cliffs, or pent in ruins deep,
They, till due time should serve, were bid far hence to keep

Ye guardian spirits, to whom man is dear,
From these foul demons shield the midnight gloom!
Angels of fancy and of love, be near,
And o'er the blank of sleep diffuse a bloom!
Evoke the sacred shades of Greece and Rome,
And let them virtue with a look impart
But chief, awhile, O! lend us from the tomb
Those long lost friends for whom in love we smart,
And fill with pious awe and joy mixed woe the heart.

Trom 'Alfred, a Masque'—An Ode
When Britain first, at Heaven's command,
Arose from out the azure main,
This was the charter of the land,
And guardian angels sang this strain
Rule, Britannia, rule the waves!
Britons never will be slaves!

The nations not so blest as thee,

Must in their turns to tyrants fall,
Whilst thou shalt flourish great and free,
The dread and envy of them all

Rule, Britannia, &c.

Still more majestic shalt thou rise,
More dreadful from each foreign stroke,
As the loud blast that tears the skies,
Serves but to root thy native oak Rule, Britannia, &e

Thee haughty tyrants ne'er shall tame,
All their attempts to bend thee down
Will but arouse thy generous flame,
But work their woe and thy renovn
Rule, Britannia, &c.

To thee belongs the rural reign,

Thy cities shall with commerce shine,
All thine shall be the subject main,

And every shore it circles thine.

Rule, Britannia, &c

The Muses, still with freedom found,
Shall to thy happy coast repair,
Blest isle, with matchless beauty crowned,
And manly hearts to guard the fair!
Rule, Britinnia, &c.

In 1897 the Res D C. Tovey published a good edition of The Poeth al Works of James Thomsor, with critical appendices and a memoir and there is a convenient Selection by J Logic Robertson (Clarendon Press, 1891). Murdoch and Dr Johnson were early biographers, there are also Lives by Gilfillan, by W M Rossett, and by W Bayne ('Famous Scots 1898). A German memograph by Schmeding appeared in 1839 and Professor Léon Morel is the author of a singularly full monograph on James Thomson, sa Vicet ses Œur res (1895).

David Mallet (1705?-65), author of some popular ballad stanzas, and some florid unimpassioned poems in blank verse, was a successful but unprincipled literary adventurer His original name was Malloch, the name adopted by many of the Macgregors when their clan was broken up (1603) His father was said to have kept an inn at Crieff, but seems rather to have been the well-to do tenant of the farm of Dunruchan, near Muthill in Perthshire. Educated at Crieff parish school and Edinburgh University, where he made the acquaintance of James Thomson, Mallet went to London as tutor in the Duke of Montrose's family in 1723 Next year his ballad of William and Margaret appeared, and he soon numbered among his friends Young, Pope, and other authors, to whom his assiduous attentions, his agreeable manners, and literary tastes rendered his society acceptable. In 1726 he began to write his name Mallet, 'for there is not one English man,' he sud, 'that can pronounce Malloch,' and

Dennis had made a jest on Moloch that rankled A great dandy, he succeeded not merely in keeping clear of Scotticisms in his published works, but 'in clearing his tongue of his native pronunciation'

In 1728 he published his poem the Ercursion, written in servile imitation of the blank verse of Thomson By command of Frederick, Prince of Wales, then head of the Opposition, he wrote, in conjunction with Thomson, the masque of Alfred, which was performed in 1740, at Cliefden, the prince's summer residence. In this slight dramatic performance—afterwards altered by Mallet, and brought upon the stage at Drury Lane in 1751-'Rule, Britannia,' first appeared In the reissue Mallet indirectly claimed the song-and all that was best in the masque—as his own seems to be fatal to his claim that the song was published in 1752 as by Thomson the same year (1740) he wrote a Life of Bacon, prefixed to an edition of the works In 1742 he was appointed under-secretary to the Prince of Wales, and a fortunate second marriage with a daughter of Lord Carlisle's steward added to his income. Both Mallet and his wife were professed deists When Gibbon the historian left Oxford and entered the Roman Catholic Church, he went to live in Mallet's house, but was rather scandalised than reclaimed by the philos ophy of his host. In 1749 Mallet figured as the ostensible editor of Bolingbroke's Patriot King -insulting the memory of his benefactor Pope, and the peer rewarded him by bequeathing to him the whole of his works, manuscripts, and Mallet's love of money and freethinking views were equally gratified by this bequest, he published the collected works of Bolingbroke 1754, and drew down on Bolingbroke's head and his own Johnson's famous sarcasm (see above at page 203), in which Mallet figured as the hungry Scotchman whom Bolingbroke hired for half a crown to fire off after his death the gun he was himself too great a coward to discharge. The accession of George III opened a way for all literary Scotsmen subservient to the Crown, and Mallet was soon a worshipper of the favourite Lord Bute. He dedicated his tragedy of Elvira (1763) to Bute, and was rewarded with the sinecure office of Keeper of the Book of Entries for the port of London, worth £300 a year

Gibbon anticipated that if ever his friend Mallet should attain poetic fame, it would be by his Amyntor and Theodora (1747), a blank verse tale of a hermit in St Kilda, but, contrariwise, the poetic repute of Mallet has rested on his ballads, and chiefly on his William and Margaret, written about the age of twenty two Critics from Dr Percy down gave high praise to the ballad, attempts were at the same time made—in vain—to prove it a wholesale plagiarism. But it is sufficiently obvious that Mallet used freely both the ideas and the words of actual old ballads. Thus the injured maid had often returned from her grave to reproach her undoer, and the hungry worm and the cock crowing are precise parallels to the channerin' worm and the cock in 'The Wife o' Usher's Well' (see Vol I p 537) Mallet confessed to having followed a verse in Fletcher's Knight of the Burning Pestle

When it was grown to dark midnight, And all were fast asleep, In came Margaret's grimly ghost, And stood at William's feet.

In the first printed copies of Vallets ballad the first two lines were all but identical

When all was wrapt in dark midnight, And all were fast asleep

William and Margaret.

'Twas at the silent solemn hour, When night and morning meet, In glided Margaret's grimly ghost, And stood at William's feet

Her face was like an April morn Clad in a wintry cloud, And clay cold was her hily hand That held her sable shroud

So shall the fairest face appear,
When youth and years are flown
Such is the robe that kings must wear,
When death has reft their crown

Her bloom was like the springing flower,
That sips the silver dew,
The rose was budded in her cheek,
Just opening to the view

But love had, like the canker worm,
Consumed her early prime,
The rose grew pale, and left her cheek,
She died before her time.

'Awake'' she cried, 'thy true love calls, Come from her midnight grave Now let thy pity hear the maid Thy love refused to save

'This is the dark and dreary hour When injured ghosts complain, When yawning graves give up their dead, To haunt the faithless swain

'Bethink thee, William, of thy fault, Thy pledge and broken oath' And give me back my maiden vow, And give me back my troth

'Why did you promise love to me, And not that promise keep? Why did you swear my eyes were bright, Yet leave those eyes to weep?

'How could you say my face was fair, And yet that face forsake? How could you win my virgin heart, Yet leave that heart to break?

Why did you say my hp was sweet, And made the scarlet pale?
And why did I, young, witless maid!
Beheve the flattering tale? 'That face, alas! no more is fair,
Tho e lips no longer red
Dark are my eyes, now closed in death,
And every charm is fled

'The hungry worm my sister is,
I his winding sheet I wear
And cold and weary lasts our night,
Till that last morn appear

'But hark I the cocl has warned me hence,
A long and last adicu!

Come see, false man, how low she hes,
Who died for love of you'

The lark sing loud, the morning smiled With beams of rost red Pale William quaked in every limb, And raying left his bed

He hied him to the fatal place
Where Margaret's body lay,
And stretched him on the green grass turf
That wrapt her breathless clay

And thrice he called on Margaret's name, And thrice he wept full sore, Then had his cheek to her cold grave, And word spake never more!

The Birks of Invermay

The smiling morn, the breathing spring, Invite the tuneful birds to sing, And, while they warble from the spray, Love melts the universal by Let us, Amanda, timely wise, Like them, improve the hour that flies, And in soft raptures waste the day, Among the birks of Invernal

I or soon the winter of the year,
And age, life's winter, will appear,
At this thy living bloom will fade,
As that will strip the verdant shade.
Our taste of pleasure then is o'er,
The feathered songsters are no more,
And when they drop and we decay,
Adieu the birks of Invermay!

Some additional stanzas were added to the last po-m (originally 'The Birks of Endermay) by Dr Bryce of Kirknewton Mallet's Collected Works appeared in three volumes in 1759. His poems were often reprinted (in such collections as Johnson's and Chalmerss) Dinsdale's edition of the Ballads and Senge, with a Life of Mallet, was published in 1857

Henry Carey (born near the end of the seventeenth century) was believed to be an illegitimate son of George Savile, the famous Marquis of Halifax. He wrote a multitude of songs, witty poems, burlesques, facces, and dramatic pieces, sometimes providing also music for them, and had produced a volume of youthful poems in 1713 Chrononhotonthologos, 'the King of Queerummania,' was a burlesque tragedy (1734) in some measure on the lines of Fielding's Tom Thumb (1730) Characters in it are Aldiborontiphoscophornio and Rigdumfunnidos ('a lord in waiting'), whose names Scott applied to the Ball untyne brothers The Dragon of Wantley (1744) was popular on the stage. In all he produced some two hundred works. It was of him it was said that 'he led a life free of reproach, and lianged himself October 4th, 1743.1 From Henry Circy, as Lord Macaulay noted, 'descended that Edmund Kenn who in our time transformed himself so marvellously into Sliylod, Ingo, and Othello' Circy's poem of Namer Pamby has added a word to the English lan gunge. The reference is to the 'Dimply damsel, sweetly smiling,' and 'Timel blossom, infinit fair' style of odes by Ambro-e Philips

In Chrononhotonthologos the Great, a burlesque of the bombast of the stage, and much ado about nothing, Bombardinion, general of Queerummania, reports an invasion of the Antipodeans, but defeats them. Meanwhile the King falls in love with the captive Queen, and quarrels with the general, who first kills the King and then himself. The plot is —intentionally, it may be presumed—utterly silly and senseless, but there are amusing passages, the most being made of the fantastic names.

Carey thus tells the occasion of his classical lyric, Sally in our Alley, the music of which is also his 'A shoemaker's apprentice making holiday with his sweetheart, treated her with a sight of Bedlam, the puppet-shows, the flying chairs, and all the elegancies of Moorfields from whence proceeding to the Farthing Piehouse, he gave her a collation of buns, cheese-cakes, gammon of bacon, stuffed beef, and bottled ale, through all which scenes the author dodged them (charmed with the simplicity of their courtship), from whence he drew this little sketch of nature.' The song, he adds, was more than once mentioned with approbation by 'the divine Addison'. There is no good ground for crediting him with the authorship of God save the King, though after his death his son claimed it for him.

Sally in our Alley

Of all the girls that are so smart, There's none like pretty Sally She is the darling of my heart, Aud she lives in our alley There is no lady in the land
Is half so sweet as Sally,
She is the darling of my heart,
And she lives in our alley

Her father he makes cabbage nets,
And through the streets does cry 'em
Her mother she sells laces long,
To such as please to buy 'em
But sure such foll s could ne'er beget
So sweet a girl as Sally '
She is the durling of my heart,
And she lives in our alley

When she is by, I leave my work (I love her so sincerely),
My master comes like any Turk,
And bangs me most severely
But let him bang his belly full,
I'll bear it all for Sally,
She is the darling of my heart,
And she lives in our alley

Of all the days that's in the week,
I dearly love but one day,
And that's the day that comes betwirt
A Saturday and Monday
For then I'm dressed all in my best,
To walk abroad with Sally,
Slie is the darling of my heart,
And she lives in our alley

My master carries me to church,
And often am I blamed,
Because I leave him in the lurch
As soon as text is named
I leave the church in sermon time,
And slink away to Sally,
She is the darling of my heart,
And she lives in our alley

When Christmas comes about again,
O then I shall have mone;
I'll hoard it up and box it all,
I'll give it to my honev
I would it were ten thousand pounds,
I'd give it all to Sally,
She is the darling of my heart,
And she lives in our alley

My master and the neighbours all
Make game of me and Sally,
And (but for her) I'd better be
A slave, and row a galley
But when my seven long years are out,
O then I'll marry Sally,
O then we'll wed, and then we'll bed,
But not in our alley

Philip Doddridge, Nonconformist divine, was born in London, 26th June 1702. His grandfather had been ejected from the living of Shep perton in Middlesex by the Act of Uniformity in 1602, and his father, a well to do oilman in London, married the only daughter of a German Lutheran pastor who had fled from Prague to escape the persecution which raged in Bohemia after the expulsion of Frederick, the Elector Palatine. In

1712 Doddridge was sent to school at Kingston upon-Thames, but both his parents dying, he was removed to St Albans in 1715, and whilst there was admitted a member of the Nonconforming congre When, in 1718, the Duchess of Bedford offered to educate him at either university for the Church of England, Doddridge declined from conscientious scruples Dr Clarke, Presbytenan minister of St Albans, befriended him, and in 1719 he was placed at a Dissenting academy at hibworth in Leicestershire. Here for three years he pursued his studies for the ministry, cultivating a taste for elegant literature, and, as appears from his correspondence, usually in love with somebody, and in brisk correspondence with her. The play fulness and even gatety of some of these epistles are remarkable in one so staid and devout, and suggest Couper's

From his first sermon, delivered at the age of twenty, Doddridge became a marked preacher among the Dissenters, and had calls to various He declined several calls because congregations the congregations inviting were 'a very rigid kind of people,' or were too orthodox, but in 1729 he settled at Northampton, becoming also the head He believed that he of a theological academy was 'in all the most important points a Calvinist,' but the orthodox suspected him, and Stoughton holds that his view of the Trinity was Sabellian. But even those who suspected his orthodoxy, and thought his truly Catholic liberality too all embracing, revered his personal picty a happy family life and many devoted friends. He first appeared as an author in 1730, when he published a pamphlet on the Means of Revry ing the Dissenting Interest His Sermons on the Education of Children (1732), Sermons to Young People (1735), Ten Sermons on the Power and Grace of Christ (1736), and Practical Discourses on Regeneration (1741) were all well received, and The Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul (1745) is one of the few works of practical religion which has been accepted by all denominations of evangelical Christians as next to the Bible the best aid to the devout life, and has been translated into French, Dutch, German, Danish, Gaehc, Welsh, Tamil, and other tongues 1747 appeared Some Remarkable Passages in the Life of Colonel James Gardiner, who was slain by the Rebels at the Battle of Prestonpans, Sept 21, 1745—the life of a Scottish officer who served with distinction under Marlborough, and from a gay libertine life was suddenly converted to the strictest piety by a visible representation of Christ upon the cross amidst a blaze of light, and the 'O sinner! did I suffer this for audible words thee, and are these the returns?' The Family Expositor, containing a Version and Paraphrast, of the New Testament, with Critical Notes and a Practical Improvement (6 vols 1739-56), also Doddridge's health received a wide welcome failing, he was, in 1751, advised to remove to 1 warmer climate for the winter, and in September of the same year he sailed from Falmouth for Lisbon. He survived his arrival only five days, dying October 26, 1751. His hymns are prized by many who hardly know his name. Of some four hundred written by him the best known are 'Ye servants of the Lord,' 'O happy Day,' 'My God, and is thy table spread,' 'Hark, the glad sound, the Saviour comes,' 'O God of Bethel, by whose hand.' Doddridge was author of what Johnson calls 'one of the finest epigrams in the English language.' His family motto, 'Dum vivimus vivamus,' was in its primary signification hardly very suitable to a Christian divine, but he paraphrased it thus

'Live while you live,' the epicure would say
'And seize the pleasures of the present day '
'Live while you live,' the sacred preacher cries,
'And give to God each moment as it flies'
Lord, in my views let both united be
I live in pleasure when I live to thee!

A Country Life

'You know I love a country life, and here we have it in perfection. I am roused in the morning with the ! chirping of sparrov's, the eooing of pigeons, the lowing of kine, the bleating of sheep, and, to complete the concert, the grunting of swine and neighing of horses We have a mighty pleasant garden and orchard, and a fine arbour under some tall shady limes, that form a kind of lofty dome, of which, as a native of the great city, you may perhaps catch a glimmering idea, if I name the enpola of St Paul's And then, on the other side of the house, there is a large space which we call a wilderness, and which I fancy would please you The ground is a dainty greensward, a extremely brook runs sparkling through the middle, and there are two large fish ponds at one end, both the ponds and the brool are surrounded with villows, and there are several shady walks under the trees, besides little knots of young willows interspersed at convenient distances This is the nursery of our lambs and calves, with whom I have the honour to be intimately acquainted. Here I generally spend the evening, and pay my respects to the setting snn, when the variety and the beauty of the prospect inspire a pleasure that I know not how to express. I am sometimes so transported with these manimate beauties, that I fancy I am like Adam in Paradise, and it is my only misfortune that I want an Eve, and have none but the birds of the air, and the beasts of the field, for my companions.'

(From a letter to a young lady)

Happy Devotional Feelings of Doddridge

I hope, my dear, von will not be offended when I tell you that I am, what I hardly thought it possible, without a miracle, that I should have been, very easy and happy without yon. My days begin, pass, and end in pleasure, and seem short because they are so delight ful. It may seem strange to say it, but really so it is, I hardly feel that I want anything. I often think of you, and pray for you, and bless God on your account, and please myself with the hope of many comfortable days, and weeks, and years with you, yet I am not at all anxious about your return, or indeed about anything else. And the reason, the great and sufficient reason, is, that I have more of the presence of God with me than I remember ever to have enjoyed in any one month of my life. He enables me to live for him. and to live with him. When I awake in the morning, which is always before it is light. I address myself to him, and converse with him, speak to him while I am lighting my candle and putting on my elothes, and have often more delight before I come out of my chamber, though it be hardly a quarter of an hour after my awaling, than I have enjoyed for whole days, or perhaps weeks of my life. He meets me in my study, in secret, in family devotions. It is pleasant to read, pleasant to compose, pleasant to converse with my friends at home, pleasant to visit those abroad-the poor, the sick, pleasant to write letters of necessary business by which any good can be done, pleasant to go out and preach the gospel to poor souls, of which some are thirsting for it, and others dying without it, pleasant in the week day to think how near another Sabbath is, but, oh! much, much more pleasant, to think how near eternity is, and how short the journey through this wilderness, and that it is but a step from earth to heaven (From a letter to his wife in 1742.)

His Correspondence and his Diary were published in 1829-31, and there is a Memoir by Stanford (1880).

John Wesley (1703-91), the founder of Methodism, was a great religious and reforming genius, he was also a very copious and effective writer on innumerable subjects, and the author of one of the most interesting Journals in the English tongue. The fifteenth child and second surviving son of the rector of Epworth in Lincolnshire, he passed from the Charterhouse to Christ Church, Oxford, where his brothers Samuel and Charles also studied He was ordained deacon in 1725, and in 1726 became Fellow of Lincoln and Greek lecturer In 1727 he left Oxford to assist his father, but returned as tutor in 1729, having in 1728 been ordained priest. During his absence his brother Charles and one or two other students had by a new religious zeal led somebody to exclaim, 'Here is a new sect of Methodists sprung up' So the word, used in the sixteenth century for certain schools of physicians and mathematicians, was first used in its religious reference, but the movement we identify it with had not yet taken origin, though by 1735 the little company of devout friends numbered nearly a score, Hervey and Whitefield being now of the number even before this Wesley had been much influenced by Law's mysticism In 1735 Wesley undertook a mission to Georgia under the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, being then a rigid High Churchman It has even been said of him that at this time he seemed likely to anticipate by a century the work of Cardinal Newman He returned to England in 1738, and in London had much prayerful intercourse with the Moravian missionary, Peter Böhler Methodism dates its birth from that May evening in 1738 when, at a meeting of a society in Aldersgate Street, he heard Luther's preface to the Epistle to the Romans read, and felt that Christ had taken away his sins The sweeping aside of ecclesiastical traditions, the rejection of Apostolical Succession, the ordination with his own hands of presbyters and bishops, the final organisation of a separate Church, were all involved in what took place that night. The clergy closed their pulpits against Wesley, this intolerance, Whitefield's example, and the needs of the degraded masses drove him into the open air During his journeyings of hilf a century ten thousand to thirty thousand people would wait patiently for hours to hear him. He gave his strength to working class neighbourhoods, hence the mass of his converts were colliers, miners, foundry men, weavers, spinners, fishermen, artis ms, yeomen, and day-labourers in towns His life was frequently in danger, but he outlived all persecution, and the inneraries of his old age were triumphal processions from one end of the country to the other. He wandered all over the British Isles, crossed the Irish Sen more than forty times, and after 1757 was frequently in Scotland, and he repeatedly visited the Continent During his unparalleled apostolite he travelled two hundred and fifty thousand miles and preached forty thousand sermons. Yet he managed to do a prodigious amount of literary work, reading on horseback, whenever and wherever he rode he read or composed He wrote short English, French, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew grammars, a Compendium of Logic, extracts from Phydrus, Oxid, Virgil, Horace, Juvenal, Persius, Martial, and Sillust, an English Dictionary, commentaries on the Old and New Testaments, a short Roman History, a History of England, an Ecclesiastical History, a Compendium of Social Philos ophy, and a Christian Library of fifty volumes, for the benefit of his itinerant preachers edited the Imitation of Christ, and the principal works of Bunyan, Baxter, Edwards, Rutherford, Law, Madame Guyon, and others, endless abridged biographies, and even an abridged edition of Brooke's novel, The Fool of Quality, a Compendium of Physic-not to speak of collections of psalms, hymns, and tunes, his own Sermons and Journals, and a monthly magazine His works were so popular that he made £50,000, every penny of which he distributed in charity during his life. He founded an orphans' home at New castle, charity schools in London, and a dispensary in Bristol. Dean Stanley affirmed that Wesley was the founder of the Broad Church. Under his direction the Conference in 1770 adopted resolutions which provoked the indignation of his orthodox Calvinistic friends - that the heathen who had never heard of Christ could be saved if they feared God and worked righteousness according to the light they had And he believed Marcus Aurelius would be saved, and spoke of the 'execrable wretches' who wrangled at the various Church councils He took upon himself with the utmost reluctance the responsibility of organising.

a separate Church—But the most striking feature of his life is a theologian vas his readiness in the list resort, whatever it cost him, to adapt his creed to indisputable facts

Of the enormous mass of his writing, much is 'As for me,' he said, 'I never think of my style at all, but just set down the rords that come first' For that very reason, since he was an exceptionally gifted man and a well read scholar, his work is natural, simple, generally pithy and racy His sermons are not eloquent, original, or profound, but they were abundantly effective, probably by reason of their very simplicity was a licen and telling controversialist, and some times carried franliness and free speech to their When Toplady, author of 'Rock of full lunits Ages,' but a ficrce Calvinist champion, became too abusive, and tall ed of Wesley's Satanic guilt and Sat mic shamelessness, Wesley retorted that he declined to fight with chimney sweepers Wesley's best hymns are translations from Mora vian and other German sources, but Charless noblest and tenderest hymns gained much from the elder brother's judicious and numerous emen dations Here he had Charless sanction and co-But his effective touch is also seen operation in the alterations he made in Wattss ligning. If one man inavalter mother man's living, then perhaps Wesley performed the task as judiciously as is possible, the alterations are in most cases obvious improvements Wesley's published Journal (more precisely 'Extracts of the Rev Mr John Wesley's Journals'), which extends from 1735 to 1790, contains the experiences, observations, reflec tions, comments, and intimate thoughts of one of the most acute and sagratious of men, not without wit, epigrain, and iron. Many of those far removed from the Wesleyan fold take delight in Wesley's Journal, it was Edward TitzGerald's favourite reading Wesley was keenly interested in ghost stories, psychical research subjects, firmly believed in apparitions and in diabolical possession, and even held that the inspiration of Scripture guaran teed the reality of what Englishmen understood 'Cleanliness is indeed next to god by witcheraft liness,' from a sermon of Wesley's on dress, seems to be the first known instance in which this proverbial saving occurs precisely in this form, and his letters are studded with sage savings such as, 'Passion and prejudice govern the world, only under the name of reason?

The Birth of Methodism.

In my return to England, January, 1738, being in imminent danger of death, and very uneasy on that account, I was strongly convinced that the cause of that unexisness was unbelief, and that the gaining a true, living faith was the 'one thing needful' for me. But still I fixed not this faith on its right object I meant only faith in God, not faith in or through Christ. Again, I knew not that I was wholly void of this faith, but only thought, I had not enough of it. So that when

Peter Bohler, whom God prepared for me as soon as I came to London, affirmed of true faith in Christ, (which is but one,) that it had those two fruits inseparably attending it, 'Dominion over sin, and constant Peace from a sense of forgiveness,' I was quite amazed, and looled upon it as a new Gospel. If this was so. it was clear I had not faith But I was not willing to Therefore, I disputed with all my be convinced of this might, and laboured to prove that faith might be where these were not, especially where the sense of forgiveness was not For, all the Scriptures relating to this, I had been long since taught to construe away, and to call all Presbyterians who spoke otherwise. Besides, I well saw, no one could, in the nature of things, have such a sense of forgiveness, and not feel it. But I felt it not If then there was no faith without this, all my pre tensions to faith dropped at once.

When I met Peter Bohler again, he con ented to put the dispute upon the issue which I desired, namely, Scripture and experience. I first consulted the Scrip But when I set aside the glosses of men, and simply considered the words of God, comparing them together, endeavouring to illustrate the obscure by the plainer passages, I found they all mide against me, and was forced to retreat to my last hold, 'that expe rience would never agree with the literal interpretation of those scriptures Nor could I therefore allow it to be true, till I found some living witnesses of it' He replied, he could show me such at any time, if I desired it, the next day And accordingly, the next day he came again with three others, all of v hom testified, of their own personal experience, that a true living faith in Christ is inseparable from a sense of pardon for all past, and freedom from all present, sins. They added with one mouth, that this faith was the gift, the free gift of God, and that he would surely bestow it upon every soul who earnestly and perseveringly sought it I was now thoroughly convinced, and by the grace of God, I resolved to seek it unto the end, (I) By absolutely renonncing all dependence, in whole or in part, upon my own works or righteousness, on which I had really grounded my hope of salvation, though I knew it not, from my youth up (2) By adding to the constant use of all the other means of graec, continual prayer for this very thing, justifying, saving faith, a full reliance on the blood of Christ shed for me, a trust in Him, as my Christ, as my sole justification, sanetification, and redemption

I continued thus to seek it, (though with strange in difference, dulness, and coldness, and unusually frequent relapses into sin,) till Wednesday, May 24. I think it was about five this morning, that I opened my Testament on those words, Τὰ μέγιστα ημίν ral τίμια ἐπαγγέλματα δεδωρηται, Ίνα διά τουτων γένησθε θείας κοινωνοί φυσεως 'There are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises, even that ye should be partakers of the divine nature' (2 Pet 1 4) Just as I went out, I opened it again on those words, 'Thou art not far from the kingdom of God.' In the afternoon I was asked to go to St Panl's. The anthem was, 'Out of the deep have I called unto thee, O Lord Lord, hear my voice O let thine ears consider well the voice of my complaint. If thou, Lord, wilt be extreme to mark what is done amiss, O Lord, tho may abide it? For there is mercy with thee, therefore shalt thou be ferred O Israel, trust in the Lord For 1 ith the Lord there is mercy, and with Him is plentcous redemption. And He shall redeem Israel from all his sins?

In the evening I went very unwillingly to a society in Aldersgate Street, where one was reading Luther's preface to the Epistle to the Romans. About a quarter before nine, while he was describing the change which God works in the heart through faith in Christ, I felt my heart strangely warmed. I felt I did trust in Christ, Christ alone for salvation. And an assurance was given me, that he had taken away my sins, even mine, and saved me from the law of sin and death.

I began to pray with all my might for those who had in a more especial manner despitefully used me and persecuted me. I then testified openly to all there, what I now first felt in my heart. But it was not long before the enemy suggested, 'This cannot be faith, for where is thy joy?' Then was I taught, that peace and victory over sin are essential to faith in the Captain of our salvation. But that, as to the transports of joy that usually attend the beginning of it, especially in those who have mourned deeply, God sometimes giveth, some times withholdeth them, according to the counsels of his own will.

After my return home, I was much buffeted with temptations, but cried out, and they fled away. They returned again and again. I as often lifted up my eves, and He 'sent me help from his holy place'. And herein I found the difference between this and my former state chiefly consisted. I was striving, yea, fighting with all my might under the Law, as well as under grace. But then I was sometimes, if not often, conquered, now, I was always conqueror

Thur 25—The moment I awaked, 'Jesus, Master,' was in my heart and in my mouth, and I found all my strength lay in Leeping my eye fixed upon him, and my soul waiting on him continually. Being again at St Paul's in the afternoon, I could taste the good word of God in the anthem, which began, 'My song shall be always of the loving kindness of the Lord. With my mouth will I ever be showing forth thy truth from one generation to another'. Yet the enemy injected a Jear, 'If thou dost believe, why is there not a more sensible change?' I answered, (yet not I.) 'That I know not. But this I know, I have "now peace with God." And I sin not to day, and Jesus my Master has forbid me to take thought for the morrow.'

'But is not any sort of fear,' continued the tempter, 'a proof that thou dost not believe?' I desired my Master to answer for me, and opened his Book upon those words of St Panl, 'Without were fightings, within were fears' Then, inferred I, well may fears be within me, but I must go on, and tread them under my feet.

present The situation of the city, on a hill slielying down on both sides, as well is to the east, with the stately eastle upon a eraggy rock on the west, is inexpressibly fine, and the main street so broad and finely paved, with the lofty houses on either hand (many of them seven or eight stories high,) is far beyond any in Great Britain But how can it be suffered, that all manner of filth should still be thrown even into this street continually? Where are the magistricy, the gentry, the nobility of the land? Have they no concern for the honour of their nation? How long shall the capital city of Scotland, yea, and the chief street of it, stink worse than a common sewer? Will no lover of his country, or of decency and common sense, find a remedy for this?

it was re built and furnished by King Charles the Second. One side of it is a picture gallery, wherein are pictures of all the Scottish kings, and an original one of the cele brated Queen Mary. It is scarce possible for any who looks at this, to think her such a monster as some have punted her, nor indeed for any who considers the circum stances of her death, equal to that of an ancient martyr.

I preached in the evening at Musselburgh, and at five in the morning Then we rode on to Haddington, where (the rain driving me in) I preached, between nine and ten, in Provost Dickson's parlour About one I preached at North Berwick, a pretty large town, close to the sea shore and, at seven in the evening, (the rain continuing,) in the house at Dunbar

Wed 13—It being a fair mild evening, I preached near the Key, to most of the inhabitants of the town, and spoke full as plain as the evening before. Every one seemed to receive it in love probably if there was regular preaching here, much good might be done.

Wed [May] 13, [1772] -I preached at Leith, in the most horrid, dreary Rooin I have seen in the kingdom. But the next day I found another kind of Room, airy, checrful, and lightsome, which Mr Parker undertook to fit up for the purpose, without any delay

Sun 17—I had appointed to preach at noon in the I ady's Walk, at Leith, but being offered the use of the Episcopal chapel, I willingly accepted it, and both read Prayers and preached. Here also the behaviour of the congregation did honour to our church

Mon 18—Dr Hamilton brought with him Dr Monro and Dr Gregory They satisfied me what my disorder was, and told me there was bit one method of cure. Perhaps but one natural one, but I think God has more than one method of healing either the soul or the body

In the evening (the weather being still severe) I preached in the new House at Leith, to a lovely audience, on, 'Narrow is the way that leadeth unto life' Many were present again at five in the morning. How long have we toiled here almost in vain' Xet I cannot but hope God will at length have a people even in this place.

Wed 20—I took my leave of Edinburgh in the morning, by strongly enforcing the Apostle's exhortation, 'Be careful for nothing, but in every thing by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God'

I had designed to preach (as usual) at Provost Dixon's, in Haddington, in the way to Dunbar—But the Provost, too, had received light from the 'Circular Letter,' and durst not receive those heretus—So we went round by the Marquis of Tweedale's seat, completely finished within and without—But he that took so much delight in it is gone to his long home, and has left it to one that has no taste or regard for it—So rolls the world away! In the evening I preached at Dunbar Thur 21 -I went to the Bass, seven miles from it, which, in the horrid reign of Charles the Second, was the prison of those venerable men who suffered the loss of all things for a good conscience. It is a high rock surrounded by the sea, two or three miles in circumference, and about The strong east wind made two miles from the shore the water so rough, that the boat could hardly live And when we came to the only landing place, (the other sides being quite perpendicular,) it was with much difficulty that we got up, climbing on our hands and The castle, as one may judge by what remains, was utterly maccessible. The walls of the chapel, and of the governor's house, are tolerably entire. The garden walls are still seen near the top of the rock, with And round the walls there the well in the midst of it are spots of grass, that feed eighteen or twenty sheep. But the proper natives of the island are Solund geese, a bird about the size of a Muscovy duck, which breed by thousands, from generation to generation, on the sides of the rock. It is peculiar to these, that they lay but one egg, which they do not sit upon at all, but keep it under one foot, (as we saw with our eyes,) till it is hatched How many prayers did the holy men confined here offer up, in that evil day! And how many thanks, givings should we return, for all the liberty, civil and religious, which we enjoy!

At our return, we walked over the runs of Tantalloa Castle, once the seat of the great Earls of Douglas. The front walls (it was four square) are still standing, and by their vast height and huge thickness, give us a little idea of what it once was Such is human greatness'

Fit 22.—We took a view of the famous Roman camp, lying on a mountain, two or three miles from the town. It is encompassed with two broad and deep ditches, and is not easy of approach on any side. Here lay General Lesley with lus army, while Cromwell was starving below. He had no way to escape, but the enthusiastic fury of the Scots delivered him. When they marched into the valley to swallow him np, he mowed them down like grass.

Sat 23—I went on to Alnwick, and preached in the Town Hall What a difference between an English and a Scotch congregation! These judge themselves rather than the Preacher, and their aim is, not only to know, but to love and obey

Wesley on Chesterfield's Letters

[Wed, Oct 11, 1775]—I borrowed here a volume of Lord Chesterfield's Letters, which I had heard very strongly commended And what did I learn?-That he was a man of much wit, middling sense, and some learning, but as absolutely void of virtue, as any Jew, Turk, or Heathen, that ever lived I say, not only void of all religion, (for I doubt whether he believed there is a God, though he tags most of his letters with the name, for better sound sake,) but even of virtue, of justice, and mercy, which he never once recommended to his son. And truth he sets at open defiance. He continually guards him against it. Half his letters inculcate deep dissimulation, as the most necessary of all accomplishments Add to this, his studiously instilling into the young man all the principles of debauchery, when himself was between seventy and eighty years old Add his cruel censure of that amiable man, the Archhisliop of Cambray, (quantum dispar illi,) as a mere time-serving hypocrite! And this is the favourite of the age! Whereas, if justice and truth take place, if he is rewarded according to his desert, his name will stink to all generations.

Witchcraft

[Wed, May 25, 1768]-It is true likewise that the English in general, and indeed most of the men of learning in Europe, have given up all accounts of witches and apparitions as mere old wives' fables I am sorry for it, and I willingly take this opportunity of entering my solemn protest against this violent compliment which so many that believe the Bible pay to those who do not believe it. I owe them no such service. I take know ledge, these are at the bottom of the outery which has been raised, and with such insolence spread through the land in direct opposition not only to the Bible, but to the suffrage of the wisest and best of men in all ages and nations. They well know (whether Christians know it or not) that the giving up witchcraft is in effect giving up the Bible, and they I now, on the other hand, that if but one account of the intercourse of men with separate spirits be admitted, their whole structure (Deism, Atheism, Materialism) falls to the ground

Jo'in Wesley 8 works have o'ten been edited The first collected edition (just after his death) was in 32 vols that of 1856-57 the eleventh, was in 15 vols. See John's Life by Tyerman (new ed 1876) and those by Southey (1820) Miss Wedgwood (1870) Urlin (1870) Rigg (1875), Telford (1885) Overton (1891), Kirton, Bevan, and others

Charles Wesley (1707-88) studied at Westminster (where he was the protector of the Jacobite Scotch boy afterwards to be Lord Mansfield) and at Christ Church, Oxford, where he was known as a 'Methodist' early in 1729 But it vas not till 1738 that, like his elder brother, he came under the influence of Peter Bohler and 'found rest to his soul' Though they differed about the ordination of ministers and on other points, Charles was in the main and throughout life an indefatigable lieutenant to his greater brother, becoming an itinerant preacher. In 1771 he settled with his family in London. Though he did vastly less work in prose than John, he is by far the most copious of English hymn writers, and is also one of the best He is said to liave written six thousand five hundred hymns, the bulk of which were carefully revised and often corrected by John Many of them are really great religious poetry, amongst the number are the well known 'Jesu, Lover of my Soul,' 'O for a thousand tongues to sing, ' 'Hark the herald angels sing,' 'Love divine, all loves excelling, 'O for a heart to praise my God,' 'O Love divine, how sweet thou art,' 'Gentle Jesus, meek and mild' And of 'Come, O thou traveller unknown,' Watts said, too enthusiastically, that it was worth all the hymns he himself had ever written

The poetical works of the two brothers edited for the Wesleyan Conference, fill thirteen volumes (1868-72). There are Lives of Charles by Jackson (1847-49) and Telford (1886), of Samuel, the elder brother, by Tyerman (1866) of their mother, by Kirk (1869) and Clark (1886) and of the Wesley family, by Stevenson (1876).

George Whitefield (1714-70), born in the Bell Inn, Gloucester, came to Oxford when the Wesleys had laid the foundations of Methodism, and he became conspicuous for zeal. He took deacon's orders in 1736, and in 1738 joined Wesley in Georgia, returning to be admitted to priest's The religious level of the age was low, and Whitefield found amongst his brethren the most active opposition. But when the parish pulpits were denied him he preached in the open air, and thenceforth spent his life in constant travel and incessant preaching, everywhere moving audiences by his irresistible earnestness and eloquence. About 1741 differences on predestination led to his separation as a strict Calvinist from John Wesley as an Arminian. His supporters now built him a large 'Tabernacle' at Moorfields, and his preaching gathered immense audiences. But he founded no distinct sect, many of his adherents following the Countess of Huntingdon (q v ) in Wales, and ultimately helping to form the Calvinistic Methodists The Countess appointed Whitefield her chaplain, and built and endowed many chapels for him He made seven evangel istic visits to America, and spent the rest of his life in preaching tours through England, Scotland (1741), and Wales Hume said he was worth travelling twenty miles to hear. He died at Newbury in New England His writings are upon the whole commonplace, and sincere admirers regretted that he should have injured his fame by publishing sermons, Journals, and

Henry Fielding.

Although modern genealogy declines to connect the lineage of Henry Fielding (1707-54) with the Hapsburgs, the passage which Gibbon, in a fragment of his Autobiography, gives to the author of Tom Iones still remains a splendid compliment. Fielding's father, General Edmund Fielding, was the third son of a son of the Earl of Desmond, whose elder brother was second Earl of Denbigh His mother was the daughter of Sir Henry Gould, Knight of Sharpham Park near Glastonbury in Somerset, and a Judge of the King's Bench At Sharpham Park, on the 22nd of April 1707, the future novelist was born. His childhood was spent. at East Stour in Dorsetshire, where other children, three girls (for one of them. Sarah, the novelist, see page 417) and a boy, were added to the family When, in April 1718, Mrs Fielding died, her eldest son was about eleven. His education had been confined to the tuition of a Mr Oliver of Motcombe. whose Falstaffian proportions and pig loving propensities we are asked to recognise in the Parson Trulliber of Joseph Andrews From Mr Oliver, Henry Fielding passed to Eton, probably as an oppidan. Among his schoolfellows were George (afterwards Lord) Lyttelton, Charles Hanbury Williams, and Thomas Winnington According to his first biographer, Arthur Murphy, he left Eton 'uncommonly versed in the Greek authors, and an early master of the Latin classics' After, and perhaps on account of, a youthful love affair with a Lyme Regis heiress, Miss Sarah Andrew, he was despatched to Leyden to study civil law under the 'learned Vitrianus,' and his name is recorded in the books of the university as late as March 1728

By this date his father, never a rich man, had married again, and the allowance of two hundred a year he professed to make his eldest son was not paid Early in 1728 Henry Fielding was in London, a tall youth of one and twenty, with a bandsome face, a magnificent constitution, and an unlimited appetite for those pleasures of the town which (as Gibbon says) are 'within the reach of every man who is regardless of his health, his money, and his company' It was lack of pence which turned young Fielding speedily to stage production Already at Leyden, with that bias towards Cervantes which was to be his lifelong characteristic, he had sketched a play called Don Quixote in England, and it must have been at Leyden that he prepared his first acted comedy, Love in Several Masques This was produced at Drury Lane in February 1728, immediately after Cibber's Provoked Husband It obtained some success, mainly owing to the acting of Anne Oldfield, and perhaps also to the friendly aid of the author's relative, Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, to whom it was dedicated. For the next few years Fielding continued to produce farces and plays with careless rapidity, sometimes under his own name, sometimes under a pseudonym. None of these has survived as a masterpiece In comedy he worked an exhausted vein, the 'wit-traps' of Wycherley and Congreve, without rivalling their brilliancy, though certainly not falling below their indelicacy. His best efforts lay in social sature or mock-heroic, and the most notable examples of these are The Author's Farce (1730) and Tom Thumb (1730)—afterwards revised and annotated as The Tragedy of Tragedies—a burlesque in the genre of Buckingham's Rehearsal containing much clever raillery of contemporary tragedies. He also succeeded with two adaptations of Moliere, Tha

From a Print in the British Museum engraved by S. Basire after W. Honarth

Mock-Doctor (1732) and The Miser (1733), which latter version obtained the approval of Volture But, as Lady Mary said, he himself would have thrown his work into the fire 'if meat could have been got without money, and money without scribbling' He never took the stage seriously Whether he possessed the dramatic faculty or not, his plays are deservedly forgotten, and the 'prolifick Mr Tielding,' as the Prompter called him, made no enduring contribution to dramatic literature.

In the preface to one of the last and hastiest of these performances, The Universal Gallant, or, the Different Husbands, produced at Drum Lane in February 1735, he seems to hint at a family However this may be, there is at this point a manifest interval in his labours is a playwight, which his biographers have occupied with his marriage. His wife was one of three sisters of Salisbury, and lier name was Charlotte Cradock From her husband's description of her in Tom Jones and Amelia, she must have been as amrable as she was beautiful, and she, moreover, brought him £1500 of that pelf which alone preserved him from producing hurried plays. It is also alleged that concurrently he inherited something from his mother, but this is questionable, as in 1735 his mother had long been dead In any case, he migrated for the time to East Stour, where his childhood had been spent. Legend has freely gathered around this retreat upon the country, and he has been described as leading the life of a layish fox-hunting squire, with hounds, liveries, and all the regulation honours But it is demonstrable that in a twelvemonth he was back again in London, managing the little French theatre in the Haymarket, and running there a Lucianic satire on the times called Pasquin. This was a consider able success, and it was followed in 1737 by a similar effort, The Historical Register for the Year 1736 The Historical Register was inferior to Pasquin, but its strokes at Walpole are believed to have aided in precipitating the severe Licensing Act of 1737, which, among other vexatious restrictions, made the consent of the Lord Chamberlain an indispensable preliminary to the production of any play. Its passing was fatal to Fielding's 'scandal shop,' as the Haymarket had come to be popularly called, and it effectually termi nated his efforts to 'ridicule Vice and Imposture' through the medium of the stage, His own admission, in later life, that he left off playwriting when he ought to have begun, may be taken to indicate that he himself fully appreciated the hap hazard and premature character of his achievement in this kind Yet it may be reasonably doubted whether, even with wider experience and larger leisure, he would ever have excelled in pure comedy. His satiric and ironic gifts were better employed in the vocation he eventually adopted.

In 1737 he was in his thirty first year, and on the 1st of November he was admitted a student of the Middle Temple, being still described as of For the next three years, or until he Cast Stour was called to the Bar in June 1740, we know but little of his life. His biographers speak of political tracts, and he certainly worked with James Ralph-the Ralph who 'howls to Cynthia' in the Duncial-upon two volumes of the 'Spectator' essays known as the Champion (1739-40) Then, in November of the latter year, appeared Richardson's Pamela The origin of this book has been sufficiently discussed in speaking of its author, it remains to trace its connection with the work of Fielding, to whose manly, if somewhat coarsegruned, common sense, nourished in the school of Molière and Cervantes, its opportunist morality seemed particularly nauseous. Probably to amuse himself at first, and also to work off an obscure but long standing grudge against the author of another success of 1740, the Apology of the actor Colley Cibber, Fielding presently set about a burlesque of Pamela, intended to combine the manners of Cibber and Richardson By a happy stroke of the pen, he turned the "Squire B" of Pamela into "Squire Booby," ind, inventing a brother for Richardson's heroine, exhibited him exposed to the solicitations of the 'Squire's aunt by marriage, a dissolute woman of quality scenes resulting from this beginning are the least pleasing of Joseph Andrews But at the end of the second chapter the author introduced Parson Adams, and, quickly warning to his task, soon discarded his original plan-After Chapter x the bool became practically what it professes to be in its full title-namely, The History of the Adventures of Joseph Andrews, and Its Frund Mr Abraham Adams Written in Imitation of the Manner of Cervantes That is to say, it became the first example of a till then unattempted type of English Novel I or not only by its 'Character of perfect Simplicity,' the absent-minded, finger snapping, Æschylus-loving clergyman, did it add n new portrait to the perpetual National Pontrut Gallery of English Literature, but it maugurated a nex method in fiction which its author styled the 'comic Epic-Poem in Prose.' In a lengthy Prefice, which was probably an afterthought of perhaps, to speak more accurately, a premoni tion of something different from his first idea which had gradually dawned upon him during the progress of the volumes, Fielding develops his His aim, he says in effect, was to produce something which should differ from serious romance, not only by its substitution of 'light and ridiculous' incidents for 'grave and solemn' ones, but by its admission among its dramalis personae of characters of inferior rank, and b, its employment of ludicrous and even burlesque diction in place of elevated language These characteristics, partly present in Joseph Andreas, were to receive fuller exemplification in his next novel, Tom Jones (see also above at page 7) Meanwhile, the reception accorded to Joseph

Meanwhile, the reception accorded to Joseph Andrews, although encouraging, was not sufficient to make the author's fortune, or even to supple ment materially the meagre income he derived from his profession. He brought out a face, Miss Lucy in Town, in which he had a colla borator, he projected with the Rei William Young, the reputed original of Parson Adams, a translation of Aristophanes, which got no father than one play, he issued, by subscription, three volumes of Miscellanies, which, among other things, included a youthful comedy, The Wedding Day This Garrick produced in 1743, with Mrs Woffing ton for heroine. But the most important items in the Miscellanies, after deduction of a good deal of occasional verse and prose, were a Lucianic frag ment entitled 'A Yourney from this World to the Next,' and (occupying the entire third volume) the remarkable exercise in sustained irony known as The History of the Life of the late Mr Jonathan Wild the Great, the ostensible hero of which was a notorious thief-taker who had swung at Tyburn some eighteen years before The avowed object of this book, which, from internal evidence. apparently preceded loseph Andrews in point of composition, is to demonstrate that Greatness unaccompanied by Goodness differs little from rascality, and that the 'true Sublime' in Human Nature consists in the combination of the two This thesis is worked out with a relentless persistency which, to not a few readers, is so rarely relieved by softer touches as to be almost unendurable. But as an intellectual conception and a study in satire, Jonathan Wild must always be regarded as a masterpiece.

After the Miscellanies, Fielding produced no work of any importance until the appearance of Tom Jones The story of his life at this date is obscure, but although the 'garrets' and 'spunginghouses' of Lady Louisa Stuart are not improbably the mere evaggerations of an aristocratic pen, there can be little doubt that, as she says, he was 'almost always miserably poor, and seldom in a state of quiet and safety ' His means were uncertain, his splendid constitution was impaired, and he was a martyr to gout. To add to his distresses. and perhaps by reason of them, his beautiful wife died, leaving him plunged in despair 'So vehement was his grief,' says Murphy, 'that his friends began to think him in danger of losing his reason.' This must have been at the close of 1743 In 1744 he prefaced the second edition of his sister Sarah's novel of David Simple, and the year after began a weekly Whig paper, the True Patriot, which was followed in 1747 by another. the Jacobite's Journal, enterprises which earned for him, either rightly or wrongly, as regards the adjective, the stigma of 'pension'd scribbler' In November 1747 he married again, his second wife being his first wife's maid, Mary Daniel She had been devoted to her mistress, she was equally devoted to her husband, to whose children as well as her own slie made an excellent mother year later, by the interest of his old schoolfellow Lyttelton, to whom he was already much indebted (Preface to Tom Jones), Fielding was appointed a Justice of the Peace for Middlesev and Westminster, and took up his abode in Bow Street, Covent Garden A month or two later still, on the 28th of February 1749, was published the famous novel of Tom Jones

The History of Tom Jones, a Foundling, is Fielding's masterpiece. The old tradition that he wrote it as a Bow Street magistrate is exploded, and the 'Thousands of Hours' he spent in its composition had probably been dispersed over most of the interval which had elapsed between the publication of the Miscellanies and the date of its issue.

Some of it had no doubt been penned at the Lyttelton sent of Hagley, some at Prior Park, the home, near Bath, of Ralph Allen, the benevolent Allworths of the book In Tom Jones, Fielding set himself deliberately to perfect the 'comic Epic-Poem in Prose' as he had conceived it during the progress of Joseph Andrews Besides making it three times as long, he paid much closer attention to the evolution of the plot, which still, with some reservations as to hurry at the close, remains a model in its way. In place of a general critical 'Introduction,' he inserted at the beginning of each book one of those delightful 'prolegomenous' Essays, in which, ever and anon, as George Eliot says, 'he seems to bring his arm-chair to the proscenium and chat with us in all the lusty ease of his fine English'that English by which, in the words of another admirer, 'one seems to be carried along, like a swimmer in a strong, clear stream, trusting one's self to every whirl and eddy, with a feeling of safety, of comfort, or delightful ease in the motion of the elastic water' The book, indeed, has no one character which can quite compete with Parson Abraham Adams But it has a dozen which are admirably wrought. Squire Western first, Partridge the barber, the philosopher Square, Thwackum, his rival, Miss Western, Miss Bridget Allworthy, Lady Bellaston, Mrs Honour, the lady's maid—all these are living and moving human beings. It is true that the morality of certain incidents-the scene at Upton. the Bellaston episode which roused the ire of Colonel Newcome—has not passed unchallenged Probably Mr Lowell's contention that these passages -an inconsiderable portion, after all, in a lengthy novel-shock rather than corrupt will eventually obtain, and it is a defence which cannot always be advanced in favour of some of the performances of Fielding's modern descendants Pour qui sait lue, Tom Jones must remain, for experience of life, observation of character, invention, humour, irony, and inexhaustible humanity, one of the finest specimens of the English novel of manners Its author himself never excelled it, nor could he, for, as a French critic observes, it is the summary and abstract of an entire existence

In 1749 Fielding had but five years to live He was still poor, and his income of £300 as a Westminster Justice was some 'of the dirtiest money upon earth? He seems, nevertheless, to have been zealous and efficient in his office, and one at least of his pamphlets, the Enquiry into the Increase of Robbers (1751), is to this day recognised as authoritative by political economists. But the work which most concerns literature is his third novel, Anclia, also published in 1751. In its central character, as in the Sophia Western of Tom Jones, he delineates his beautiful first wife, whose goodness and forbearince were still a cherished recollection Written in the intervals of a wearisome and exact ing profession, Amelia has little of the leisurely qualities of Tom Jones, nor has it the same fundamental richness of material Moreover, it is pre occupied to an exceptional extent with the social problems, prison discipline and what not, which were duly obtruding themselves on the writer's attention These drawbacks admitted, it has other qualities which have led some to prefer it to the Amelia herself, whom even that earlier book. sturdy Richardsonian, Dr Johnson, declared to be 'the most pleasing heroine of all the romances,' is a delightful type of generous, unselfish woman hood, and many of the subordinate characters-Dr Harrison, Colonel Bath, Mrs Bennet-ire only second, if second, to the Tom Jones gallery Amelia, Fielding's chief efforts of moment were the Covent Garden Journal (1752), another pamphlet, the Proposal for the Poor (1753), and a pamphlet on Elizabeth Canning At the end of June 1754, worn out with the labours of his office, and utterly broken in constitution, he started for Lisbon, like Peterborough and Doddridge before him, in the forloin hope of finding health. He reached his destination on the 14th of August Two months later, on the 8th of October 1754, he died, and was buried in the English cemetery on the Estrella Luzet Britannia gremio non dari Fovere natum is inscribed upon his tomb The story of his tedious and painfully prolonged journey to the Portuguese capital is related in a touching posthumous tract published by Andrew Millar in Feb ruary 1755, together with a fragment of a Comment on the Lssays of Bolingbroke, which Mallet had issued in March of the previous risear. Long after Fielding's death, in 1778, wall produced at Drury Lane a play called The Fathers or, The Goodnatured Man It was printed, and ran for a few nights, but has never been revived

The only trustworthy portrait of I ielding is that prefixed to Murphy's edition of his works (1762) It was drawn from memory by Hogarth, whom he had known, and whom he greatly admired life, as may have been gathered from the above, but few authentic particulars remain Not more than three or four of his letters have been preserved, while modern research, by disposing of much merely picturesque tradition, has appreciably reduced the scanty body of material upon which his first biographers based, their labours - It is non generally admitted that the reckless Boheminnism attributed to his youth was not continued in middle age, though he was at no time of a temper to grow either rich or careful But in spite of ill health and uncertain means, he retained to the end his joy of life, and his hopefulness was as inveterate as his improvidence He was a loving father and a kind husband, he exerted his last energies in philanthropy and benevolence, he expended his last ink in defence of Christranits, and he went to a foreign grave with the fortitude of a hero and the resignation of a philosopher

Hunting Song

The dusky night rides down the sky, And usliers in the morn The hounds all join in glorious cry. The huntsman winds his horn And a hunting we will go

The wife around her husband throws Her arms, and begs his stay, My dear, it rains, and liails, and snows, You will not hunt to day But a hunting we will go

A brushing fox in yonder wood, Secure to find we seek, For why, I carry'd, sound and good, A cartload there last week. And a hunting we will go

Away he goes, he flies the rout, I hear steeds all spur and swatch, Some are thrown in, and some thrown out, And some thrown in the ditch But a hunting we will go

At length his strength to faintness worn, Poor Renard ceases flight, Then hungry, homeward we return, To feast away the night Then a drinking we will go

An Interview between Parson Adams and Parson Trulliber

Parson Adams came to the house of Parson Trulliber, whom he found stripped in to his wristcoat, with an apron on, and a pail in his hand, just come from serving his hogs, for Mr Trulliber was a parson on Sundays, but all the other six might more properly be called a farmer He occupied a small piece of land of his own, besides which he rented a considerable deal more. His wife milked his cows, managed his dairy, and followed the markets with butter and eggs The hogs fell chiefly to his care, which he carefully waited on at home, and attended to furs, on which occasion he was liable to many jokes, his own size being, with much ale, rendered little inferior to that of the beasts he sold indeed, one of the largest men you should see, and could have acted the part of Sir John Falstaff without sluffing Add to this, that the rotundity of his belly was con siderably increased by the shortness of his stature, his shadow ascending very near as far in height when he lay on his back, as when he stood on his legs. His voice was loud and hoarse, and his accents extremely broad, to complete the whole, he had a stateliness in his gait, when he walked, not unlike that of a goose, only he stalked slower.

Mr Trulliber being informed that somebody wanted to speak with him, immediately slipped off his apron, and clothed himself in an old night gown, being the dress in which he always saw his company at home. His wife, who informed him of Mr Adams's arrival, had made a small mistake, for she had told her husband, 'She be lieved here was a man come for some of his hogs'. This supposition made Mr Trulliber hasten with the nimost expedition to attend his guest. He no sooner saw Adams, than, not in the least doubting the cause of his errand to be what his wife had imagined, he told him 'He was come in very good time, that he expected a dealer that very afternoon,' and added, 'they were all pure and fat, and upwards of twenty score apiece'

Adams answered, 'he believed he did not know him' 'Yes, yes,' cried Trulliber, 'I have seen you often at fair why, we have dealt before now, mun, I warrant you, yes, yes,' cries he 'I remember thy face very well, but won't mention a word more till you have seen them, though I have never sold thee a flitch of such bacon as is now in the stye' Upon which, he laid violent hands on Adams, and dragged him into the hogs' stye, which was indeed but two steps from his parlour window. They were no sooner arrived there, than he cried out, 'Do but handle them step in, friend, art which words, opening the gate, he pushed Adams into the pig stye, insisting on it that he should handle them before he would talk one word with him

Adams, whose natural complaisance was beyond any artificial, was obliged to comply before he was suffered to explain himself, and, laying hold of one of their tails, the unruly beast gave such a sudden spring, that he threw poor Adams all along in the mire Trulliber, instead of assisting him to get up, burst into a laughter, and, entering the stye, said to Adams, with some contempt, 'Why, dost not know how to handle u hog?' and was going to lay hold of one himself, but Adams, who thought he had carried his complaisance far enough, was no sooner on his legs, than he escaped out of the reach of the animals, and cried out, 'Nihil habeo cum porces I am a clergyman, sir, and am not come to buy hogs.' Trulliber answered, 'he was sorry for the mistake, but that he must blame his wife 'adding, 'she was a fool, and always committed blunders.' He then desired him to walk in and clean himself, that he would only fasten up the stye, and follow him Adams desired leave to dry his great coat, wig, and hat by the fire, Mrs Trulliber would have which Trulliber granted brought him a basin of water to wash his face, but her husband bid her be quiet like a fool as she was, or she would commit more blunders, and then directed Adams to the pump While Adams was thus employed, Trul liber, conceiving no great respect for the appearance of his guest, fastened the parlour-door, and now con ducted him into the kitchen, telling him he believed a cup of drink would do him no harm, and whispered his wife to draw a little of the worst ale. short silence, Adams said, 'I fancy, sir, you already per ceive me to be a clergyman '- 'Ay, ay,' cries Trulliber. grinning, 'I perceive you have some cassock I will not venture to caale it a whole one ' Adams answered. it was, indeed, none of the best, but he had the misfor tune to tear it about ten years ago in passing over a stile. Mrs Trulliber, returning with the drink, told her husband 'she funcied the gentleman was a traveller, and that he would be glad to eat a bit.' Trulliber bid her 'hold her impertinent tongue,' and asked her, 'if parsons used to travel without horses, 'adding, 'he supposed the gentle man had none, by his having no boots on '- 'Yes, sir, yes,' says Adams, 'I have a horse, but I have left him behind me. - 'I am glad to hear you have one,' says Trulliber, 'for I assure you I don't love to see clergymen on foot, it is not seemly, nor suiting the dignity of the cloth. Here Trulliber made a long oration on the dignity of the cloth (or rather gown), not much worth relating, till his wife had spread the table, and set a mess of porridge on it for his breakfast. He then said to Adams, 'I don't know, friend, how you came to caale on me however, as you are here, if you think proper to eat a morsel, you may ' Adams accepted the invitation. and the two parsons sat down together, Mrs Trulhber waiting behind her husband's chair, as was, it seems, her custom Trulliber ate heartily, but scarce put any thing in his mouth without finding fault with his wife's All which the poor woman bore patiently cookers Indeed, she was so absolute an admirer of lier husband's greatness and importance, of which she had frequent lints from his own mouth, that she almost carried her adoration to an opiniou of his infallibility. To say the truth, the parson had exercised her more ways than one, and the pious woman had been so well edified by her husband's sermons, that she had resolved to receive the good things of this world together with the bad. She hud indeed been at first a little contentious, but he had long since got the better, partly by her love for this, partly by her fear of that, partly by her religion, partly by the respect he paid himself, and partly by thut which he received from the parish she had, in short, absolutely submitted, and now worshipped her husband, as Sarah did Abraham, calling him not lord, but master Whilst they were at table, her husband gave her a fresh example of his greatness, for as she had just delivered a cup of ale to Adams, he snatched it out of his hand, and crying out, 'I caal'd vurst,' swallowed down the ale denied it, it was referred to the wife, who, though her conscience was on the side of Adams, durst not give it against her husband Upon which he said, 'No, sir, no I should not have been so rude to have taken it from you, if you had caald vurst, but I'd have you know I'm a better man than to suffer the best he in the kingdom to drink before me in my own house, when I caale vurst'

As soon as their breakfast was ended, Adams began in the following manner 'I think, sir, it is high time to inform you of the business of my embassy. I am a traveller, and am passing this way in company with two young people, a lad and a damsel, my parishioners, towards my own cure we stopped at a house of hos pitality in the purish, where they directed me to you, as having the cure.'—'Though I am but a curate,' says Trulliber, 'I believe I am as warm as the vicar himself, or perhaps the rector of the next parish too. I believe I could buy them both '—'Sir,' cries Adams, 'I rejoice thereat. Now, sir, my business is, that we are by ratious accidents stripped of our money, and are not able to pay our reckoning, being seven shillings. I therefore request you to assist me with the loan of those seven shillings, and also seven shillings more, which, peradventure, I shall return to you, but if not, I am continued you will joy fully embrace such an opportunity of laying up a treasure in a better place than any this world affords?

Suppose a stranger, who entered the chambers of a lawyer, being imagined a elient, when the lawyer was preparing his pulm for the fcc, should pull out a writ Suppose an apotheeary, at the door of a against him chariot containing some great doctor of eminent skill, should, instead of directions to a patient, present him with a potion for himself Suppose a minister should, instead of a good round sum, treat my lord ----, or sir -, or I'sq -, with a good broomstick Suppose a civil companion, or a led captain, should, instead of virtue, and honour, and beauty, and parts, and admira tion, thunder vice and infamy, and ugliness, and folly, and contempt, in his patron's ears. Suppose, when a tradesman first carries in his bill, the man of fishion should pay it, or suppose, if lie did so, the tradesman should abote what he had overcharged on the sup position of waiting. In short,—suppose what you will, you never can nor will suppose anything equal to the astonishment which seized on Trulliber, as soon as Adams had ended his speech. A while he rolled his eyes in silence, sometimes surveying Adams, then his wife, then casting them on the ground, then lifting them to heaven

At last he burst forth in the following accents -'Sir, I believe I know where to lay my little treasure up as well as another I think G-, if I am not so warm as some, I am content, that is a blessing greater than riches, and he to whom that is given need ask no more To be content with a little, is greater than to possess the world, which a man may possess without being so Lay up my treasure! what matters where a man's treasure is, whose heart is in the Scriptures? there is the treasure of a Christian ' At these words the water rah from Adams's eyes, and, catching Trulliber by the hand in a ripture, 'Brother,' says he, 'Heavens bless the accident by which I came to see you, I would have walked many a mile to have communed with you, and believe me, I will shortly pay you a second visit but my friends, I fancy, by this time wonder at my stay, so let me have the money immediately' Trulliber then put on a stern look, and cried out, 'Thou dost not intend to rob me?' At which the wife, bursting into tears, fell on her knees, and roared out, 'O dear sir! for heaven's sake don't rob my master we are but poor people '-' Get up for a fool as thou art, and go about thy business,' said Trulliber 'dost think the man will venture his hie? he is a beggar, and no robber'-'Very true, indeed,' answered Adams 'I wish with all my heart the tithing man was here,' eries Trulhber 'I would have thee pumshed as a vagabond for thy impudence shillings indeed! I won't give thee a farthing believe thou art no more a clergyman than the woman there' (pointing to his wife), 'but if thou art, dost deserve to have thy gown stripped over thy shoulders, for running about the country in such a manner'-'I forgive your suspicions,' says Adams 'but suppose I am not a clergyman, I am nevertheless thy brother, and thou, as a Christian, much more as a clergyman, art obliged to relieve my distress.' 'Dost preach to me?'

replied Trulliber 'dost pretend to instruct me in my duty?'-' Ifacks, a good story,' eries Mrs Trulliber, 'to preach to my master I'- Silence, woman,' cries Trul liber 'I would have thee I not, friend' (addressing himself to Adams), 'I shall not learn my duty from such as thee, I know what charity is, better than to give to angabonds."- Besides, if we were inclined, the prois rate obliges us to give so much charity,' cries the wife. Pugh! Thou art a fool Poor's rate! hold thy nonsense,' answered Trulliber, and then, turning to Adams, he told him, he would give him nothing 'I am sorry,' answered Adams, 'that you do know what charity is, since you practice it no better, I must tell you if you trust to your I nowledge for your justification you will find yourself deceived, though you should add faith to it, without good worl s'-'Fellor,' cries Trulliber, 'dost thou speal against faith in my house? Get out of my doors. I will no longer remain under the same roof with a wretch who speaks wintonly of faith and the Scriptures'-'Name not the Scriptures,' says Adams. 'How! not name the Scriptures! Do you disbeliere the Scriptures?' erics Trulliber 'No, but you do' answered Adams, 'if I may reason from your practice, for their commands are so explicit, and their rewards and punishments so immense, that it is impossible a man should stendfastly behave, without obeying there is no command more express, no duty more frequently enjoined, than charity Whoever, therefo e, is void of charity, I mal c no scruple of pronouncing that he is no Christian '-' I vould not advise thee,' sigs Trulliber, 'to say that I am no Christian I won't take it of you for I believe I am as good a man as thyself, (and, indeed, though he was now rather too corpuler for uthletic exercises, he had, in his voith, been one of the best boxers and cudgel players in the county) His ware, sceing him eleneh his fist, interposed, and hegged him not to fight, but show himself a true Christian, and take the law of him. As nothing could provoke Adams to strike, but an absolute assault on himself or his friend, he smiled at the angry look and gestures of Trulliber and, telling him he was sorry to see such men in orders, departed without further ecremony

Wild proceeds to the Highest Consummation of Human Greatness

At length the morning came, which Fortune at his birth had resolutely ordained for the consummation of our hero's GREATNESS he had, himself, indeed, modestly declined the public honours she intended him, and had taken a quantity of laudanum, in order to retire quietly off the stage, but we have already observed in the course of our wonderful history, that to struggle against this ludy's decrees is vain and impotent and whether she hath determined you shall be hanged or be a prime minister, it is, in either case, lost labour to resist. Laudanum, therefore, being unable to stop the breath of our hero, which the fruit of hemp-seed, and not the spirit of poppy seed, was to overcome, he was, at the usual hour, attended by the proper gentleman appointed for that purpose, and acquainted that the cart was ready On this occasion he exerted that greatness of courage, which hath been so much celebrated in other heroes, and knowing it was impossible to resist, he gravely de clared, he would attend them He then descended to that room where the fetters of great men are knocked off, in a most solemn and ceremonions manner. Then shaking hands with his friends (to wit, those who were conducting him to the tree), and drinking their healths in a bumper of brands, he ascended the eart, where he was no sooner seated, than he received the acclamations of the multitude, who were highly ravished with his GREATNESS.

The cart now moved slowly on, being preceded by a troop of horse guards bearing javelins in their hands, through streets lined with crowds, all admiring the great behaviour of our hero, who rode on sometimes sighing, sometimes swearing, sometimes singing or whistling, as his humour varied.

When he came to the tree of glory, he was welcomed with an universal short of the people, vilio were there assembled in prodigious numbers, to behold a sight much more rare in populous cities than one would reasonably imagine it should be, viz the proper catastrophe of a great man.

But though envy was, through fear, obliged to join the general voice in applause on this occasion, there were not wanting some who maligned this completion of glory, which was now about to be fulfilled to our hero, and endeavoured to prevent it by knocking him on the head as he stood under the tree, while the ordinary was performing his last office. They therefore began to batter the eart with stones, brick bats, dirt, and all manner of mischievous weapons, some of which errone ously playing on the robes of the ecclesiastic, made him so expeditious in his repetition, that, with wonderful alacrity, he had ended almost in an instant, and conveyed himself into a place of safety in a hackney coach, where he waited the conclusion with the temper of mind described in these verses

Suave mari magno, turbantibus rquora ventis, E terra alterius magnum spectare laborem

We must not, however, omit one circumstance, as it serves to show the most admirable conservation of character in our hero to his last moment, which was, that whilst the ordinary was busy in his ejaculations, Wild, in the midst of the shower of stones, &c., which played upon him, applied his hands to the parsons pocket, and emptied it of his bottle screw, which he carried out of the world in his hand

The ordinary being now descended from the eart, Wild had just opportunity to east his eves around the crowd, and to give them a hearty curse, when immediately the horses moved on, and with universal applicate our hero swang out of this world

Thus fell Jonathan Wild the GREAT, by a death as glorious as his life had been, and which was so truly agreeable to it, that the litter must have been deplor ably maimed and imperfect without the former, a death which hath been alone wanting to complete the characters of several ancient and modern heroes, whose histories would then have been read with much greater pleasure by the wisest in all ages. Indeed, we could almost wish, that whenever Fortune seems wantonly to deviate from her purpose, and leaves her work imperfect m this particular the historian would indulge himself in the licence of poetry and romance, and even do a violence to truth, to oblige his reader with a page, which must be the most delightful in all his history, and which could never fail of producing an instructive moral

Narrow minds may possibly have some reason to be ashamed of going this way out of the world, if their consciences can fly in their faces, and assure them they have not merited such an honour, but he must be a fool who is ashamed of being hanged, who is not weak enough to be ashamed of having deserved it.

Of the Serious in Writing, and the Initial Essays in 'Tom Jones'

Peradventure there may be no parts in this prodigious work which will give the reader less pleasure in the perusing, than those which have given the author the greatest pains in composing. Among these probably may be reckoned those initial essays which we have prefixed to the historical matter contained in every book, and which we have determined to be essentially necessary to this kind of writing, of which we have set ourselves at the head

For this onr determination we do not hold ourselves strictly bound to assign any reason at being abundantly sufficient that we have laid it down as a rule necessary to be observed in all prosai comi-epic writing ever demanded the reasons of that nice unity of time or place which is now established to be so essential to dramatic poetry? What critic hath been ever asked why a play may not contain two days as well as one, or why the audience (provided they travel like electors without any expense) may not be wasted fifty miles as well as five? Hath any commentator well accounted for the limitation which an ancient critic hath set to the drama, which he will have contain neither more nor less than five acts? Or hath anyone living attempted to explain, what the modern judges of our theatres mean by that word low, by which they have happily succeeded in banishing all humour from the stage, and have made the theatre as dull as a drawing room? Upon all these occasions, the world seems to have embraced a maxim of our law, viz., Cuicunque in arte sua perito credendum est for it seems, perhaps, difficult to conceive that anyone should have had enough of impidence, to lay down dogmatical rules in any art or science without the least foundation In such cases, therefore, we are apt to con clude, there are sound and good reasons at the bottom, though we are unfortunately not able to see so far

Now, in reality, the world have paid too great a compliment to critics, and have imagined them men of much greater profundity than they really are. From this complaisance, the critics have been emboldened to assume a dictatorial power, and have so far succeeded, that they are now become the masters, and have the assurance to give laws to those authors, from whose predecessors they originally received them

The critic, rightly considered, is no more than the clerk, whose office it is to transcribe the rules and laws laid down by those great judges, whose vast strength of genius hath placed them in the light of legislators, in the several sciences over which they presided. This office was all which the critics of old aspired to, nor did they ever dare to advance a sentence, without supporting it by the anthority of the judge from whence it was borrowed.

But in process of time, and in ages of ignorance, the clerk began to invade the power and assume the dignity of his master. The laws of writing vere no longer founded on the practice of the author, but on the dictates of the critic. The clerk became the legislator, and those very peremptorily gave laws, whose business it was, at first, only to transcribe them

Hence arose an obvious, and, perliaps, an unavoidable error For these critics being men of shallow capacities, very easily mistook mere form for substance acted as a judge would, who should adhere to the lifeless letter of law and reject the spirit Little circumstances which were, perhaps, accidental in a great anthor, were, by these critics, considered to constitute his elif merit, and transmitted as essentials to be observed by all his successors To these encroachments, time and ignorance, the two great supporters of imposture, gave authority, and thus, many rules for good writing have been estab lished, which have not the least foundation in truth or nature, and which commonly serve for no other purpose than to curb and restrain genius, in the same manner as it would have restrained the dancing master, had the many excellent treatises on that art laid it down as an essential rule, that every man must dance in chains

To avoid, therefore, all imputation of laying down a rule for posterity, founded only on the anthority of the dixit, for which, to say the truth, we have not the profoundest veneration we shall here waive the privilege above contended for, and proceed to lay before the reader, the reasons which have induced us to intersperse these several digressive essays in the course of this work

And here we shall of necessity be led to open a new vein of knowledge, which, if it hath been discovered, hath not, to our remembrance, been wrought on by any ancient or modern writer. This vein is no other than that of contrast, which runs through all the works of the creation, and may, probably, have a large share in con stituting in us the idea of all beauty, as well natural as artificial, for what demonstrates the beauty and excellence of anything but its reverse? Thus the beauty of day and that of summer, is set off by the horrors of night and winter. And I believe, if it was possible for a man to have seen only the two former, he would have a very imperfect idea of their beauty.

But to avoid too serious an air. Can it be doubted, but that the finest woman in the world would lose all benefit of her charms in the eye of a man who had never seen one of another east? The ladies themselves seem so sensible of this, that they are all industrious to procure foils, nay, they will become foils to themselves, for I have observed (at Bath particularly) that they endeavour to appear as ugly as possible in the morning, in order to set off that beauty which they intend to show you in the evening

Most artists have this secret in practice, though some, perhaps, have not much studied the theory. The jeweller knows that the finest brilliant requires a foil, and the painter, by the contrast of his figures, often acquires great applause.

A great genius among us will illustrate this matter fully. I cannot, indeed, range him under any general head of common artists, as he hath a title to be placed among those

- 'Inventas, qui vitam excolucre per artes.'
- 'Who by invented arts have life improv'd'

I mean here the inventor of that most exquisite entertain ment called the English pantomine

This entertainment consisted of two parts, which the inventor distinguished by the names of the serious and the conic. The serious exhibited a certain number of heathen gods and heroes, who were certainly the worst and dullest company into which an audience was ever introduced, and (which was a secret known to few) were actually intended so to be, in order to contrast the conic part of the entertainment, and to display the tricks of harlequin to the better advantage.

This was, perhaps, no very civil use of such person ages, but the contrivance was, nevertheless, ingenious enough, and liad its effect. And this will now plainly appear, if instead of serious and comic, we supply the words duller and dullest, for the comic was certainly duller than anything before shown on the stage, and could only be set off by that superlative degree of dul ness, which composed the serious. So intolerably serious, indeed, were these gods and heroes, that harlequin (though the English gentleman of that name is not at all related to the French family, for he is of a mach more serious disposition) was always welcome on the stage, as he relieved the audience from worse company

Judicious writers have always practised this art of contrast, with great success. I have been surprised that Horace should cavil at this art in Homer, but indeed he contradicts himself in the very next line.

- 'Indignor quandoque bonus dormitat Homerus, Verum operi longo fas est obripere somnum.'
- 'I grieve if e'er great Homer chance to sleep, Let slumbers on long works have right to creep'

For we are not here to understand, as, perhaps, some have, that an author actually falls asleep while he as writing. It is true that readers are too apt to be so over taken, but if the work was as long as any of Oldmixon, the author himself is too well entertained to be subject to the least drowsiness. He is, as Mr Pope observes,

'Sleepless lumself, to give his renders sleep.'

To say the truth, these soporfic parts are so many scenes of serious artfully interwoven, in order to contrast and set off the rest, and this is the true meaning of a late facetious writer, who told the public, that whenever he was dull, they might be assured there was a design in it.

In this light then, or rather in this darkness, I would have the reader to consider these initial essays. And after this warning, if he shall be of opinion that he can find enough of serious in other parts of this history, he may pass over these, in which we profess to be labour ously dull, and begin the following books at the second chapter (From Tom Jones Book v Chap. 1)

Partridge on Courage.

At length Jones, being weary of soliloquy, addressed himself to his companion, and blamed him for his tact turnity, for which the poor man very honestly accounted, from his fear of giving offence. And now, this fear being pretty well removed by the most absolute promises of indemnity, Partridge again took the bridle from his tongue, which perhaps rejoiced no less at regaining is liberty, than a young colt, when the bridle is shipt from his neck, and he is turned loose into the pastures.

As Partridge was inhibited from that topic which would have first suggested itself, he fell upon that which was next uppermost in his mind, namely, the Man of the Hill 'Certainly, sir,' says he, 'that could never he a man, who dresses himself, and lives after such a strange manner, and so unlike other folks Besides, his diet, as the old woman told me, is chiefly upon herbs, which is a fitter food for a horse than a Christian may, landlord at Upton says, that the neighbours thereabonts have very fearful notions about him. It runs strangely in my head, that it must have been some spirit, who perhaps might be sent to forewarn us, and who knows but all that matter which he told us, of his going to fight, and of his heing taken prisoner, and of the great danger he was in of being hanged, might be intended as a warning to us, considering what we are going about besides, I dreamt of nothing all last night, but of fighting and methough' the blood ran out of my nose as liquor out of a tap. Indeed, sir, infandum, regina, jubes renozare dolarm.

'Thy story, Partindge,' answered Jones, 'is almost as ill applied as thy Latin. Nothing can be more likely to happen than death to men who go into battle. Perhaps we shall both fall in it,—and what then?' 'What then!' replied Partindge. 'Why then there is an end of us, is there not? when I am gone, all is over with me. What matters the cause to me, or who gets the victory, if I am killed? I shall never enjoy any advantage from it. What are all the ringing of bells, and bonfires, to one that is six foot under ground? there will be an end of poor Partindge.' 'And an end of poor Partindge,' cries Jones, 'there must be one time or other. If you love Latin, I will repeat you some fine lines ont of Horace, which would inspire conrage into a coward.

"Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori Mors et fagacem persequitur virum Nec parcit imbellis jnventæ Poplitibus, timidogne tergo"

'I wish you would construe them,' cries Partindge, 'for Horace is a hard author, and I cannot understand as you repeat them.'

'I will repeat you a bad imitation or rather paraphrase of my own, said Jones 'for I am but an indifferent poet

"Who would not die in his dear country's cause! Since, if base fear his distard step withdraws, From death he cannot fly —One common grave Receives, at last, the coward and the brave."

'That's very certain,' cries Partridge. 'Ay, sure, Mors omnibus communis but there is a great difference between dying in one's bed a great many years hence, like a good Christian, with all our friends crying about us, and being shot to-day or to morrow, like a mad dog, or perhaps hacked in twenty pieces with a sword, and that too before we have repented of all our sins. O Lord, have mercy upon us! to be sure the soldiers are a wicled kind of people. I never loved to have any thing to do with them. I could hardly bring myself ever to look npon them as Christians. There is nothing but cursing and swearing among them I wish your honour would repent I heartily wish you would repent, before it is too late, and not think of going among them -Evil communication corrupts good manners That is my principal reason. For, is for that matter, I am no more afraid than another man, not I, as to matter of that, I know all human flesh must die, but yet a man may live many years for all that. Why, I am a middle aged man now, and yet I may live a great number of years. I have read of several who have lived to be above a hundred, and some a great deal above a hundred that I hope, I mean that I promise myself, to live to any such age as that neither -But, if it be only to eighty or ninety, Heaven be praised, that is a great way off yet, and I am not afraid of dying then, no more than another man hut surely to attempt death before a man's time is come, seems to be downright wickedness and presumption. Besides, if it was to do any good indeed, but let the cause be what it will, what mighty matter of good can two people do? and for my part, I understand nothing of it. I never fired off a gun above ten times in my life, and then it was not charged with hullets. And for the sword, I never learned to fence, and know nothing of the matter. And then there are those cannons, which certainly it must be thought the highest presumption to go in the way of, and nobody but a madman—I ask pardon, upon my soul I meant no harm, I beg I may not throw your honour into another passion?

'I am now so well convinced of thy cowardice, that thon couldst not provoke me on any account' 'Your honour,' answered he, 'may call me a coward, or any thing else you please. If loving to sleep in a whole skin makes a man a coward, non immunes ab illis malis sumus. I never read in my grammar, that a man can't be a good man without fighting. Vir bonus est quis? Qui consulta patrum, qui leges juraque servat. Not a word of fighting, and I am sure the scripture is so much against it, that a man shall never persuade nie he is a good Christian, while he sheds Christian blood'

(From Tom Jones, Book xii Chap 3.)

Opening of 'The Journal of a Voyage to Lisbon.'

Wednesday, June 26, 1754.—On this day, the most melancholy sun I had ever beheld arose, and found me wake at my house at Fordhook. By the light of this sun I was, in my own opinion, last to behold and take leave of some of those creatures on whom I doted with a mother like fondness, guided by nature and passion, and uncurred and unhardened by all the doctrine of that philosophical school where I had learned to bear pains and to despise death

In this situation, as I could not conquer nature, I submitted entirely to her, and she made as great fool of me as she had ever done of any woman whatsoever under pretence of giving me leave to enjoy, she drew me into suffer the company of my little ones, during eight hours, and I doubt whether in that time I did not undergo more than in all my distemper

At twelve precisely my coach was at the door, which was no sooner told me, than I kissed my children round, and went into it with some little resolution. My wife, who behaved more like a heroine and philosopher, though at the same time the tenderest mother in the world, and my eldest danghter, followed me, some friends went with us, and others here took their leave, and I heard my behaviour applauded, with many murmurs and praises to which I well knew I had no title, as all other such philosophers may, if they have any modesty, confess on the like occasions.

The connection of the Deulighs and the Hapsburgs is discussed by Mr J H Round at pp. 216-49 of his Studies in Peerage and Family History (1901) and his conclusions have been adopted by Burke. It has been suggested (Thomson's Richardson, 1900, p. 38) that the Afology for the Life of Mrs Shannela Andreus (1741) should be added to the works of Fielding Richardson believed Fielding to be the anihor (Corr 1804, iv 286), and there is some internal evidence—notably the fact that, both in Shannela and Josephi Andreus the Mr B. of Pamiela is converted into 'Mr Booby—which supports this belief But hitherto the book has not been claimed for Fielding by Fielding's biographers.

Fieldings 'Works were first published in 1762 in 410 and 810 by Andrew Millar, with an Essay on his Life and Genius by Arthur Murphy In 1821 the novels appeared in Ballaniane's Novelist's Library, with a biographical sketch by Sir Walter Scott In 1882 an édition de luxe in ten volumes was published by Messrs Smith and Elder, with a prefatory study by Mr Leslie Stephen in 1893 Messrs Dent issued an edition in twelve volumes edited by Professor Saintsbury and in 1898 Messes Archibald Constable & Co issued n further edition with a preliminary I say by Mr Edmund Gosse An annotated edition of the Journal of a logage to Lisbon was published by the Chiswick Press in 1872 There are Lives of Fielding by Watson (1807), Lawrence (1855) and in the 'Men of Letters series by the present writer (1883, 1889 and revised American edition, 1902) Among separate articles may be noted Rezue des Deux Mondes (Gustave Planche) 1832, Frater's Majacine (keightley), January and February 1858

AUSTIN DOBSON

Sir Charles Hanbury Williams (1709-59) enjoyed great popularity as satirical poet, courtier, and diplomatist during the latter part of the reign Lord Hervey, Lord Chesterfield, of George II Pulteney, and others threw off political squibs and light satires, but Williams eclipsed them all in liveliness and pungency. On the death of his father, Mr Hanbury, he took the name of Williams in respect of an estate in Monmouthshire left to him by a godfither, and in 1733 entered Parliament by Walpole's favour and as his sup Croker says that after lampooning Isa bella, Duchess of Manchester, with her second husband, Mr Hussey, he 'retreated, with too little spirit, from the storm that threatened him into Wales, whence he was afterwards glad to accept missions to the courts of Dresden, Berlin, and Russia' One verse of this truculent satire runs

But careful Heaven reserved her Grace For one of the Milesian race
On stronger parts depending,
Nature, indeed, denies them sense,
But gives them legs and impudence
That beats all understanding

When Pulteney, in 1741, had succeeded in procuring Walpole's defeat and resignation, and was himself clevated to the peerage as Earl of Bath, some of Williams's bitterest verses were levelled at him—In the Statesman the new peer is pilloried

When you touch on his lordship's high birth, Speak Latin as if you were tipsy Say we're all but the sons of the earth, Et genus non fecimus ipsi

Proclaim him as rich as a Jew,
Yet attempt not to reckon his bounties,
You may say he is married, 'tis true,
Yet speak not a word of the countess

Leave a blank here and there in each page,
To enrol the fair deeds of his youth,
When you mention the acts of his age,
Leave a blank for his honour and truth

Say he made a great monarch change hands, He spake—and the minister fell, Say he made a great statesman of Sands— Oh, that he had taught him to spell

In another poem Williams rule at Sandys for Sands), who by Pulteney's procurement was made Chancellor of the Exchequer

How Sands, in sense and person queer, Jumped from a patriot to a peer No mortal yet I now why, How Pultency truel ed the fairest fame For a Right Honourable name To call his viven by His pasquinades are at least as personal and virulent as the political poetry of the Rolland or the Anti Jacobin. The following is a specimen of Williams's more careful character painting—part of a sketch of General Churchill, in several points suggesting Thackeray's Major Pendennis.

None led through youth a gayer life than he, Cheerful in converse, smart in repartee. But with old age its vices came along, And in narration lie's extremely long, Exact in circumstance, and nice in dates, On every subject he his tale relates If you name one of Marlbro's ten campaigns, He tells you its whole history for your pains, and Blenheim's field becomes by his reciting As long in telling as he was in fighting, His old desire to please is well expressed, His hat's well cocked, his penyig's well dressed, He rolls his stockings still, white gloves he wears, And in the boxes with the beaux appears, His eyes through wankled corners cast their ravs. Still he hows graceful still soft things he cass And, still remembering that he once was toung, He strains his empled I nees and struts along The room he entered smiling, which tespoke Some worn out compliment or threadbare joke, For, not perceiving loss of parts, he vet Grasps at the shade of his departed wit

In 1822 the fugitive poetry of Wilhams was collected and published in three volumes, but some at least of the grossest pieces were probably not written by him

George, Lord Lyttelton (1709-73), was the son of Sir Thomas Lyttelton of Hagley in Worand after distinguishing lumself at cestershire Eton and Oxford, he passed some time in France On his return lie obtained a scat in and Italy Parliament, and opposed the measures of Sir Robert Walpole As secretary to the Prince of Wales, he was able to secure favours for his literary friends, Thomson and Mallet. Pope ad mired his talents and opinions, commemorated him in his verse, and remembered him in his will, and his poetry gained him a place in Johnson's Collection and his Lives of the Poets From 1735 he took a conspicuous part in the House of Commons When Walpole and the Whigs were vanquished, Lyttelton was successively one of the Lords of the Treasury, a Privy Councillor, Chancellor of the Eychequer, and, finally, a peer. He was a good, Lindl, absert-minded, amkward, and prous man, a friend and patron of poets and literary men. Thomson was his intimate, Fielding ded cated Tom Jones to him, Horace Walpole sneered at him, and Ches erfield and Smollett said unpleasant things about him his manners and mental equipment. An honest politician, he was not a great statesman. He was publishing poetry as earry as 1750 and in 1735 produced the Letters from a Persiar in England to his Friend at Ishahar (Montesquieu's Lettres Persanes, the model, dated from 1721) in which Selim describes and naï els crucises the opera, an indecorous stage play, bear-baining, card-parties, balls and the pastimes, manners, and political factions of England and of London society Some of the letters are no elettes with a purpose. Lyttelton's treatise (1746, on the Conversion of St Paul was written with 'a particular view to the satisfaction' of Thomson the poet. His Dialogues of the Dead (1760) enjoyed much popularity. He also vrote an elaborate History of the Reign of Henry II., to which he brought ample information and a spirit of impartiality and justice, but the work is dry and tedious-'not illuminated' as Gibbon very truly said. 'b, a ra of genius' Among the poems are eclogues on love and jealous,, epistles and addresses to Pope and man, other friends, odes, translations, and a good many real songs of the best date from 1732 and 1733 respectivelyone surveying the symptoms of love in this fashion

Where er she speaks my ranshed ear No other voice but hers can hear, No other wit but hers approve, Tell me, my heart, if this belove, and returning always to the same query, and the other beginning

The heavy hours are almost past
That part my love and me,
My longing eyes may hope at last
Their only wish to see.

The 'Advice to a Ladv is too fairly representative of most of his work. Gray praised his 'Yonody' on his wife's death, which remains a truly touching elegy, the Prologue to Thomson's Corrolanus was then accepted as his best poetic effort, and certainly contains felicitous lines and couplets. Before this play could be brought out Thomson was dead. The tragedy was acted for the benefit of the poet's relations and when Quin spoke Lyttelton's prologue many of the audience wept.

From the 'Monody

In rain I loo! around
O er all the well known ground,
My Lucy's wonted foots'eps to descry,
Where o't we used to walk,
Where o't in tender tail
We saw the summer sar go down the sky,
Nor by yon fountain's side,
Nor where its waters glide

Along the valley, can she now be found
In all the wide stretched prospect's ample bound,
No more my moureful eve
Can aught of her espy,
But the sad sacrea earth where her dear rehes lie.
Swee babes, who, like the little playful fawns,
Were won to trip along these verdant lawns
By your delighted mother's side
Who now your infant steps shall guide?
Ah! where is now the hand whose tender care
To every virtue would have formed your youth,
And strewed with flowers the thorny ways of truth?

O loss beyond repair'
O wretched fa.her, left alone
To weep their dire misfortune and thy own!
How shall thy weakened mind, oppressed with woe,
And drooping o er thy Lucy's grave,
Perform the duties that you doubly owe,
Nor she, alas' is gone,

From folly and from vice their helple-s age to save !

From Advice to a Lady'

The councils of a friend. Belinda, hear, Too roughly kind to please a lady's ear, Unlike the flatteries of a lover's pen. Such truths as v omen seldom learn from men. Nor think I praise you ill, when thus I shew What female vanity might fear to know Some ment's mine to dare to be sincere, But greater your sincenty to bear Hard is the fortune that your sex attends, Women, like princes, find few real friends All who approach them their own ends pursue. Lovers and ministers are seldom true. Hence oft from Reason heedless Beauty strays. And the most trusted guide the most betriys, Hence, by fond dreams of fancied power amuzed, When most you tyrannise, you're most abused What is your sex's earliest, latest care, Your heart's supreme ambition '-To be fair For this, the toilet every thought employs, Hence all the toils of dress, and all the joys For this, hands, lips, and eyes are put to school, And each matructed feature has its rule And yet how few have learn', when this is given, Not to disgrace the partial boon of Heaven' How few with all their pride of form can move How few are lovely, that are made for love! Do you, my fair, endeavour to possess An elegance of mind, as well as dress Be that your ornament, and know to please By graceful Nature's unaffected ease. Nor make to dangerous wit a vain pretence, But wisel, rest content with modest sense, For vit, like wine, intoxicates the brain, Too strong for feeble woman to sustain Of those who claim it more than half have none. And half of those who have it are undone. Be still superior to your sex's arts, Nor think dishonesty a proof of parts For you, the plainest is the wisest rule A cunning woman is a knavish fool. Be good yourself, nor think another's shame Can raise vour ment, or adorn your fame. Virtue is amiable, m ld, serene, Without all beauty, and all peace within.

The honour of a prude is rage and storm,
'Tis ugliness in its most frightful form,
Fiercely it stands, defying gods and men,
As fiery monsters guard a giant's den
Seek to be good, but aim not to be great,
A woman's noblest station is retreat,
Her fairest virtues fly from public sight,
Domestic worth, that shuns too strong a light

Prologue to the Tragedy of Corlolanus I come not here your candour to implore For scenes whose author is, alas ' no more, He wants no advocate his cause to plead, You will yourselves be patrons of the dead No party his benevolence confined, No seet-alike it flowed to all mankind He loved his friends-forgive this gushing tear Alas! I feel I am no actor here-He loved his friends with such a warmth of heart, So clear of interest, so devoid of art, Such generous friendship, such unshaken zeal, No words can speak it, but our tears may tell O candid truth ! O faith without a stain! O manners gently firm, and nobly plain I O sympathising love of others' bliss-Where will you find another breast like his! Such was the man the poet well you know, Oft has he touched your hearts with tender woe, Oft in this crowded house, with just applause, You heard him teach fair Virtue's purest laws. For his chaste muse employed her heaven taught lyre None but the noblest passions to inspire, Not one immoral, one corrupted thought, One line which, dying, he could wish to blot. O may to night your favourable doom Another laurel add to grace his tomb Whilst he, superior now to praise or blame, Hears not the feeble voice of human fame. I et if to those whom most on eartli he loved. From whom his pious care is now removed. With whom his liberal hand, and bounteous heart, Shared all his little fortune could impart If to those friends your kind regard shall give What they no longer can from his receive, That, that, even now, above von starry pole, May touch with pleasure his immortal soul

To the Castle of Indolence Lyttelton contributed the stanza with the famous portrait of Thomson, whose 'ditties sweet,' however, Lyttelton did not hesitate to alter and curtail in editions of Thomson's works published in 1750 and 1752, but the liberties thus taken with the poet's text disappeared from later editions The friendly and playful pen portrait of a friend runs thus

A bard here dwelt, more fat than bard beseems, Who, void of envy, guile, and lust of gain, On virtue still, and nature's pleasing themes, Poured forth his unpremeditated strain. The world forsaking with a calm disdain, Here laughed he careless in his easy seat. Here quaffed encircled with the joyous train, Oft moralising sage his ditty sweet. He loathed much to write, ne cared to repeat.

An edition of Lyttelton's collected works in prose and verse appeared in 1774 and was reissued in 1775 and 1776 and in 1845 Sir R. Phillimore published his Memoirs and Correspondence

John Armstrong (1709?-79), the friend of Thomson, of Mallet, Wilkes, and other public and literary characters of that period, is now only known as the author of an unread didactic poem, the Art of Preserving Health A son of the minister of Castleton, a pastoral parish in Liddesdale, he studied medicine in Edinburgh, and took his M D in 1732 Three years later he was practising in London, and became known by the publication of several fugitive pieces and medical essays A nauseous anonymous poem, the Economy of Love (1736), gave promise of poetical powers, but marred his practice as a In 1744 appeared his Art of Pre serving Health, which was followed by two other poems, Benevolence (1751) and Taste (1753), and n pseudonymous volume of Sketches or Essays (1758) In 1760 lie was appointed physician to the forces in Germany, and on the peace in 1763 he returned to London, where he practised, but with little success, till his death, 7th September Armstrong seems to have been an indolent and splenetic but kind-hearted man - shrewd, caustic, and careful he left £3000, saved out of a small income. His portrait in the Castle of Indolence is in Thomson's happiest manner

With him was sometimes joined in silent walk (Profoundly silent, for they never spoke)
One shver still, who quite detested talk
Oft stung by spleen, at once away he broke
To groves of pine and broad o'ershadowing oak,
There, inly thrilled, he wandered all alone,
And on himself his pensive fury wroke,
Nor ever uttered word, save when first shone
The glittering starof eve—'Thank Heaven, the day indone'

The glittering star of eve—'Thank Heaven, the day is done' Warton prused the Art of Preserving Health for its classical correctness and closeness of style, and its numberless poetical images. In general, however, it is stiff and laboured, with occasional passages of tumid extravagance, and the similes are not infrequently echoes of those of Thomson and other poets. Of these two extracts from the Art of Preserving Health (from the close of the second and third books respectively), the second, the most energetic passage in the whole poem and not least characteristic of its medical author, describes the 'sweating sickness' which appeared in London in September 1485, after the victorious entry of the troops of Henry VII who had a week or two before fought at Bosworth field

Wrecks and Mutations of Time

What does not fade? The tower that long had stood The crush of thunder and the warring winds, Shook by the slow but sure destrojer Time, Now hangs in doubtful ruins o'er its base, And flinty pyramids and walls of brass Descend The Babylonian spires are sunk, Achaia, Rome, and Egypt moulder down Time shakes the stable tyranny of thrones, And tottering empires crush by their own weight. This huge rotundity we tread grows old, And all those worlds that roll around the sun,

The sun himself shall die, and ancient night Again involve the desolate abyss, Till the great Father, through the lifeless gloom, Extend his arm to light another world, And bid new planets roll by other laws.

The Sweating Sickness.

Ere yet the fell Plantagenets had spent Their ancient rage at Bosworth's purple field, While, for which tyrant England should receive,
Her legions in incestuous murders mixed
And daily horrors, till the fates were drunk
With kindred blood by kindred hands profused
Another plague of more gigantic arm
Arose, a monster never known before,
Reared from Cocytus its portentous head,
This rapid fury not, like other pests,
Pursued a gradual course, but in a day
Rished as a storm o'er half the astonished isle,
And strewed with sudden carcasses the land

First through the shoulders, or whatever part Was seized the first, a fervid vapour sprung, With rish combustion thence the quivering spark Shot to the heart, and kindled all within, And soon the surface caught the spreading fires. Through all the yielding pores the melted blood Gushed out in smoky sweats, but not assuaged The torrid heat within, nor aught relieved The stomach's anguish With incessant toil, Desperate of ease, impatient of their pain, They tossed from side to side. In vain the stream Ran full and clear, they burnt, and thirsted still The restless arteries with rapid blood Beat strong and frequent. Thick and pantingly The breath was fetched, and with huge labourings heaved. At last a heavy pain oppressed the head, A wild delirinm came their weeping friends Were strangers now, and this no home of theirs Harassed with toil on toil, the sinking powers Lay prostrate and o'erthrown, a ponderous sleep Wrapt all the senses up they slept and died.

In some a gentle horror crept at first O'er all the limbs the sluices of the skin Withheld their moisture, till by art provoked The sweats o'erflowed, but in a clammy tide, Now free and copious, now restrained and slow, Of tinctures various, as the temperature Had mixed the blood, and rink with fetid streams As if the peut up humonrs by delay Were grown more fell, more putrid, and malign Here lay their hopes (though little hope remained), With full effusion of perpetual sweats To drive the venom out. And here the fates Were kind, that long they lingered not in pain For, who survived the sun's diurnal race, Rose from the dreary gates of hell redeemed, Some the sixth hour oppressed, and some the third. Of many thousands, few untainted 'scaped, Of those infected, fewer 'scaped alive, Of those who lived, some felt a second blow, And whom the second spared, a third destroyed. Frantic with fear, they sought by flight to shun The fierce contagion O'er the mournful land The infected city poured her hurrying swarms Roused by the firmes that fired her seats around, The infected country rushed into the town.

Some sad at home, and in the desert some Abjured the fatal commerce of mankind In vain, where'er they fled, the fates pursued, Others, with hopes more specious, crossed the main. To seek protection in far-distant skies But none they found It seemed the general air, From pole to pole, from Atlas to the east, Was then at enmity with English blood, For but the race of England all were safe In foreign climes, nor did this fury taste The foreign blood which England then contained Where should they fly? The circumambient heaven Involved them still, and every breeze was bane Where find relief? The salutary art Was mute, and, startled at the new disease, In fearful whispers honcless omens gave. To Heaven, with suppliant rites they sent their prayers, Heaven heard them not Of every hope deprived, Fatigued with vain resources, and subdued With woes resistless, and enfeebling fear, Passive they sunk beneath the weighty blow Nothing but lamentable sounds were heard, Nor aught was seen but ghastly views of death Infectious horror ran from face to face, And pale despair 'Twas all the business then To tend the sick, and in their turns to die In heaps they fell, and oft one bed, they say, The sickening, dying, and the dead contained

Richard Glover (1712-85), a London merchant who sat in Parliament for Weymouth (1761-68), published two elaborate poems in blank verse, Leonidas and the Athenaid-the former on the defence of Thermopyle, and the latter continuing the story of the war between the Greeks and Persians The length of these poems, their want of sustained interest, and lack of genuine poetic quality have led to their being next to unknown in the present day Leonidas (1737) was hailed with acclamations by the Opposition, or Prince of Wales's party, of which Glover was an active member London, or the Progress of Commerce (1739), was a poem written to excite the national spirit against the Spaniards, and in 1742 Glover appeared before the bar of the House of Commons as delegate of the London merchants, complaining of the neglect of their interests. In 1744 he declined to join Mallet in writing a Life of the Duke of Marlborough, though his affairs had become somewhat embarrassed A fortunate speculation in copper enabled him to retrieve his position, and he was returned to Parliament for Weymouth. He continued to maintain mercantile interests, and during his leisure enlarged his poem of Leonidas from nine to twelve books (1770) The Athenaid was published posthumously in 1787 His two tragedies, Boadicea (1753) and Medea (1761), are but indifferent performances In 1726 a naval expedition against the Spanish West Indies had miscarried, and the commander, Admiral Hosier, whose orders prevented him from fighting, is said to have died of a broken heart. The disgrace was not wiped out till 1739, when, on the commencement of the 'War of Jenkins's Ear,'

Admiral Vernon bombarded and took Portobelo on the Colombian coast. On this victory Glover wrote a ballad which had a great vogue, Horace Walpole thought it 'very easy and consequently pretty, but from the ease should never have guessed it Glover's '

Admiral Hosier's Ghost.

As near Portobello lying On the gently swelling flood,
At midnight, with streamers flying,
Our triumphint navy rode,
There while Vernon sat all glorious
From the Spaniards' late defent,
And his crews, with shouts victorious,
Drank success to England's fleet,

On a sudden, shrilly sounding,
Hideous yells and shrieks were heard,
Then, each heart with fear confounding
A sad troop of ghosts appeared,
All in dreary hummocks shrouded,
Which for winding sheets they were,
And, with looks by sorrow clouded,
Frowning on that hostile shore

On them gleamed the moon's wan lustre, When the shade of Hosier brave His pale bands was seen to muster, Rising from their watery grave O'er the glummering wave he hied him, Where the Burford reared her sail, With three thousand ghosts beside him, And in grouns did Vernon hail.

'Heed, oh heed our fatal story!
I am Hosier's injured ghost,
You who now have purchased glory
At this place where I was lost
Though in Portobello's ruin,
You now triumph free from fears,
When you think on our undoing,
You will mix your joys with tears.

'See these mournful spectres sweeping Ghastly o'er this hated wave,
Whose wan cheeks are stained with weeping,
These were English captains brave.
Mark those numbers, pale and horrid,
Those were once my sailors bold,
Lo' each liangs his drooping forchead,
While his dismal tale is told

'I, by twenty sail attended,
Did this Spanish town affright,
Nothing then its wealth defended,
But my orders—not to fight!
Oh! that in this rolling ocean
I had east them with disdain,
And obeyed my heart's warm motion,
To have quelled the pride of Span!

'For resistance I could fear none,
But with twenty ships had done
What thou, brave and happy Vernon,
Hast achieved with six alone
Then the Bastimentos never Had our foul dishonour seen,
Nor the seas the sad receiver
Of this gallant train had been

'Thus, like thee, proud Spain dismaying,
And her galleons leading home,
Though condemned for disobeying,
I had met a traitor's doom
To have fallen, my country erying,
"He has played an English part,"
Had been better far than dying
Of a greeved and broken heart

'Unrepining at thy glory,
Thy successful arms we hail,
But remember our sad story,
And let Hosier's wrongs prevail
Sent in this foul clime to languish,
Think what thousands fell in vain,
Wasted with disease and anguish,
Not in glorious battle slain.

'Hence with all my train attending,
From their oozy tombs below,
Through the hoary foam ascending,
Here I feed my constant wee.
Here the Bastimentos viewing,
We recall our shameful doom,
And, our plaintive cries renewing,
Wander through the midnight gloom

'O'er these waves for ever mourning
Shall we roam, deprived of rest,
If, to Britain's shores returning,
You neglect my just request,
After this proud foe subduing,
When your patriot friends you see,
Think on vengeance for my ruin,
And for Eugland—shamed in me'

William Shenstone (1714-63), though author of 'elegies, odes and ballads, humorous sallies and moral pieces,' v anted, as Johnson said, 'comprehension and variety,' even more did he lack depth, spontaneity, true naturainess. Though ambitious of poetic fame, he spent much of his time and squandered most of his means on landscape - gardening and ornamental agriculture. He essayed to lead a too romantic-idvllic life in an eighteenth century artificial Arcadia, and reared up around him a sort of rural para dise, evercising his dilettante tastes and fancies in laying out and embellishing his grounds, till at length money difficulties and distresses threw a cloud over the fur prospect and darkened the latter days of the poet's life The estate which he thus laboured to adorn was the Leasones in the parish of Hales Owen, Worcestershire, where he was born, and where, too, he died. He was taught to read at a dame school, and has immortalised his venerable preceptress in his Schoolmistress. In 1732 he was sent to Pembroke College, Oxford, where he re mained four years. In 1745 the paternal estate fell to his own care, and he began from this time, as Johnson characteristically describes it, 'to point his prospects, to diversify his surface, to entangle his walks, and to wind his waters, which he did with such judgment and fancy, as made his little domain the envy of the great and the admiration of the skilful, a place to be visited by travellers and copied by designers' Descriptions of the Leasones were penned by Dodsley, Goldsmith, and 'Jupiter' Carlyle, and Slienstone has a place in the history of landscape-gardening when by no means at its zenith. The property was altogether not worth more than £300 per annum, and Shenstone had devoted so much of his means to out of doors improvements that he was compelled to live in a dilapidited house, not fit, as he acknowledges, to receive 'polite friends'. An unfortunate attachment and disappointed ambition conspired with his passion for landscape gardening to bind him down to solitude and 'Shenstone's Folly,' as the Leasowes was called. He became querulous and dejected, pined at the unequal gifts of fortune, and even contemplated with a gloomy joy the prospect that terrified Swift when he spoke of being 'forced to die in a rage, like a poisoned rat in a hole' Yet Shenstone must often have experienced very genuine pleasure in the Arcadian retreat which a century afterwards attracted pilgrims-it is described as 'an exquisite poem' by Hugh Miller in his Tirst Impressions of England, and compared with Abbotsford in its disastrous consequences 'The works of a person that builds,' the owner said, 'begin immediately to decay, while those of him who plants begin directly to improve' But Shenstone sighed for more than inward peace and satisfaction - he died in solitude a votary of the world

His works were collected and published after his death by his friend Dodsley, in three volumes (1764-69)—the first contaming his poems, the second his prose essays, and the third his letters and other pieces Gray remarks of his correspondence that it is 'about nothing else but the Leasowes, and his writings with two or three neighbouring clergymen who wrote verses too' The essays display ease and grace of style united to judgment and discrimination. They have not the mellow thought and learning of Cowley's essays, but they resemble them In poetry Shenstone tried different styles his elegies, melodious enough in a fashion, barely reach mediocrity, his levities, or pieces of humour, are dull and spiritless highest effort is The Schoolmistress, published in 1742, but said to be 'written at college, 1736,' it was altered and enlarged after its first publica This poem is a descriptive sketch offered as 'in imitation of Spenser' (really with elements of the burlesque, and earlier than Thomson's Castle of Indolence), delightfully quaint, yet true to nature. His Pastoral Ballad, in four parts, took rink as the finest English poem of that order his pathos is apt to become sentimentality, the simplicity is not seldom artificial, like the poet's garden. Campbell sensibly enough regretted the affected Arcadianism of the pastoral pieces, which undoubtedly present an incongruous mixture of pastoral life and modern manners.

Johnson and Goldsmith both praised the School-mistress, but Walpole unkindly dubbed Shenstone 'the water-gruel bard' His poetry, in spite of its many shortcomings and defects, has resemblances to Goldsmith's, his characteristic use of anapestic verse was imitated by Cowper, and—though the other aspect of him is the more conspicuous—some critics have found in him touches that warrant them in linking him with Thomson as in some degree a heiald of the 'return to nature' One stanza of the Schoolmistress has the special interest of having probably suggested to Gray the thought in his Elegy about the 'mute inglorious Milton'

Yet, nursed with skill, what dazzling fruits appear!
Even now sagacious foresight points to shew
A little bench of heedless bishops here,
And there a chancellour in embryo,
Or bard sublime, if bird mily e'er be so,
As Milton, Shakespeare, names that ne'er shall die!
Though now he crawl along the ground so low,
Nor weeting how the Muse should soar on high,
Wisheth, poor starveling elf! his paper kite may fly

Shenstone was an early favourite of Burns, who in a letter of 1783 names him first amongst his favourites, 'all of the sentimental order,' specially commending the elegies. And Shenstone's influence on Burns is too often clearly traceable.

From 'The Schoolmistress'

Ah me! full sorely is my heart forlorn,
To think how modest worth neglected hies,
While partial fame doth with her blasts adorn
Such deeds alone as pride and pomp disguise,
Deeds of ill sort, and mischievous emprize,
Lend me thy clarion, goddess! let me try
To sound the praise of merit ere it dies,
Such as I oft have chaunced to espy,
Lost in the dreary shades of dull obscurity

In every village marked with little spire,
Lmbowered in trees, and hardly known to fame,
There dwells, in lowly shed, and mean attire,
A matron old, whom we schoolmistress name,
Who boasts unruly brats with birch to tame
They grieven sore, in piteous durance pent,
Awed by the power of this relentless dame,
And ofitimes, on vagaries idly bent,
For unkempt hair, or task unconned, are sorely shent

And all in sight doth rise a birchen tree,
Which Learning near her little dome did stow, Whilome a twig of small regard to see,
Though now so wide its waving branches flow,
And work the simple vassals mickle woe,
For not a wind might curl the leaves that blew,
But their limbs shuddered, and their pulse beat low,
And as they looked, they found their horror grew,
And shaped it into rods, and tingled at the view

Near to this dome is found a patch so green,
On which the tribe their gambols do display,
And at the door imprisoning board is seen,
Lest weakly wights of smaller size should stray,
Lager, perdie, to bask in sunny day!
The noises intermixed, which thence resound,
Do learning's little tenement betray,
Where sits the dame, disguised in look profound,
And eyes her fairy throng, and turns her wheel around.

Her cap, for whiter than the driven snow,
I milem right meet of decency does yield
Her apron dyed in grain, as blue, I trov,
As is the harebell that adorns the field,
And in her hand, for seepter, she does wield
Tway birchen sprays, with anxious fear entwined
With dark distrust, and sad repentance filled,
And steadfast late, and sharp affliction joined,
And fury uncontrolled, and chastisement unkind.

A russet stole was o'er her shoulders thrown,
A russet kirtle seneed the nipping air,
'Twas simple russet, but it was her own,
'Twas her own country bred the flock so fair,
'Twas her own labour did the fleece prepare,
And, sooth to say, her pupils ranged around,
Through pious awe, did term it passing rare,
For they in gaping wonderment abound,
Andthink, no doubt, she been the greatest wighton ground.

Albeit ne flattere did corrupt her truth,
Ne pompous title did debauch her car,
Goody, good woman, gossip, n'aunt, forsooth,
Or dame, the sole additions she did hear,
Yet these she challenged, these she held right dear,
Ne would esteem him act as mought behove,
Who should not honoured eld with these revere,
For never title yet so mean could prove,
But there was eke a mind which did that title love.

One ancient hen she took delight to feed,
The plodding pattern of the busy dame,
Which, ever and anon, impelled by need,
Into her school, begint with clinckens, came,
Such favour did her past deportment claim,
And, if neglect had lavished on the ground Fragment of bread, she would collect the same,
For well she knew, and quaintly could expound,
What sin it were to waste the smallest crumb she found.

Herbs, too, she knew, and well of each could speak,
That in her garden sipped the silvert dew,
Where no vain flower disclosed a grudy streak,
But herbs for use and physic, not a few,
Of gray renown, within those borders grew
The tufted basil, pun provoking thyme,
Fresh balm, and marygold of cliearful hue
The lowly gill, that never dares to climb,
And more I fain would sing, disdaining here to rhyme.

Here oft the dame, on Sabbath's decent eve,
Hymned such psalms as Sternhold forth did mete,
If winter 'twere, she to her hearth did cleave,
But in her garden found a summer seat
Sweet melody ' to hear her then repeat
How Israel's sons, beneath a foreign king,
While taunting foemen did a song entreat,
All for the nonce untuning every string,
Upliung their useless lyres—small heart had they to sing

For she was just, and friend to virtuous lore,
And passed much time in truly virtuous deed,
And in thore elfins' cars would oft deplore
The times when truth by popish rage did bleed,
And tortuous death was true devotion's meed,
And simple faith in iron chains did mourn,
That nould on wooden image place her creed,
And laviny saints in smouldering flames did burn
Ah, dearest Lord, forefend thilk days should e'er return!

In elbow-chair, lile that of Scottish stem,
By the sharp tooth of cankering eld defaced,
In which, when he receives his diadem,
Our sovereign prince and hefest hege is placed,
The matron sat, and some with rank she graced
(The source of children's and of courtiers' pride'), Redres-ed affronts—for vile affronts there passed
And warned them not the fretful to deride,
But love each other dear, whatever them betide.

Right well she knew each temper to descry,
To the art the proud, and the submiss to raise,
Some with vile copper prize exalt on high,
And some entice with pittanee small of praise,
And other some with baleful sprig she 'frays
Even absent, she the reins of power doth hold,
While with quaint arts the gidde crowd she sways,
Forewarned, if little bird their prints behold,
Twill whisper in her ear, and all the scene unfold

Lo' now with state she utters her command, Estsoons the urchins to their tasks repair, Their bool's of stature small they tale in hand, Which with pellucid horn secured are, To save from singer wet the letters fair. The work so gav that on their back is seen, St George's high achievements does declare, On which thill wight that has y gazing been, Kens the forthcoming rod, unpleasing sight, I ween!

The four extracts which follow are from A Pastoral Ballad (1743)

Absence

Ye shepherds, so cheerful and gay, Whose flocks never carelessly roum, Should Corydon's happen to stray, Oh call the poor wanderers home Allow me to muse and to sigh, Nor talk of the change that ye find, None once v as so watchful as I, I have left my dear Phillis behind Now I know what it is to have strove With the torture of doubt and desire What it is to admire and to love, And to leave her we love and admire Ah lead forth my flock in the morn, And the damps of each evening repel, Alas! I am frint and forlorn-I have bade my dear Phillis farewell Since Phillis vouchsafed me a look, I never once dreamt of my vine, May I lose both my pipe and my crook, If I knew of a kid that was mine I prized every hour that went by, Beyond all that had pleased me before, But nov they are past, and I sigh, And I grieve that I prized them no more When forced the fair nymph to forego, What anguish I felt at my heart!
Yet I thought—but it might not be so—
'Twas with pain that she saw me depart.
She gazed as I slowly withdrew,
My path I could hardly discern,
So sweetly she bade me adicu,
I thought that she bade me return.

The pilgrim that journeys all day
To visit some far distant shrine,
If he bear but a relie away,
Is happy, nor heard to repine
Thus widely removed from the fair,
Where my vows, my devotion, I owe,
Soft hope is the relie I bear,
And my solace wherever I go

Hope

My banks they are furnished with bees,
Whose murmur invites one to sleep,
My grottoes are shaded with trees,
And my hills are white over with slicep
I seldom have met with a loss,
Such health do my fountains bestow,
My fountains, all bordered with moss,
Where the harebells and violets grow

Not a pine in my grove is there seen,
But with tendrals of woodbine is bound,
Not a beech's more beautiful green,
But a sweetbriar entwines it around
Not my fields in the prime of the year
More charms than my cattle unfold,
Not a brook that is limpid and clear,
But it glitters with fishes of gold

One would think she might like to retire

To the lower I have laboured to rear,
Not a shrub that I heard her admire,
But I hasted and planted it there
O how sudden the jessamine strove
With the blac to render it gay!
Already it calls for my love
To prune the vild branches away

From the plains, from the woodlands, and groves, What strains of wild melody flow! How the nightingales warble their loves, From thickets of roses that blow! And when her bright form shall appear, Each bird shall harmoniously join In a concert so soft and so clear, As—she may not be fond to resign

I have found out a gift for my fair,

I have found where the wood pigeons breed,
But let me that plunder forbear,
She will say, 'twis a barbarous deed
For he ne'er could be true, she averred,
Who could rob a poor bird of his young,
And I loved her the more when I heard Such tenderness fall from her tongue

Solicitude /

Why will you my passion reproce?
Why term it a folly to greec?
Ere I shew you the charms of my love
She is fairer than you can believe

With her mien she enamours the brave, With her wit she engages the free, With her modesty pleases the grave, She is every way pleasing to me.

O you that have been of her train,
Come and join in my amorous lays,
I could lay down my life for the swain,
That will sing but a song in her praise.
When he sings, may the nymplis of the town
Come trooping, and listen the while,
Aay, on him let not Phyllida frown,
But I cannot allow her to smile

For when Paridel tries in the dance
Any favour with Phyllis to find,
O how, with one trivial glance,
Might she ruin the peace of my mind t
In ringlets he dresses his hair,
And his crook is bestudded around,
And his pipe—O my Phyllis, beware
Of a magic there is in the sound

'Tis his with mock passion to glov,
'Tis his in smooth tales to iinfold
How her face is as bright as the snow,
And her boson, he sure, is as cold
How the nightingales labour the strain,
With the notes of his charmer to vie,
How they vary their accents in vain,
Repine at her triumphs and die'

Disappointment

Ye shepherds, give ear to my lay,
And take no more heed of my sheep
They have nothing to do but to stray,
I have nothing to do but to weep
Let do not my folly reprove,
She was fair, and my passion begun,
She smiled, and I could not but love,
She is faithless, and I am undone.

Perhaps I was void of all thought
Perhaps it was plain to foresee,
That a nymph so complete would be sought
By a swain more engaging than me.
Ah! love every hope can inspire,
It banishes wisdom the while,
And the lip of the nymph we admire
Seems for ever adorned with a smile

The sweets of a dew sprinkled rose,
The sound of a murmuring stream,
The peace which from solitude flows,
Henceforth shall be Corydon's theme
High transports are shewn to the sight,
But we are not to find them our own,
Tate never bestowed such delight,
As I with my Phyllis had known

O ye woods, spread your branches apice,
To your deepest recesses I fly,
I would lude with the beasts of the chase,
I would vanish from every eye.
I et my reed shall resound through the grove
With the same sad complaint it begun,
How she smiled, and I could not but love,
Was faithless, and I am undone!

Jemmy Dawson A Ballad.

Come listen to my mournful tale, Ye tender hearts and lovers dear, Nor will you scorn to heave a sigh, Nor need you blush to shed a tear

And thou, dear Kitty, peerless maid,
Do thou a pensive ear incline,
For thou canst weep at every woe,
And pity every plaint but mine.

Young Dawson was a gallant boy, A brighter never trod the plain, And well he loved one charming maid, And dearly was he loved again

One tender maid she loved him dear, Of gentle blood the damsel came And faultless was her beauteous form, And spotless was her virgin fame.

But curse on party's hateful strife,
I hat led the favoured youth astray,
The day the rebel class appeared,
O had he never seen that day!

Their colours and their sash he wore,
And in the fatal dress was found,
And now he must that death endure,
Which gives the brave the licenest wound.

How pale was then his true love's cheel,
When Jemmy's sentence reached her car?
For never vet did Alpine snows
So pale or yet so chill appear

With faltering voice she weeping said 'O Dawson, monarch of my heart! Think not thy death shall end our love, For thou and I will never part

'I ct might sweet mercy find a place, And bring relief to Jeminy's woes, O George' without a prayer for thee My orisons should never close.

'The gracious prince that gave him life Would crown a never dying flame, And every tender babe I bore Should learn to hisp the giver's name.

'But though, dear youth, thou shouldst be dragged To youder ignominious tree, Thou shalt not want a faithful friend To share the cruel fate's decree'

O then her mourning couch was called, The sledge moved slowly on before, Though borne in a triumphal car, She had not loved her favourite more.

She followed him, prepared to view
The terrible behests of law,
And the last scene of Jemmy's wors
With calm and steadfast eye she saw

Distorted was that blooming face,
Which she had fondly loved so long,
And stifled was that tuneful breath,
Which in her praise had sweetly sung

And severed was that becuteous neck,
Round which her arms had fondly closed,
And mangled was that beauteous breast,
On which her love sick head reposed

And ravished was that constant heart, She did to every heart prefer, For though it could its king forget, 'Twas true and loyal still to her

Amid those unrelenting flames
She bore this constant heart to see,
But when 'twas mouldered into dust,
'Yet, yet,' she cried, 'I follow thee.

'My death, my death alone can show The pure, the lasting love I bore Accept, O Heaven! of woes like ours, And let us, let us weep no more'

The dismal scene was o'er and past,
The lover's mournful hearse retired,
The maid drew back her languid head,
And, sighing forth his name, expired

Though justice ever must prevail,
The tear my Kitty sheds is due,
For seldom shall she hear a tale
So sad, so tender, and so true

Captain James Dawson was one of the eight officers of the Man chester volunteers in the service of the Young Chevalier who were hanged drawn and quartered on Kennington Conimou in 1746. The pathetic story is given in vol xviii of Howells State Trials. A pardon was expected, and in that case Dawson was to have been married the same day. His bride-elect followed him to the scanffold. 'She got near enough, as reported in a letter written at the time, to see the fire kindled which was to consume that licart which she knew was so much devoted to her and all the other dreadful preparations for his fate without being guilty of any of those extravagances which her friends had apprehended. But when all was over, and that she found he was no more she drew her head back into the coach and crying out.' My dear, I follow thee—I follow thee! Sweet Jesus, receive both our souls together, fell on the neck of her companion, and expired while speaking

Written at an Inn at Henley

To thee, fur Freedom, I retire Γrom flattery, cards, and dice, and din, Nor art thou found in mansions higher Than the low cot or humble inn

'Tis here with boundless power I reign, And every health which I begin Converts dull port to bright champagne Such freedom crowns it at an inn

I fly from pomp, I fly from plate, I fly from falsehood's specious grin, Freedom I love, and form I hate, And choose my lodgings at au inn.

Here, waiter take my sordid ore,
Which lackeys else might hope to win,
It buys what courts have not in store,
It buys me freedom at nn inn.

Whoe'er has travelled life's dnll round, Where'er his stages may have been,
May sigh to think he still has found
The warmest welcome nt an inn.

From 'Variety'

Two smiling springs had vaked the flowers That paint the meads, or fringe the bowers-Ye lovers, lend your wondering ears. Who count by months, and not by years-Two smiling springs liad chaplets wove To erown their solitude, and love When, lo! they find, they can't tell how, Their walks are not so pleasant now The seasons sure were changed, the place Had, somehow, got a different face, Some blast had struck the cheerful scene, The lawns, the woods were not so green The purling rill, which murniured by. And once was liquid harmony, Became a sluggish, reedy pool. The days grew hot, the evenings cool The moon, with all the starry reign. Were melancholy's silent train And then the tedrous winter night-They could not read by candle light

Full oft, unknowing why they did,
They called in adventitious aid
A faithful favourite dog—'twas thus With Tobit and Telemachus—Amused their steps, and for a while They viewed his gambols with a smile.
The kitten, too, was comical,
She played so oddly with her tail,
Or in the glass was pleased to find Another cat, and peeped behind

A courteous neighbour at the door, Was deemed intrusive noise no more For rural visits, now and then, Are right, as men must live with men. Then cousin Jenny, fresh from town,

A new recruit, a dear delight!

Made many a heavy hour go down,

At morn, nt noon, at eye, at night

Sure they could hear her jokes for ever,

She was so sprightly and so clever!

Yet neighbours were not quite the thing—What joy, alas! could converse bring With awkward creatures bred at home—The dog grew dull, or troublesome, The cat had spoiled the kitten's ment, And, with her youth, had lost her spirit And jokes repeated o'er and o'er, Had quite exhausted Jenny's store.

-- 'And then, my dear, I can t alide, This always sauntering side by side 'Lnough,' he eries, 'the reason's plant For causes never mel your brain Our neighbours are like other folks, Skip's playful tricl's, and Jenny's jol es, Arc still delightful, still would please, Were we, my dear, ourselves at case Look round, with an impartial eve, On yonder fields, on yonder sky, The azure cope, the flowers below, With all their wonted colours clow, The rill still murmurs, and the moon Slunes as she did, a softer sun No change has made the seasons fail, No counct brushed a with his tail The seems the same, the same the weather-Heli e, my dear, too much together' Agreed A rich old nucle dies,

With eager liaste to town they flew,
Where all must please, for all was new Advanced to fishion's wavering head,
They now, where once they followed, led,
Devised new systems of delight,
Abed all day, and up all night,
In different circles reigned supreme,
Wives copied her, and husbands him,
Till so ar inch life ran on,
So separate, so quite ben ten,
That, meeting in a public place,

And added wealth the means supplies

They scarcely knew each other's free
At last they met, by his deare,
A tile a tite across the fire,
Looked in each other's free a while,
With half a tear, and half a smile
The ruddy health, which wont to grace
With manly glow his rural face,
Now scarce retained its faintest streak,
So sallow was his leathern check
She, lank and pale, and hollow eved,
With rouge had striven in vain to linde
What once was beauty, and repair
The rupine of the midnight air

Silence is cloquence, 'tis said
Both wished to speak, both hing the head
At length it burst 'Tis time,' he cries,
'When tired of folly, to be wise
Are you, too, tired?—then checked a groun
She wept consent, and he went on

'True to the bias of our kind,
'Tis happiness we wish to find
In miral scenes retired we sought
In vain the dear, delicious draught,
Though blest with love's indulgent store,
We found we wanted something more
'Twis company, 'twis friends to share
The bliss we languished to declare,
'Twis social converse, change of scene,
To soothe the sullen hour of spleen,
Short absences to wake desire,
And sweet regrets to fan the fire

'We left the lonesome place, and found, In dissipation's giddy round, A thousand novelties to wake The springs of life, and not to break.

As, from the nest not wandering far, In light executions through the air, The feathered tenants of the grove Around in mazy circles move, Sup the cool springs that murmuring flow, Or taste the blossom on the bough, We sported feely with the rest, And still, returning to the net, In easy much we chatter door.

'Behold us now, di solving quite
In the full occur of delight,
In plea ure, every hour employ,
Immersed in all the world calls joy,
Our affluence casing the expense
Of splendour and magnificence,
Our company, the exalted set
Of all that's gay, and all that's great Nor happy yet' and where's the wonder'
He late, mit d'ar, too i with assument!

The moral of my tale is this Variety " the soul of bliss, But such sauets alone As males our home the more our or n. As from the heart's impolling power The life blood pours its genial store, Though taling each a sarious say, The netive strengs meandering play Through every afters, every vein, All to the heart return again, I com thence resume their new career, But still return and eantre there, So real happine's below Must from the heart sincerely flow, Nor, listening to the siren's song, Must's ray too far, or rest too long All luman pleasures thather tend, Must there begin and there must end, Must there recruit their languad force, And gain fresh vigour from their source

James Harris of Salisbury (1709-80) was a man of rank and fortune he was educated at Wadham, Oxford, sat several years in Parliament, and was successively a Lord of the Admiralis and In 1774 he was made secre Lord of the Treasury tary and comptroller to the queen, and these posts he held till his death in 1780. In 1744 he published three treatises on art, on music and painting, and on happiness, and in 1751 produced his celebrated Hermes, or a Philosopi ical Inquiry concerning The work is an elaborate Universal Grammar attempt to discover the inevitable basis of all grammitical forms from an analysis of the thoughts The method is impossible, and to be conveyed the results false and useless, but Harris's varied learning and ingenuity enabled him to produce a curious and interesting book. He clung to Anstotle in the reign of Locke, and his Philosophical Arrangements (1775) treats modern problems by Aristotelian methods Philological Inquiries (1781), the least tedious of his works, is on style and His son, Lord Malmesbury, literary criticism published in 1801 a complete edition of his works in two quarto volumes was born at Cornhill in London, 26th December His father, Philip Gray (a money-scrivener, like Milton's father), was a 'respectable citizen,' but a man of harsh and violent disposition was forced to separate from him, and it was to her exertions as partner with her sister in a millinery business that the poet owed the advantages of a learned education, first at Eton and afterwards at Peterhouse, Cambridge The painful domestic circumstances of his youth doubtless helped to develop the melancholy traceable in his poetry At Eton he had made the friendship of Horace Walpole, son of the Prime Minister, and when his college education was completed. Walpole carried him off as companion on a tour through They had been two years and Trance and Italy a half together, exploring the natural beauties, antiquities, and picture-galleries of Florence. Rome, and Naples, when a quarrel took place at Reggio, and the travellers separated, Gray returning to England. Walpole took the blame of this difference on himself, as he was vain and volatile, and not disposed to trust in the better knowledge or fall in with the somewhat fastidious tastes and habits of his associate, and by his repentant efforts the breach was healed within three years Gray went to Cambridge to take his degree in civil law, but without intending to follow up the profession. His father had died, his mother's means were small, and the poet was more intent on learning than on riches He made his home in Cambridge, and amidst its noble libraries and learned society passed the greater part of his remaining life. Heartily hating mathematics, he was ardently devoted to classical learning, belleslettres, architecture, antiquities, heraldry, and natural history (especially botany and entomology), he rejoiced in voyages, travels, and books on geography, and showed good taste in painting, music, and gardening His friend Temple said he 'was perhaps the most learned man in Europe,' and his chief relaxation was sought in pleasant company and in writing letters-letters such as only that age could produce This retired life was varied by occasional residence in London, where he revelled among the treasures of the British Museum, and by frequent excursions to the country on visits to learned and attached friends At Cambridge, Gray was considered an unduly fastidious man, and this and the fact that he had a nervous horror of fire gave occasion to practical jokes being played on him by his fellow-inmates of Peterhouse. One of these-1 false alarm of fire, by which he was induced to climb down from his window to the ground by a rope—so annoyed him that he moved (1756) to Pembroke Hall In 1765 he made a journey into Scotland, and met Beattie at Glamis Castle. Wales too he visited, and Cumberland and Westmorland, for the lakes' sake. His letters describing these excursions are remarkable for their grace. acute observation, and dry scholastic humour, as well as for insight into the picturesque and a joy in mountain scenery till then extremely rare-though John Brown (see page 392) and 'Jupiter' Carlyle still earlier visited the Lakes as 'celebrated.' Mackintosh said Gray 'was the first discoverer of the beauties of nature in England' After these unexciting holidays Gray re-established himself in his college retreat—pored over his favourite authors. compiled tables of chronology or botany, moralised 'on all he felt and all he saw' in correspondence with his friends, and occasionally ventured into the realms of poetry and imagination. He had studied the Greek poets with such devotion and care that their spirit informed all his work.

Thomas Gray

Gray's first public appearance as a poet was made in 1747, when his Ode to Eton College was published by Dodsley, it had, however, been written in 1742, as also the Ode to Spring In 1751 his Elegy written in a Country Churchyard secured an enthusiastic hearing His Pindaric Odes, written in 1750-57, met with small success, but his name was now so well known that he was offered the laureateship (1757), vicant by the death of Colley This he declined, but in 1768 he Cıbber accepted the more important post of Professor of Modern History, which brought him in about £400 per annum In 1760-61 he devoted himself to early English poetry, later he studied Icelandic and Celtic poetry, which bore fruit in his Eddaic poems, The Fatal Sisters and The Descent of Odin -authentic precursors of Romanticism For some years he had been subject to hereditary gout as well as to depression of spirits, and as his circumstances improved his health declined. While at dinner one day in the college hall he was seized with severe illness, and after six days of suffering he died on the 30th of July 1771 By his own wish he was buried by the side of his mother at Stoke Poges near Windsor, and thus another poetic association was added to that beautiful scene of the Elegi His epitaph on his mother has an interesting touch of his peculiar melancholy 'Dorothy Gray, widow, the careful, tender mother of many children, one of whom alone had the misfortune to survive her'

The poetry of Grav is all comprised in a few pages—surprisingly few, yet he was very soon accounted worthy to rank in the first order of poets, to be reverenced as one of the dis majores of English poetry. He still stands in the front rank of the second order. His two great odes, the Progress of Poesy and The Band, published in 1757, are amongst the finest things we have in the so-called Pindaric style, his stanzas, in their varied versification, flow with lyrical ease and perfect harmony. Gray said of his own verse that the 'style he aimed at was extreme conciseness of expression, yet pure, perspicuous, and musical,' and it has been generally agreed that he attained his ambition, especially in lyrical work such as

All his verse is marked by dignity and distinction, by a rarely attained artistic perfection. The Band is perhaps more dramatic and picturesque than the Progress of Poesy, which nevertheless has some of the noct's Some of his most splen most resonant strains did lines, alongside official flatteries that seem ludicrous and commonplace, are in the Cambridge Installation Ode

The Ode to Lton College, the Ode to Adversity, and the far famed They show the same careful and elaborate finish, but the thought is simpler and more touching ln a letter to Beattie, Gray says 'As to description, I have always thought that it made the most graceful or nament of poetry. but never ought to make the sub ject.' He practised v list he taught, there is constantly some reflectio i arising out of the poet's descriptive passages, some solemn or toucl ing association Byron and others have attached, perhaps, undue value to the Elegy as the main prop of Gray's reputation It is doubtless the most frequently read and repeated of all his works, because, in Johnson's words, it 'abounds with images which find a mirror in every mind, and with sentiments to which every bosom returns an echo' But the lofticst type of poetry can never be very extensively popular A simple ballad air will give pleasure to a larger number than the most triumphant display of musical genius, and poetry which deals with subjects of familiar, everyday occurrence will find more readers than the most inspired flights of imagination, however graced with such recondite allusion and suggestion as can only be enjoyed by persons of kindred taste and culture with the poet Gray himself recognised that the popularity of the Elegy was largely due to the subject, although he ought to have known better than say that 'the public would have received it as well if it had been written in prose.' And even his best poetry did not find universal approval on the vhole, he has been approved by the public rather than by the critics Johnson was tempted into a harsh and unjust criticism of Gray Lirgely because the critic admired no poetry which did not contain some neighty moral truth or some chain of reasoning. And Macaulty, with good reason, said that Johnson's Gray is the worst of his I trees. The universal admiration of Pope was adverse to Gray's accept ance, yet he became increasingly popular Beattie said at the end of the century that he was the most admired of the poets of the age, Cov per thought inm the only poet since Shakesprare who could fairly be called sublime. Sumburne agrees with Johnson that Collins is greater than Grav did Coleridge, 50 did Mrs Brown But 11 15 mg surely b a temporary aberration of the Zeitgeish by a too protent reaction against earlier overpraise, that recent andiologists such as Mr Henley and Mrs nholly Meynell omit Grav's verses, and either impli citly or explicitly deny lus claim to be a true poet. Mrs Meynell even denounces him as glib and voluble, securing dapper and even fatuous effects, and says of the Llery that in it 'medicanty said its own true word' Matthew Arnold is the chief exception-a very weighty exception-to the chorus of depreciatory recent critics Mr Arnold (whom Professor Saintsbury has called, not very aptly, 'an industrious, sociable, and moderately cheerful Gray of the nineteenth centure, while Gray was 'an indolent, recluse, more melancholy Arnold of the eighteenth') more truly held that while Gray had almost inevitably retained much of the spirit of an age of prose (unhappile his own age)-something too much of its ratiocina tions, its conceits, and its 'poetic diction'-he yet had the genuine poetic gift, the gift of insight and feeling Collins had a full measure of the same spirit save for Collins, Gra stood alone in his age. Mr Gosse, too, does full justice to his artistic skill, and praises the 'originality of structure' in his odes, 'the varied music of their balanced strophes, as of majestic antiphonal choruses answering one another in some solemn temple and the extraordinary skill with which the evolution of the theme is observed and restrained'

In Gray's character there were odd inconsistencies He was nice, reserved, and proud-a haughty, retired scholar, yet we find him in his letters full of English idiom and English feeling, with a spice of the gossip, sometimes not over-fastidious in his allusions indolent, yet a severe student-hating Camhridge and its college discipline, yet constantly residing there. He loved intellectual case and luxury, and wished, as in a sort of Mohammedan paradise. to 'lie on a sofa, and read eternal new romances of Mariyaux and Crebillon' All he could say of Thomson's Castle of Indolence when it was first published was that there were some good verses in it. He had studied in the school of the ancient and Italian poets, labouring like an artist to infuse part of their spirit, their melody, and even some of their expressions, into his own English verse, while as a Latin versifier he ranks among the best of his countrymen. In his country tours the poet carried with him a convex mirror for gathering into one spot the forms and tints of the surrounding landscape. His imagination performed a like service in fixing for a moment the materials of Despite his classic taste and models, Gray was among the first to welcome and admire the Celtic or pseudo Celtic strains of Macpherson's Ossian, and he could also delight in the stern superstitions of the Scandinavian nations, in translating from the Norse tongue the Fatal Sisters and the Descent of Odin, he revived the rude energy and abruptness of the ancient ballad minstrels In different circumstances his genius would doubtless have soared higher and taken a wider sweep Mr Arnold explains what is sometimes called his 'sterility' by the fact that he was born a genuine poet into the age of prose, and could never breathe its atmosphere freely the place of Gray and Collins in the movement of the century, see above at page 11

The subdued humour and fancy of Gray are perpetually breaking out in his letters, with brief picturesque touches that mark the poet. In a letter to a friend, then on tour in Scotland, he playfully summed up

The Advantages of Travel

Do not you think a man may be the wiser—I had almost said the better—for going a hundred or two of miles, and that the mind has more room in it than most people seem to think, if you will but furnish the apartments? I almost envy your last mouth, heing in a very insipid situation myself, and desire you would not fail to send me some furniture for my Gothic apartment, which is very cold at present. It will be the easier task, as you have nothing to do but transcribe your little red books, if they are not ruhbed ont, for I conclude you have not trusted everything to memory, which is ten times worse than a lead pencil. Half a word fixed upon or near the spot is worth a cart load of recollection. When we trust to the picture that objects draw of them selves on our mind, we deceive ourselves without accurate and particular observation, it is but ill drawn at first, the outlines are soon blurred, the colours every day grow fainter, and at last, when we would produce it to anybody, we are forced to supply its defects with a few strokes of our own imagination.

Netley Abbey

My health is much improved by the sea, not that I drank it or bathed in it, as the common people do no, I only walked by it, and looked upon it. The climite is remarkably mild even in October and November, no snow has been seen to lie there for these thirty years past, the myrtles grow in the ground against the houses, and Guernsey lilies bloom in every window, the town clean and well huilt, surrounded by its old stone walls, with their towers and gateways, stands at the point of a peninsula, and opens full south to an arm of the sea, which, having formed two beautiful bays on each hand of it, stretches away in direct view, till it joins the British Channel, it is skirted on either side with gently rising grounds, clothed with thick wood, and directly across its mouth rise the highlands of the Isle of Wight at some distance, but distinctly seen. In the bosom of the woods-concealed from profane eyes-he hid the ruins of Netley Abbey, there may be richer and greater houses of religion, but the abbot is content with his situation See there, at the top of that hanging meadow, under the shade of those old trees that bend into a half circle about it, lie is walking slowly (good man 1), and hidding his beads for the souls of his benefactors, interred in that venerable pile that lies beneath him Beyond it-the meadow still descending -nods a thicket of oaks that mask the building, and have excluded a view too garish and luxuriant for a holy eye, only on either hand they leave an opening to the blue glittering sea. Did you not observe how, as that white sail shot by and was lost, he turned and crossed himself to drive the tempter from him that lind thrown that distraction in his way? I should tell you that the ferry man who rowed me, a lusty young fellow, told me that he would not for all the world pass a night at the abbey-there were such things near it-though there was a power of money hid there! From thence I went to Salisbury, Wilton, and Stonehenge, but of these I say no more, they will be published at the university press

PS—I must not close my letter without giving you one principal event of my history, which was that—in the course of my late tour—I set ont one morning before five o'clock, the moon shining through a dark and misty antiminal air, and got to the sea coast time enough to be at the sun's levee. I saw the clouds and dark vapours open gradually to right and left, rolling over one another in great smoky wreaths, and the tide—as it flowed gently in upon the sands—first whitening, then slightly tinged with gold and blue, and all at once a little line of insufferable hrightness that—before I can write these five words—was grown to half an orb, and now to a whole one, too glorious to be distinctly seen It is very odd it makes no figure on paper, yet I shall remember it as long as the sun, or at least as long as I endure. I wonder whether anybody ever saw it before? I hardly believe it

Grasmere

Passed by the little chapel of Wilhorn, out of which the Sunday congregation were then issuing Passed a beek near Dunmailrouse, and entered Westmoreland a second time, now begin to see Helmerag, distinguished from its rugged neighbours, not so much by its height, as by the strange, broken outline of its top, like some gigantic building demolished, and the stones that composed it flung across caeli other in wild confusion beyond it, opens one of the sweetest landscapes that art ever attempted to imitate. The bosom of the moun tains spreading here into a broad basin discovers in the midst Grasinere water, its margin is hollowed into small have with hold eminenees, some of them rocks, some of soft turf, that half coneeal and vary the figure of the little like they command. I rom the shore, n low promontory pushes itself far into the water, and on it stands a white village with the parish church rising in the midst of it lianging inclosures, corn fields, and mendows green as an emerald with their trees, hedges, and cattle, fill up the whole space from the edge of the Just opposite to you is a large farmhouse, at the bottom of a steep, smooth lawn embosomed in old woods, which climb half way up the mountain's side, and discover above them a broken line of erags, that erown the seene Not a single red tile, no glaring gentleman's house or garden walls, break in upon the repose of this little, unsuspected paradise, but all is pence, rustienty, and happy poverty, in its neatest and most becoming attire

The Grande Chartreuse

It is a fortnight since we set out hence upon a little excursion to Geneva We took the longest road, which hes through Savoy, on purpose to see a famous monas ters, called the Grande Chartreuse, and land no reason to think our time lost. After living travelled seven days very slow-for we did not change horses, it being impossible for a chaise to go post in these roads—we arrived at a little village among the mountains of Savoy, called Lehelles, from thence we proceeded on horses, who are used to the way, to the mountain of the Char treuse It is six miles to the top, the road runs winding up it, commonly not six feet broad, on one hand is the rock, with woods of pine trees hinging overhead, on the other, a monstrous precipiee, almost perpendicular. at the bottom of which rolls a torrent, that sometimes tumbling among the frigments of stone that have falken from on high, and sometimes precipitating itself down vast descents with a noise like thunder, which is still made greater by the celio from the mountains on each side, concurs to form one of the most solemn, the most romantie, and the most astonishing seenes I ever beliefd Add to this the strange views made by the crags and eliss on the other hand, the cascades that in many places throw themselves from the very summit down into the vale and the river below, and many other particulars impossible to describe, you will conclude we had no occasion to repent our pains. This place St Bruno chose to retire to, and upon its very top founded the aforesaid convent, which is the superior of the whole order When we came there, the two fathers who are commissioned to entertain strangers-for the i rest must must be spend one to another, nor to any one else -received u very lendly, and set before us a repost of dued fish, eggs, butter, and fruits, all excellent in their I in I, and extremely next. They presed us to spend the night there, and to stay some days with them, but this we could not do, so they led us about their house, y luch is, you must think, like a little city, for there are a hundred fathers, besides three hundred servants, that male their clothes, grand their com, press their wine, and do everything among themselves. The whole is quite orderly and simple no hing of friery but the wonderful decency, and the strarge small n, more than supply the place of it. In the evening we descended by the same way, passing through main clouds that were then forming them elves on the mountain's side (From a Letter to I & II ther)

In the album of the monks he wrote an Aleac ode on the subject, and in a subsequent letter to his friend West he again adverts to this memorible visit. In our little journey up the Grande Chartreuse, I do not remember to have gone ten paces without an exclimation that there was no restraining. Not a precipice, no a torrent not a cliff, but is pregnant with religion and poetry. There are certain seenes that yould are an atheist into behelf, without the help of other argument. One need not have a very fantastic imagination to see spirits there at noonday. You have Death perpetually before your eyes only so far remo ed as to compose the mind without frightening it."

On turning from these fine fragments of description to Gray's poetry, one is almost moved to say that the difference lies mainly in rhome and measure in imaginative warmth and vivid ness of expression the prose is well night equal to the verse

Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College

Le distant spires, ye antique towers
That erown the watery glade,
Where grateful Science still adores
Her Henry's how shade, Henry'll founders
And we, that from the stately brow
Of Windsor's heights the expanse below
Of grove, of lawn, of mead survey Whose turf, who e shade, whose flowers among Wanders the hoary Thames along
His salver winding way

Alt, happy hills, ah, pleasing shade,
Alt, fields beloved in vain?

Where once my careless childhood strayed,
A stranger yet to pain!

I feel the gales that from ye blow
A momentary bliss bestow,
As waving fresh their gladsome wing,
My weary soul they seem to sooth [ste],
And, redolent of joy and youth,
To breathe a second spring

Say, Father Thames, for thou hast seen
I ull many a sprightly race,
Disporting on thy margent green,
The paths of pleasure trace,

Who foremost now delight to cleave With pliant arm thy glassy wate?
The captive linnet which enthral? What idle progeny succeed
To chase the rolling circle's speed,
Or urge the flying ball?

While some on earnest business bent
Their murmuring labours ply
'Gainst graver hours, that bring constraint
To sweeten liberty,
Some bold adventurers disdain
The limits of their little reign,
And nnknown regions dure desery
Still as they run they look behind,
They hear a voice in every wind,
And snatch a fearful joy

Gay hope is theirs, by fancy fed,
Less pleasing when possessed,
The tear forgot as soon as shed,
The sunshine of the breast
Theirs buxom health of rosy hue,
Wild wit, invention ever new,
And lively chear of vigour born,
The thoughtless day, the easy night,
The spirits pure, the slumbers light,
That fly the approach of morn.

Alas, regardless of their doom,
The little victims play,
No sense have they of ills to come,
Nor care beyond to day,
Yet see how all around 'em wait
The ministers of human fate,
And black Misfortune's baleful train!
Ah, shew them where in ambush stand,
To scize their prey, the murtherous band,
Ah, tell them they are men!

These shall the fury Passions tear,
The vultures of the mind,
Disdainful Anger, pullid I car,
And Shame that sculks behind,
Or pining Love shall waste their youth,
Or Jealousy with rankling tooth,
That inly graws the secret heart,
And Livy wan, and faded Care,
Grim visaged comfortless Despair,
And Sorrow's piercing dart.

Ambition this shall tempt to rise,
Then whirl the wretch from high,
To bitter Scorn a sacrifice,
And grinning Infamy
The stings of Lalschood those shall try,
And hard Unkindness' altered eve,
That moed is the terr it forced to flow,
And keen Remor e with blood defiled
And moody Madness laughing wild
Amid severest woe

I o, in the vale of years beneath
A grisly troop are seen
The painful family of Death
Work hideous than their queen
This ricks the joints, the fires the years,
That every labouring sinesy strain

Fliose in the deeper vitals rage Lo, Poverty, to fill the band, That numbs the soul with icy hand, And slow consuming Age

To each his sufferings—all arc men,
Condemned alike to groan,
The tender for another's pain,
The unfeching for his own
Let, ali I why should they brow their fate?
Since sorrow never comes too late,
And happiness too swiftly flies
Thought would destroy their paradise
No more, where ignorance is bliss,
'Tis folly to be wise

The Glories of Cambridge

From yonder realms of empyrean day
Bur is on my ear th' indignant lay,
There sit the sainted sage, the bard dryine,
The few whom genius gave to shine.
Thro' every unborn age and undiscover d clime.
Rapt in celestial transport they,
Yet linther oft a glance from high
They send of tender sympathy,
To bless the place where on their opening soul
First the genuine ardour stole
'Twas Wilton struck the deep toned shell,
And, as the clioral warblings round him swell,
Meck Newton's self bends from his state sublime,
And nods his hoary head, and histens to the rhyme.

'Ye brown o er arching groves,
That contemplation loves,
Where willow Camus lingers with delight!
Oft at the blush of dawn
I trod your level lawn,
Oft wood the gleam of Cynthia silver bright
In cloisters dim, far from the haunts of I olly,
With Freedom by my side, and soft eved Melancholy?

But hark! the portals sound, and proing forth With solemn steps and slow, High potentates and dames of royal birth And mitred fathers in long order go Great Ldward, with the libes on his brow From hanghty Gallin torn, And sad Chatillon on her bridal morn That wept her bleeding love, and princely Clare, And Anjou's lieroine and the paler to c, The rival of her crown and of her woes, And either Henry there, The inurdered saint, and the majestic lord That broke the key of Rome. (Their team, their little triumplis o'er Their human passions no no more, Save Chanty, that glows beyond the tomb )

All that on Granta's fruitful plum
Rich streams of regal bounty poured
And bade these awful fanes and turre's rise,
To had their Fitzrov's fe tal morning come,
And thus they speal in soft necord
The liquid language of the slies
"What is grandeur, who is power?
Heavier toil, superior pain
What the brig's remard me gran?

The grateful memory of the good Sweet is the breath of vernal shower, The bee's collected treasures sweet, Sweet music's melting fall, but sweeter yet The still small voice of gratitude'

From The Progress of Poesy'

Awake, Folian lyre, awake, And give to rapture all thy trembling strings. From Helicon's harmonious springs

A thousand rills their mazy progress take
The laughing flowers that round them blow
Drink life and frigrance as they flow
Now the rich stream of music winds along,
Deep, majestic, smooth, and strong,
Thro' verdant vales and Ceres' golden reign
Now rowling down the steep amain,
Headlong, impetuous, see it pour
The rocks and nodding groves rebellow to the roar

In climes beyond the solar road, Where shaggy forms o'er ice built mountains roam, The muse has broke the twilight gloom,

To cheer the shivering native's dull abode. And oft beneath the odorous shade
Of Chili s boundless forests laid,
She deigns to hear the savage youth repeat,
In loose numbers wildly sweet,
Their feather cinctured chiefs and dusky loves.
Her track, where'er the goddess roves,
Glory pursue and generous shame,
The unconquerable mind and Freedom's holy flame.

Far from the sun and summer gale,
In thy green lap was Nature's darling laid,
What time, where lucid Avon strayed,
To him the mighty mother did univeil
Her awful face—the dauntless child
Stretched forth his little arms, and smiled
'This pencil take,' she said, 'whose colours clear Richly paint the vernal year
Thine, too, these golden keys, immortal boy!
This can unlock the gates of Joy,
Of Horrour that, and thrilling Fears,
Or ope the sacred source of sympathetic Tears.'

Nor second he, that rode sublime

Upon the seraph wings of Ecstasy,
The secrets of the abyss to spy
He passed the flaming bounds of space and time
The living throne, the supplier blaze,
Where angels tremble while they gaze,
He saw, but blasted with excess of light,
Closed his eyes in endless night
Behold where Dryden's less presumptious car
Wide o'er the fields of glory bear
Two consers of ethereal race,
With necks in thunder cloathed, and long resounding pace

The Bard-A Pindaric Ode

This ode is founded on a tradition current in Wales, that Edward I, when he completed the conquest of that country, ordered all the bards that fell into his hands to be put to death 'Ruin seize thee, ruthless King!

Confusion on thy banners wait,
Though fanned by Conquest's crimson wing,
They mock the air with idle state.
Helm, nor hauberk's twisted mail,
Nor e'en thy virtues, Tyrant, shall avail
To save thy secret soul from nightly fears,
From Cambria's curse, from Cambria's tears!'
Such were the sounds, that o'er the crested pride
Of the first Edward scattered wild dismay,
As down the steep of Snowdon's shaggy side
He wound with toilsome march his long array Stout Glo'ster stood aghast in speechless trance
'To arms' cried Mortimer, and couched his quivering lance

On a rock, whose haughty brow
Frowns o'er old Conway's foaming flood,
Robed in the sable garb of woe,
With haggard eyes the Poet stood—
Loose his beard, and hoary hair
Streamed, like a meteor, to the troubled air—
And with a master's hand, and prophet's fire,
Struck the deep sorrows of his lyre.
'Hark, how each giant oak, and desert cave,
Sighs to the torrent's awful voice beneath!
O'er thee, O King! their hundred arms they wave,
Revenge on thee in hoarser murmurs breathe,
Vocal no more, since Cambria's fital day,
To high born Hoel's harp, or soft Llewellyn's lay

'Cold is Cadwallo's tongue, That hushed the stormy main Brave Urien sleeps upon his criggy bed Mountains, ye mourn in vain Modred, whose magic song Made huge Plinlimmon bow his cloud topped head. Camarron On dreary Arvon's shore they lie, Smeared with gore, and ghastly pale Tar, far aloof the affrighted ravens sail, The famished eagle screams, and passes by Dear lost companions of my tuneful art, Dear as the light that visits these sad eyes, Dear as the ruddy drops that warm my heart Ye died amidst your dying country's cries-No more I weep They do not sleep On yonder cliffs, a griesly band, I see them sit, they linger yet, Avengers of their native land With me in dreadful harmony they join, And weave with bloody hands the tissue of thy line.

'Weave the warp, and weave the woof,
The winding sheet of Edward's race.
Give ample room, and verge enough
The characters of hell to trace,
Mark the year, and mark the night,
When Severn shall re echo with affright
The shrieks of death, through Berkley's roof that ring, Shrieks of an agonising King!

Him have we seen the greenwood side along
While oer the heath we hied our labour done
Oft as the woodlark paped her farewell song
While wisful eyes pursue the setting sun.
In early editions this fine stangen preceded the epitaph
'There scattered oft, the earliest of the year, lly hands unseen are showers of violets found.
The redbreast loves to build and warile there
And little footsteps lightly print the ground
Another verse in Mason's manuscript of the poem runs
'Hard's how the sarred colon, that breathes around

'Hark! how the sacred colm, that breathes around, Buds every fierce lumultuous passion cease In still small accents who pering from the ground A grateful extrest of eternal peace

The Alliance of Education and Government

As sickly plants betray a niggard earth, Whose barren bosom starves her generous birth, Nor genial warmth, nor genial juice retains. Their roots to feed, and fill their verdant veins. And, as in climes where Winter holds his reign, The soil, though fertile, will not teem in vain,

Forbids her germs to swell, her shades to rise, Nor trusts her blossoms to the churlish slies.

So draw mankind in vain the vital airs, Unformed, unfriended by those I indly cares That health and vigour to the soul impart, Spread the young thought, and warm the opening heart,

So fond instruction on the growing powers
Of nature idly lavishes her stores,
If equal justice, with unclouded face,
Smile not indulgent on the rising race,
And scatter with a free, though frugal hand,
Light golden showers of plenty o'er the land,
But tyranny has fixed her empire there,
To check their tender hopes with chilling fear,
And blast the blooming promise of the year

Proud of the yoke, and pliant to the rod, Why yet does Asia dread a monarch's nod, While Furopean freedom still vithstands The encroreling tide that drowns her lessening lands, And sees far off with an indignant groun, Her native plains and empires once her own? To brave the savage rushing from the vood, What wonder, if to patient valour truned, They guard with spirit what by strength they gained. And while their rocky ramparts round they see, The rough abode of want and liberty, (As lawless force from confidence will grow) Insult the plenty of the vales below? What wonder, in the sultry clinics that spread, Where Nile, redundant o'er his summer bed. From his broad bosom life and verdure flings, And broods o'er Lgypt with his watery wings, If with adventurous oar and ready sail, The dusky people drive before the gale, Or on frail floats to neighbouring cities ride, That rise and glitter o'er the ambient tide?

William Collins.

accounted by most modern critics the only great English lyrist of the eighteenth century, was the son of a well-to do hatter at Chichester, and there he was born on the Christmas of 1721 He received a liberal education, first in the prebendal school of Chichester, then as a scholar on the foundation of Winchester College and afterwards at Queen's College and Magdalen College in Oxford, where he was distinguished for 'his genius and indolence' but took his degree of BA in November 1743 Joseph Warton and Gilbert White of Selborne were fellow-students and friends. He left college abruptly, and afterwards visited an uncle, at that time with his regiment in Flanders. On his return to England, Collins thought of enterm, the Church but he soon abandoned this design and applied himself to literature. While at college he published his Persian Ecloques (1742), afterwards republished with the title of Oriental I cloques, and next year lus Epistle to Sir Il omas Hanmer on his Ldition of Shakspeare Collins, is Johnson remarks, 'hid many projects in his head. He planned several trigedies, and issued Proposals for a History of the Regreat of Learning, a work which he never accomplished. He was full of high hopes and magnificent schemes, but wanted steaminess of Hirough Johnson lie purpose and application obtained an advince from a bookseller for a projected translation of Aristotle's Poetics 1746 he published his Odes, which were purchised by Millir the bookseller, but fuled to attract attention. The poet in disgust burnt the unsold copies, sank under the disappointment, and became still more indolent and dissipited promise of his youth, his ardour and ambition, melted away under this bineful and depressing influence. Once again, however, he strung his live Thomson died in 1748 Collins—who lived some time at Richmond knew and loved him, and seems to have been hus sletched by Thomson m 1 stanz 1 of the Castle of Indolence

Of all the gentle tenants of the place,
I here was a man of special grave remark.
A certain tender gloom o'erspread his face, P'ensive, not sad, in thought involved, not darl i'en thousand glorious 53 stems would be build,
Ten thousand great ideas filled his mind.
But with the clouds they fled, and left no trace behind

When Thomson died Collins quitted Richmond, and commemorated his brother poet in a touching ode. Among his friends was also Home, the author of Douglas, to whom he addressed an ode, found unfinished after his death, on the Super stitions of the Highlands. It was communicated by Carlyle of Inverest to the Royal Society of Edinburgh, and printed in their Transactions in 1788, not without alterations and additions by Carlyle and Henry Mackenzie. Collins loved to dwell on these dim and visionary objects, and the compliment he pays to Tasso might almost be applied to himself.

Prevailing poet, whose undoubting mind Beheved the magic wonders which he sung

In the midst of the poet's difficulties and distresses, his uncle died (1749) and left him about £2000, 'a sum,' says Johnson, 'which Collins could scarcely think exhaustible, and which he did not hive to exhaust'. Fe had sunk into a state of nervous prostration, all hope or power of exertion had fled. Johnson met him one day, carrying with him as he travelled an English Testament 'I have but one book,' said Collins, 'but it is the best.' A voyage to France failed to dissipate his melancholy, and for a time he was the inmate of a madhouse. In his later days he was tended by his sister in Chichester. He used, when at liberty, to wander day and might among the aisles and cloisters of Chichester Cathedral, accompanying the music with sobs and moans. After passing six years in this condition, he died in utter obscurity on 12th June 1759. Two odes written in his later years, on the Music of the Greatan Theatre and the Bell of Aragon, have been lost

Lor long the Oriental Lelogues vere the most esteemed of Collins's works, he himself thought otherwise, and the vorld soon came to be of his opinion. Southey remarked that, though utterly neglected on their first appearance, the Odes of Collins in one generation and without any idea titions aid, were acknowledged to be the best of their land in the language 'Silently and imper cep ably they had risen by their own buogance, and their power was felt by every reader who had any true poetic feeling? This true estimate is fulls established, though there is in Collins some lark of human interest and of action. The Felogues we free from the occasional obscurit, and rumo coess of the Odes, though they too are rather tame, and, with the exception of the second, rather pointless and defective in story. Collins, like Gray holds a middle position between the school of Pope and the school of Wordsworth. In his maturer vork he is almost completely free from the so called 'poetic diction' of the eighteenth century lie has not the passionate feeling for nature of later poets, but his feeling is at least real and not con vention if In respect of natural poetic gifts, John son, in spite of prejudices, recognised in Collins something lacking in Gray, whom it was usual to set beside Collins or even rank as his superor Coloridge and Mrs Browning place him above Mr Swinburne vehicinently denounces all Gras linking of the two contemporaries together, as a lyric poet, Grav is not worthy to unloose Collins's shoe-latchet. Collins had, and Grav liad not, the gift of lyric song, a purity of music and clarity not found from Marvell to Blake. 'The muse gave birth to Collins she did but give slea to Gray' Collins could put more music into a note than could all the rest of his generation into But his ringe was all the labours of their lives He had not Goldsmith's power of com pelling liuman emotion, and his choice of subjects and his subtler modes of treatment, debar him from the popularity of the author of the Lho His most highly finished ode is that To E-ci.ing, which is unsurpressed for explied tone and exqui site diction The ode on The Passions has ments of a different order, but shows genius of even wider scope. The allegorical character of this ode and its companion pieces, To Liberty, To Mercy, and To Pity, removes them from direct human The Ode to Liberty first after Milton sympathy 'blows the clarion of republican faith' No poet made more use of metaphors and personification, Pity is presented with 'eyes of dewy light,' and Danger is described with the distinctness of sculpture

Danger, whose limbs of giant mould What mortal eye can fixed behold? Who stalks his round, an hideous form, Howling amidst the midnight storm, Or throws him on the ridgy steep Of some loose hanging rock to sleep

That Collins was capable of simplicity and pathos is shown by his two most popular poems, On the Death of the Poet Thomson, and the ode quoted below beginning 'How sleep the brave'

The scene of the following eclogue, the second of the series, is the desert at midday

Hassan or the Camel-driver

In silent horror, o'er the boundless waste,
The driver Hassan with his camels past,
One cruse of water on his back he bore,
And his light scrip contained a scanty store,
A fan of painted feathers in his hand,
To guard his shaded face from scorcling sand
The sultry sun had gained the middle sky,
And not a tree and not an herb was nigh,
The beasts with pain their dusty way pursue,
Shrill roared the winds, and dreary was the view '
With desperate sorrow wild, the affrighted man Thrice sighed, thrice struck his breast, and thus began
'Sad was the hour, and luck less was the day,
When first from Schiraz' walls I bent my way I

'Ah! little thought I of the blasting wind,
The thirst or pinching hunger that I find'
Bethink thee, Hassan, where shall thirst assuage,
When fails this cruse, his unrelenting rage?
Soon shall this scrip its precious load resign,
Then what but tears and hunger shall be thine?

'Ye mute companions of my toils, that bear
In all my griefs a more than equal share'
Here, where no springs in murmurs break away,
Or moss-crowned fountains mitigate the day,
In vain ye hope the green delights to know,
Which plains more blest or verdant vales bestow,
Here rocks alone and tasteless sands are found,
And funt and sickly winds for ever howl around.
Sad was the hour, and linckless was the day,
When first from Schiraz' walls I bent my way!

· 'Curst be the gold and silver which persuade Weak men to follow far fatiguing trade 1 The hily peace outshines the silver store, And life is dearer than the golden ore, Yet money tempts us o'er the desert brown, Ao every distant mart and wealthy town Full oft we tempt the land, and oft the sea, And are we only yet repaid by thee? Ah why was ruin so attractive made, Or why fond man so easily betrayed? Why heed we not, whilst mad we haste along, The gentle voice of Peace, or Pleasure's song? Or wherefore think the flowery mountain's side, The fountain's murmurs, and the valley's pride, Why think we these less pleasing to behold Than dreary descrts, if they lead to gold? Sad was the hour and luckless was the day When first from Schiraz' walls I bent my way !

76

'O cease, my fears! All frantie as I go,
When thought creates unnumbered scenes of woe,
What if the lion in his rage I meet!
Oft in the dust I view his printed feet,
And fearful oft, when Day's declining light
Yields her pale empire to the mourner Night,
By hunger roused he scours the groaning plain,
Gaunt wolves and sullen tigers in his train,
Before them Death with shrieks directs their way,
Fills the wild yell, and leads them to their prey
Sad was the hour, and luckless was the day,
When first from Schiraz' walls I bent my way!

'At that dead hour the silent asp shall creep,
If anght of rest I find, upon my sleep,
Or some swoln serpent twist his scales around,
And wake to anguish with a birning wound
Thrice happy they, the wise contented poor,
From lust of wealth and dread of death secure I
They tempt no deserts, and no griefs they find,
Peace rules the day where reason rules the mind
Sad was the hour, and luckless was the day,
When first from Schiraz' walls I bent my way!

'O hapless youth ! for she thy love hath won, The tender Zara, will be most undone. Big swelled my heart, and owned the powerful maid, When fast she dropped her tears, as thus she said "Farewell the youth whom sighs could not detain, Whom Zara's breaking heart implored in vain! Yet as thou go'st, may every blast arise Weak and unfelt as these rejected sighs I Safe o'er the wild no perils mayst thou see, No griefs endure, nor weep, false youth, like me." O let me safely to the fair return, Say with a kiss, she must not, shall not mourn, O let me teach my heart to lose its fears, Recalled by Wisdom's voice and Zara's tears' He said, and called on Heaven to bless the day When back to Schiraz' walls he bent his way

Ode written in 1745

How sleep the brave who sink to rest, By all their country's wishes blest! When Spring, with dewy fingers cold, Returns to deck their hallowed mould, She there shall dress a sweeter sod, Than Fancy's feet have ever trod

By fairy hands their knell is rung, By forms unseen their dirge is sung, Their Honour comes, a pilgrim gray, To bless the turf that wraps their clay, And Freedom shall a while repair, To dwell, a weeping hermit, there

Ode to Evening

If aught of oaten stop, or pastoral song,
May hope, chaste Eve, to soothe thy modest ear,
Like thy own solemn springs,
Thy springs, and dying gales,

O nymph reserved, while now the bright haired sun
Sits in von western tent, whose cloudy skirts,
With brede ethereal wove,
O'erhang his wavy bed

Now air is hushed, save where the weak eyed but, With short shrill shrick, flits by on leathern ving, Or where the beetle winds His small but sullen horn,

As oft he rises midst the twilight path, Against the pilgrim borne in licedless hum Now teach me, maid composed, To breathe some softened strain,

Whose numbers stealing through thy darkening vale, May not unseemly with its stillness suit, As, mit ing slow, I hail Thy genial loved return !

For when the folding star arising shows His paly circlet, at his warning lamp The fragrant hours, and claes Who slept in flowers the day,

And many a nymph who wreather her brows with sedge And sheds the freshening dew, and, lovelier still, The pensive pleasures sweet Prepare thy shadowy car

Then lead, calm votaress, where some sheety lake Cheers the lone heath, or some time hallowed pile, Or upland fallows grav Reflect its last cool gleam

But when chill blustering winds, or driving run, Forbid my villing feet, be mine the hut First from the mountain's side Views wilds and swelling floods,

And hamiets brown, and dim discovered spires, And hears their simple bell, and marks o'er all Thy dewy fingers draw The gradual dusky veil

While Spring shall pour his shower, as oft he wont, And bathe thy breathing tresses, meckest Eve I While Summer loves to sport Beneath thy lingering light

While sallow Autumn fills thy Up with leaves, Or Winter yelling through the troublous air, Affrights thy shrinking/train, And rudely rends thy folies,

So long, sure found beneath the sylvan slied, Shall Paney, Priendship, Science, rose hipped Health, Thy gentlest influence own, And hymn thy favourite name!

The Passions, an Ode for Music.

When Music, heavenly maid, was young, While yet in early Greece she sung, The Passions oft, to hear her shell, Thronged around her magic cell, Exulting, trembling, raging, fa riting, Possessed beyond the muse's printing, By turns they felt the glowing mind Disturbed, delighted, ruser, refined, Till once, 'tis said, when all were fired, Filled with fury, rapt, inspired, From the supporting myrtles round, They snatched her instruments of sound, And as they oft had heard apart Sweet lessons of her forceful art,

1 ach (for madness ruled the hour) Would prove his own expressive power

Lirt I car his hand, its shill to try, Amid the chords, bewildered Inid, And back recoiled, he knew not why, Lach at the sound himself had made Next Anger rushed, his eyes on fire In lightnings owned his secret stirgs, In one rule clash he struck the live. And swept with hurned hand the strings.

With voful measures win Desprir, Low, sullen sounds his grief beguiled, A solemn, strange, and mingled air, Twas sad by fits, by starts 'twas wild.

But thon, O Hope, with eves so fair, What i as thy delightful measure? Still it whispered promised pleasure, And bade the lovely scenes at distance hall! Still a ould her to cli the strun prolong, And from the rock, the woods, the vale, She called on Teho still through all the song, And where her svectest theme she chose, I soft respon the noice was heard at every close, And Hope enclianted emiled, and waved her golden has

And longer had she snng, but with a frown

Revenge impatient rose. He thren his blood stained sword in thunder dow, And, with a withering look, The var denouncing trumpet tool, And blew a blast so load and dread, Were no or prophetic sounds so full of woe, and ever and anon he beat The doubling dram with furious heat, And though sometimes, each dream pause between, Dejected Pity at his side Her soul subduing voice applied, Let still lie kept his wild unaltered mich,

While each strained ball of sight seemed barsting from Thy numbers, Jealousy, to naught were fixed. Sad proof of thy distressful state, Of different themes the veering song was mixed, And now it courted Love, now raving called on Hate.

With eyes upraised, as one inspired, Pale Melancholy sat retired And from 1 er wild sequestered sext, In notes by distance made more sweet, Poured through the mellow horn her pensive soul, And dashing soft from rocks around, Bubbling runnels joined the sound; Through glades and glooms the mingled measure stole Or o er some haunted stream with fond delay, Round a holy calm diffrang, Love of peace and lonely musing, In hollow murmurs died away

But O ! how altered was its sprighther tone, When Cheerfulness, a numph of healthiest hue, Her bow across her shoulder flung, Her bushins gemmed with morning-den, Blew an inspiring air, that dale and thicket rung, The hunter's call, to Faun and Dryad known,

The oak-crowned sisters, and their chaste-eyed queen,
Satvrs and sylvan boys were seen
Peeping from forth their alleys green,
Brown Exercise rejoiced to hear,
And Sport leaped up, and seized his beechen spear

Last came Joy's ecstatic trial
He, with viny crown advancing,
First to the lively pipe his hand addrest,
But soon he saw the brish, awakening viol,
Whose sweet entrancing voice he loved the best
They would have thought, who heard the strain,
They saw, in Tempe's vale, her native maids,
Amidst the fes al sounding shades,
To some unvearied ministrel dancing
While, as his flying fingers hissed the strings,
Love framed with Mirth a gay fantastic round,
Loose were her tresses seen, her zone unbound
And he, amidst his frolic play,
As if he would the charming air repay,

Shool thousand odours from his dewy wings.

O Music 1 sphere-descended maid. Friend of Pleasure, Wisdom's aid, Why, Goddess, why, to us denied, Lav st thou thy ancient lyre aside? As in that loved Athenian bower, You learned an all-commanding power, Thy mimic soul, O nymph endeared, Can well recall what then it heard. Where is thy native simple heart. Devo e to virtue, fancy, art? Arise, as in that elder time, Warm, energetic, chaste, sublime ! Thy wonders in that godlike age Fill thy recording sister's page, Tis said, and I believe the tale, Thy humblest reed could more prevail, Had more of strength, diviner rage, Than all which charms this laggard age, E en all at once together found, Cecilia's mingled world of sound O bid our vain endeavours cease, Revive the just designs of Greece, Return in all thy simple state, Confirm the tales her sons relate !

Dirge in Cymbeline sung by Guiderius and Arviragus

To fair Fidele's grassy tomb

Soft maids and village hinds shall bring Each opening sweet, of earlies' bloom,
And rifle all the breathing spring

No wailing ghost shall dare appear To ver with shrieks this quiet grove, But shepherd lads assemble here, And melting virgins own their love.

No withered witch shall here be seen, No goblins lead their nightly crew. The female favs shall hannt the green, And dress thy grave with pearly dew,

The red breas of, at evening hours,
Shall lindly lend his little aid,
With hoary most, and gathered flower
To deck the ground where thou art hid

When howling winds, and beating rain, In tempests shake the sylvan cell, Or midst the chase, on every plain, The tender thought on thee shall dwell.

Each lonely scene shall thee restore,
For thee the tear be duly shed,
Beloved till life can charm no more,
And mourned till Pity's self be dead

Ode on the Death of Mr Thomson.
[The scene is on the Tharies, near Richmond.]
In vonder grave a Druid lies,
Where slowly winds the stealing wave,
The year's best sweets shall duteous rise
To deck its poe's sylvan grave.

In you deep bed of whispering reeds
His airy harp shall now be laid,
That he, whose heart in sorrow bleeds,
May love through life the soothing shade

The mails and youths shall linger here, And while its sounds at distance swell Shall sadly seem in I ity's ear To hear the woodlaud pilgrim's knell.

Remembrance oft shall haunt the shore,
When Thames in summer wreaths is drest,
And oft suspend the dashing oar,
To bid his gentle spirit rest.

And oft, as Ease and Health retire
To breezy lawn, or forest deep,
The friend shall view von v hitening spire,
And 'mid the varied landscape weep

But thou, who own at that earthy bed,
Ah what will every dirge avail,
Or tears, which love and pity shed,
That mourn beneath the gliding sail?

Yet Lives there one whose heedless eye
Shall scorn thy pale shrine glimmering near?
With him, sweet bard, may fancy die,
And joy desert the blooming year

But thou, form stream, whose sullen tide No sedge crowned sisters now attend, Now waft me from the green hill's side, Whose cold turf hides the buried friend

And see, the fairt valleys fade,
Dun night has veiled the solemn view
Yet once again, dear parted shade,
Meek nature's child, again adien!

The genual meads assigned to bless
Thy life, shall mourn the early doom,
Their hinds and shepherd girls shall dress,
With simple hands, thy rural tomb

Long, long the store and poin ed clay Shall melt the musing Briton's eves 'O vales and wild wood ' shall he say, 'In vonder grave your Druid hes!'

In the Ode or the Popular Superstitions of the Heghlai ds, according to Mr Lowell 'the vibole Romanuc School is foreshado ved,' while Mr

Gosse has said that it contains passages which are 'unrivalled for rich melancholy fullness' between Milton and Keats. But it deals only very lightly, and in about half of its thirteen stanzas, with specific superstitions, about half are compliment to Home and praise of Scotland generally. One stanza puts the will-o'-the-wisp at the service of the kelpie, two stanzas are devoted to the melancholy fate of the swain who becomes the victim, and the distress of his becaused widow and children. Then follow these stanzas.

Unbounded is thy range, with varied slill Thy muse may, lil e those feathery tribes which spring From their rude rocks, extend her slirting wing Round the moist marge of each cold Hebrid isle, I o that hoar pile, v hich still its ruin shows In whose small vaults a pigmy folk is found, Whose bones the delver vith his spade upthrows, And culls them, wondering, from the hallowed ground! Or thither, a here, beneath the showery west, The mighty kings of three fair realms are hid. Once for, perhaps, together now they rest, No slaves revere them, and no wars invide I et frequent now, at midnight solemn hour, The rifted mounds their yawning cells unfold, And forth the monarchs stalk with sovereign power, In pageant robes, and wreathed vith sliceny gold, And on their twilight tombs acrial council hold

But, oh, o'er all, forget not Kilda's race, On a hose bleal rocks, a high brave the wasting tides, I air nature's daughter, virtue, yet abides Go' just, as they, their blamcless manners trace l Then to my car transmit some gentle song, Or those whose lives are yet sincere and plain, Their bounded walks the rugged eliffs along, And all their prospect but the wintry main. With sparing temperance, at the needful time, They drain the seented spring, or, hunger prest. Along the Atlantic rock, undreading chmb, And of its eggs despoil the solan's nest Thus, blest in primal innocence, they live Sufficed, and happy with that frugal fare Which tasteful toil and hourly danger give. Hard is their shallow soil, and bleak and bare. Nor ever vernal bee was heard to murmur there I See the memoir of Collins by Dyce in his edition of the Works (1-7) and that prefixed by W. Moy Thomas to the Aldine edition (1659 new ed. 1892).

Mark Akenside (1721-70), author of The Pleasures of Imagination, was the son of a respectable butcher at New castle upon-Tyne, and in boyhood the fall of one of his father's cleavers on his foot rendered him lame for life. At the New castle schools he showed precocity and promise, and was already writing verse. The Society of Dissenters advanced a sum to educate him for the ministry, but after a session of theology at Edinburgh he changed his views, and, returning the money, entered himself as a student of medicine. His (far from brilliant) Hymn to Science was apparently written about this time. He took his degree of M D at Leyden in 1744, and in the same year he had issued anonymously his Pleasures of Imagination The price demanded for the copyright was £120. and Pope advised Dodsley not to make a niggardly offer, 'for this is no every day writer'. The success of the work justified poet, critic, and publisherthough Gray dissented and Warburton condemned. The same year, after having in a poetical epistle attacked Pulteney under the name of Cuno. Akenside commenced physician at Northampton, but did not succeed He then (1746) engaged to contribute to Dodsley's Museum, began to practise in London as a physician, and published several At Edinburgh and at Leyden he medical treatises had formed an intimacy with a young Englishman of fortune, Jeremiah Dyson, which ripened into an enthusiastic friendship, and Mr Dyson-afterwards Clerk of the House of Commons and a Lord of the Treasury—was free handed enough to allow his poet-friend £300 a year After writing a few Oais and attempting a reconstruction of his great poem, Akenside made no further efforts in literature, save a few occasional poems and some medical works In 1757 appeared the expanded and altered form of the First Book of what was now called, by way of distinction, The Pleasures of the Imagination, of the Second Book in 1765, and a fragment of an intended Fourth Book was published after his He became distinguished as a physician, his society was courted for his taste, knowledge, and eloquence, but his solemn sententiousness of manner, his romantic ideas of liberty, and his unbounded admiration of the ancients exposed him occasionally to ridicule. The physician in Peregrine Pickle, who gives a feast in the manner of the ancients, was universally understood to be a caricature of Akenside. He irritated the Whigby becoming a Tory after he was appointed queen's physician, and as doctor to one of the London hospitals obtained an unpleasant repute for carelessness towards poor patients later days Akenside reverted with delight to his native landscape on the banks of the Tyne. In his fragment of a Fourth Book of his Imagination, written in the last year of his life, there is one striking passage

O ye dales Of Tyne, and ye most ancient woodlands, where Oft, as the giant flood obliquely strides, And his banks open and his lawns extend, Stops short the pleased traveller to view, Presiding o'er the scene, some rustic tower Founded by Norman or by Saxon hands O ye Northumbrian shades which overlook The rocky pavement and the mossy falls Of solitary Wensbeek's limpid stream, How gladly I recall your well known seats Beloved of old, and that delightful time When all alone, for many a summer's day, I wandered through your calm recesses, led In silence by some powerful hand unseen-Nor will I e'er forget you, nor shall e'er The graver tasks of manhood, or the advice Of vulgar wisdom, move me to disclaim

Those studies which possessed me in the dawn Of life, and fixed the colour of my mind For every future year—whence even now From sleep I rescue the clear hours of morn, And, while the world around lies overwhelmed In idle darkness, am alive to thoughts Of hononrable fame, of truth divine Or moral, and of minds to virtue won By the sweet magic of harmonious verse.

The Pleasures of Imagination is a didactic poem in three books of blank verse. Grav censured the mixture in it of philosophy-from Hutcheson and Shaftesbury, Plato, Lucretius, and even the papers by Addison in the Spectator were also laid under contribution by the imaginer. The pleasures his poem professes to treat 'proceed,' he says, 'either from natural objects, as from a flourishing grove, a clear and murmuring fountain, a calm sea by moonlight, or from works of art, such as a noble edifice, a musical tune, a statue, a picture, a poem? But in reality Akenside dealt chiefly with abstract subjects, and rarely succeeded in grafting upon them human or poetic interest. The work is an uninspired but dignified and graceful melange of reflection and illus ration, reason and imagination, deism, optimism, and commonplace eighteenth-century philosophising There is too much exposition, too much rhetoric, and, on the other hand, sometimes too much ornament. The constant admiration of virtue and lofty ideals, though probably sincere, is not stimulating. And many long passages are less alluring than sections of an abridged handbook of psychology and æsthetics

Suffice it to have said
Where'er the power of ridicule displays
Her quaint eyed visage, some incongruous form,
Some stubborn dissonance of things combined,
Strikes on the quick observer—whether Pomp
Or Praise or Beanty mix their partial claim
Where sordid fashions, where ignoble deeds,
Where foul Deformity are wont to dwell.

But his highest flights have variety and energy For him, familiarity with physical science enhanced the charms of nature. Unlike Campbell, who repudiated these 'cold material laws,' he viewed the rainbow with new pleasure after he had studied the Newtonian theory of light and colours

Nor ever yet
The melting rainbow's vernal tinctured hies
To me have shown so pleasing, as when first
The hand of Science pointed out the path
In which the sunbeams gleaming from the west
Fall on the watery cloud, whose darksome veil Involves the orient.

The diffuse and florid descriptions of the Imagination are the natural outcome of Akenside's youthful exuberance. He was afterwards conscious of the defects of his poem, and saw that there was too much leaf for the fruit, but in cutting off these luxurances he sacrificed some of the finest blossoms Postenty has been kinder to his fame by disregarding the later version. Akenside's blank verse is free and well modulated.

Aspirations

Sav, why was man so eminently raised Amid the vast creation, why ordained Through life and death to dart his piercing eye, With thoughts beyond the limit of his frame, But that the Omnipotent might send him forth In sight of mortal and immortal powers, As on a boundless theatre, to run The great career of justice, to exalt His generous aim to all diviner deeds, To chase each partial purpose from his breast

WARK AKENSIDE
From an Engraving after a Portrait by Arthur Pond.

And through the mists of passion and of sense, And through the tossing tide of chance and pain, To hold his course unfaltering, while the voice Of Truth and Virtue, np the steep ascent Of Nature, calls him to his high reward, The applanding smile of Heaven? Else wherefore burns In mortal bosoms this unquenched hope, That breathes from day to day sublimer things, And mocks possession? wherefore darks the mind With such resistless ardour to embrace Majestic forms, impatient to be free, Spurning the gross control of wilful might, Prond of the strong contention of her toils, Proud to be daring? who but rather turns To Heaven's broad fire his unconstrained view. Than to the glimmering of a waxen flame? Who that, from Alpine heights, his labouring eye Shoots round the wide horizon, to survey Nilus or Ganges rolling his bright wave Through mountains, plains, through empires black with And continents of sand, will turn his gaze To mark the windings of a scanty rill That murmurs at his feet? The high born soul

Disdains to rest her heaven aspiring wing Beneath its native quarry Tired of carth And this diurnal scene, she springs nloft Through fields of air, pursues the flying storm, Rides on the vollied lightning through the heavens, Or, yoked with whirlwinds and the northern blast, Sweeps the long tract of day Then high she soars The blue profound, and, hovering round the sun, Beholds him pouring the redundant streum Of light, beholds his unrelenting sway Bend the reluctant planets to absolve The fated rounds of Time I hence for effused, She darts her swiftness up the long career Of devious comets, through its burning signs Exulting measures the perennial wheel Of Nature, and looks back on all the stars, Whose blended light, as with a milky zone, Invests the orient Now, amazed she views The empyreal waste, where happy spirits hold, Beyond this concave heaven, their calm abode, And fields of radiance, whose unfiding light Has travelled the profound six thousand years, Nor yet arrived in sight of mortal things Even on the barriers of the world, untired She meditates the eternal depth below, Till half recoiling, down the headlong steep She plunges, soon o'erwhelmed and swallowed up In that immense of being There her hopes Rest at the fated goal For from the birth Of mortal man, the sovereign Maker said, That not in humble nor in brief delight, Not in the fading echoes of Renown, Power's purple robes, nor Pleasure's flowery lap, The soul should find enjoyment but from these Turning disdrinful to an equal good, Through all the ascent of things enlarge her view, Till every bound at length should disappear, And infinite perfection close the scene.

, True Beauty

Thus doth beauty dwell There most conspicuous, even in outward shape Where dawns the high expression of a mind By steps conducting our enraptured search To that eternal origin, whose power, Through all the unbounded symmetry of things, Like rys effulging from the parent sun, This endless mixture of her charms diffused Mind, mind alone-bear witness, earth and heaven!-The living fountains in itself contains Of beauteous and sublime here hand in hand Sit paramount the Graces, here enthroned, Celestial Venus, with divinest airs, Invites the soul to never-fading joy Look, then, abroad through nature, to the range Of planets, suns, and administrate spheres, Wheeling unshaken through the void immense, And speak, O man ' does this capacious scene With half that kindling majesty dilate Thy strong conception, as when Brutus rose Refulgent from the stroke of Cæsur's fate, Amid the crowd of patriots, and his arm Aloft extending, like eternal Jove, When guilt brings down the thunder, called aloud On Tully's name, and shook his erimson steel, And bade the father of his country, hail'

For lo? the tyrint prostrate on the dust, And Rome again is free! Is aught so fair. In all the dewy landscapes of the spring, In the bright eye of Hesper, or the morn, In Nature's fairest forms, is aught so fair. As virtuous friendship? as the candid blush. Of him who strives with fortune to be just? The graceful tear that streams from others' woes, Or the mild majesty of private life, Where Peace, with ever blooming olive, crowns. The gate, where Honour's liberal hands effuse. Unenvied treasures, and the snowy wings. Of Innocence and Love protect the scene?

The Sense for Beauty

This, nor gems nor stores of gold, Nor purple state, nor enliure can bestow, But God alone, when first his active hand Imprints the secret bias of the soul. He, mighty Parent! wise and just in all, Free as the vital breeze or light of heaven, Reveals the charms of nature Ask the swain Who journeys homeward from a summer day's Long labour, why, forgetful of his toils and due repose, he losters to behold The sunshine gleaning, as through amber clouds, O'er all the western sky, full soon, I ween, His rude expression and untutored airs, Beyond the power of language, will unfold The form of beauty smiling at his heart.

O blest of heaven' whom not the languad songs Of luxury, the siren ' not the bribes Of sordid wealth, nor all the gaudy spoils Of pageant honour, can seduce to leave Those ever blooming sweets, which from the store Of nature fair Imagination culls What though not all To charm the enlivened soul Of mortal offspring can attain the heights Of envied life, though only few possess Patrician treasures or imperial state, Yet Nature's care, to all her children just, With richer treasures and an ampler state, Endows at large whatever happy man Will deign to use them His the city's pomp, The rural honours his Whate er adorns The princely dome, the column and the arch, The breathing marble and the sculptured gold, Beyond the proud possessor s narrow claim, His tuneful breast enjoys. From him the spring Distils her dews, and from the silken gem Its lucid leaves unfolds for him the hand Of nutumn tinges every fertile branch With blooming gold and blushes like the morn. Each passing hour sheds tribute from her wings, And still new beauties meet his lonely walk, And loves unfelt attract him Not a breeze Flies o'er the meadow, not a cloud imbibes The setting sun's effulgence, not n strun From all the tenants of the warbling slinde Ascends, but whence his bosom can partake Fresh pleasure, unreproved Nor thence partakes Fresh pleasure only for the attentive mind, By this harmonious action on her powers, Becomes herself harmonious wont so oft In ontward things to meditate the charm

Of sacred order, soon she seeks at home To find a kindred order, to exert Within herself this elegance of love. This fair inspired delight + her tempered powers Refine at length, and every passion wears A chaster, milder, more attractive mien But if to ampler prospects, if to gaze On nature s form, where, negligent of all These lesser graces, she assumes the port Of that eternal majesty that weighed The world's foundations if to these the mind Exalts her daring eve, then mightier far Will be the change, and nobler Would the forms Of servile custom cramp her generous power. Would sorded policies, the barbarous growth Of ignorance and rapine, bow her down To tame pursuits, to indolence and fear? Lo t she appeals to nature, to the winds and rolling waves, the sun's unweared course. The elements and seasons all deelare For what the eternal Maker has ordained The powers of man we feel within ourselves His energy divine he tells the heart, He meant, he made us to behold and love What he beholds and loves, the general orb Of life and being, to be great like him, Beneficent and active. Thus the men Whom nature's works can charm, with God himself Hold converse, grow familiar, day by day, With his conceptions, act upon his plan, And form to his, the relish of their souls.

Inscription for a Statue of Chaucer at Woodstock.

Such was old Chaucer such the placed mien Of him who first with harmony informed The language of our fathers. Here he dwelt For many a cheerful day These ancient walls Have often heard him, while his legends blithe He sang, of love, or knighthood, or the wiles Of homely life, through each estate and age, The fashions and the follies of the world With eunning hand portraying Though perchance From Blenheim's towers, O stranger, thou art come Glowing with Churchill's trophies, yet in vain Dost thou applaud them, if thy breast be cold To him, this other hero who in times Dark and untaught, began with charming verse To tame the rudeness of his native land

In the ode On leaving Holland, after a farewell to the 'sober seat' of the Muse at Leyden, to the fogs and 'grave pacific air' of Holland, 'where never mountain zephyr blew,' are these blither verses on England—a veritable return to nature in the concrete

O my loved England, when with thee
Shall I sit down, to part no more?
Far from this pale, discolour'd sea,
That sleeps upon the reedy shore
When shall I plough thy azure tide?
When on the hills the flocks admire,
Like mountain snows, till down their side
I trace the village and the spered spire,
While bowers and copses green the golden slope divide?

Ye nymphs who guard the pathless grove,
Ye blue-eyed sisters of the streams,
With whom I wont at morn to rove,
With whom at noon I talk'd in dreams,
Oh! take me to your haunts again,
The rocky spring, the greenwood glade,
To guide my lonely footsteps deign,
To prompt my slumbers in the murmuring shade,
And soothe my vacant ear vith many an airy strain.

And thou, my faithful harp, no longer mourn
Thy drooping master's inauspicious hand
Now brighter skies and fresher gales return,
Now fairer maids thy melody demand
Daughters of Albion, listen to my lyre!
O Phœbus, guardian of the Aonian choir,
Why sounds not mine harmonious as thy own,
When all the virgin deities above
With Venus and with Juuo move
In concert round the Olympian father's throne?

The last verse unfortunately ends in bathos, and the answer of Phœbus is not even suggested. In another ode of a grateful convalescent this strikes a sympathetic chord

How gladly, 'mid the dews of dawn,
My weary lungs thy healing gale,
The balmy west or the fresh north, inhale!
How gladly, while my musing footsteps rove
Round the cool orehard or the sunny lawn, Awaked I stop, and look to find
What shrub perfumes the pleasant wind,

Or what wild songster charms the Dryads of the grove 1

The standard edition of Alensides portical works is that of Dyce (1834), with a Life prefixed and there is another by Gilfilan (1857)

James Grainger (c. 1721-66) was probably born at Duns in Berwickshire, the son of a ruined Jacobite gentleman of Cumberland, who had had to take a bertli in the excise. He studied medicine in Edinburgh, was an army surgeon (1745-48), made the tour of Europe, and after 1753 estab lished himself in practice in London, but liad to support himself largely by his pen. His poem of Solitude appeared in 1755 and was praised by Johnson, who considered the opening 'very noble.' Grainger wrote several other pieces, translated Tibullus, and was a critic in the Monthly Review In 1759 he went to St Christopher in the West Indies, married a lady of fortune, and commenced practising as a physician. his residence there he wrote his poem of the Sugar cane (1764), which Shenstone thought capable of being rendered a good poem, and the arguments in which Southey said were 'ludicrously flat and formal' Some passages are certainly ridiculous enough 'he very poetically,' says Campbell 'dignifies the poor negroes with the name of "sv rins," while the line 'Now Muse, let's sing of rits' is a stock example of bathos The mongoose had not yet been introduced into the West Indies, and so escaped the attentions of the Muse. Grainger died in St Christopher
